When we look at the two papers which as yet have been the result of these gatherings, we cannot say that we see in them much signs of that understanding of the institutions to be legislated for without which there can be no real reform. A somewhat vague paper of questions signed by several Deans and Canons is sent round to the Dean and Chapter of each Cathedral. The questions are for the most part harmless enough, only we observe that one most important point of reform is wholly left out. There is not a word touching that crying abuse by which the principal offices of the Old Foundations, the offices of Precentor, Chancellor, Treasurer, &c., have in most cases been made purely nominal, and that not uncommonly by sheer usurpation, against the will of dignitaries who are ready to discharge their duty, if they were only allowed. Next to the restoration of the Bishop to his proper authority in his own church and the rooting out of the little cliques of absentee Residentiaries—or rather perhaps identical with the latter—is the restoration of the great officers of the Cathedral to their proper work in the Cathedral and in the diocese. On this subject there is nothing in the paper of queries. The other queries are well enough as far as they go; but to whom are they to be addressed? To the "Deans and Chapters" of course. But who are the Deans and Chapters? York is perhaps the only Old Foundation church where there is any certainty of the real Chapter ever being consulted. In most cases it is pretty certain that it will not come before the real Chapter, but before the smaller body which usurps the name of the Chapter, and which is most interested in stifling all reforms. One smiles as one reads the question as to the "Greater Chapter," whether it "ought to have a share in, or control over, the present duties or offices of the Minor Chapter—e.g. to have a voice in reference to the Cathedral statutes or services, the expenditure, or the patronage." To send such a question as this to the "Minor Chapter" is like asking the wolf to define the rights of the lamb. At York, where the whole body of the Chapter has now fully won back the rights which it had never entirely lost, patronage is purely dispensed; but does any one expect that men who have long been jollying Chapter livings to themselves and their curates will come forward of their own free will to say that their power of so doing ought to be taken away? A map of the livings in the gift of the Chapter of Bristol, for instance, and of the wanderings among them of members of the capitular body, would be an edifying piece of ecclesiastical geography. So again, we smile over the question headed "Canons." Is it advisable that a longer residence should be exacted? Is it advisable that the power to hold any Office or Benefice with the Canons should be abridged? What answer to questions like these is likely to be got from pluralist absentees, who have hitherto drawn their capitular incomes as the reward of the easy duty of staying away nine months in the year? If the questions were to be really discussed in the real Chapters of the several churches—if they were sent to every member of a Cathedral body, residentiary or non-residentiary—still more if they were sent to men who are not members of Cathedral bodies, but who are known to have the subject at their fingers' ends—some good might come of the inquiry; but no good can come of sending them only to men who have a direct personal interest in barking every scheme of improvement.

The other document, which is understood to be the heads of a Bill to be submitted to Parliament, is even more wonderful. One fault runs through it all, the notion that all capitular bodies are to be reformed according to one type; whereas nothing is more certain than that each body must be legislated for separately according to the peculiarities of its history, constitution, and position. What is good for London will most likely not be good for St. David's; what is good for Ely will most likely not be good for Manchester. And when we come to the details, they are even more astounding. Let us take the very first proposal:—

1. Any Dean or Canon may suggest to the Visitor any alteration in the arrangements of the Cathedral, and the Visitor may consider any such proposed arrangement. If he approves it, it becomes a statute, subject to appeal to the Archbishop, or to the two Archbishops and Bishop of London.

Hitherto it has been at least the theory that a Bishop and his Chapter stand in something like the relation of a king to his Parliament, and that statutory legislation should be done by the full and fair agreement of both branches of the Legislature. Hitherto it has been held that an Archbishop has no jurisdiction out of his province, that a Bishop has no jurisdiction out of his diocese, and it may not be wholly forgotten that our forefathers for some ages thought it a matter of some importance to hinder the Bishop of Rome from breaking through to enact a law. But now, for the first time in the annals of human constitution-making, legislation is to take place without any kind of public discussion on the part of the legislature, without any power of petition on the part of those who may be interested, if only a single member of the legislature can contrive to get the ear of the sovereign. We shall be amazed indeed if such a fashion of law-making approves itself to a single Englishman, or to a single subject or citizen of any constitutional country, besides its own deviser. And the appeal too. We had always thought that appeals lay from the Bishop to the Archbishop, from the Archbishop to the Crown. Here we have a new tribunal altogether; namely, the two Archbishops and the Bishop of London. We really must explain that there is such a thing as ecclesiastical order; that here in the province of Canterbury, following the teaching of Lanfranc, his predecessors and successors, we can admit no jurisdiction in the Archbishop of York; and moreover that the Bishop of London, though he may have his throne in "the metropolitan cathedral," has no more jurisdiction out of his own diocese than the Bishop of Rome. Why these three particular sees? Is it a compliment to their present holders? We really think that we could find among our present episcopate three Bishops whom we could better trust for delicate points of ecclesiastical history and ecclesiastical law than the three who are thus picked out. Or is it because Canterbury, York, and London are among the churches whose Bishops have most thoroughly forsaken them, and may therefore be better trusted to judge with impartiality in capitular matters? It is certainly many years since any Archbishop of Canterbury made his dwelling place at Canterbury, and we know that times have changed since Macaulay could write that the Bishops of London lived under the shadow of the dome of their Cathedral. We have a mediæval book where it is mentioned how a Bishop of London was once found "apud sanctum Paulum"; but some wicked owner has written in the margin, "hodie apud sanctum Jacobum." At York near neighbourhood perhaps makes absence the more conspicuous; the last shiftings of ecclesiastical property seem to have irrevocably fixed the Northern Primate in a spot perhaps less suited for the labours of St. Wilfrith or St. William, but admirably suited as the cynosure of neighbouring rank and fashion. Who may have devised such a provision as this scheme of appeal, it is not for us to guess. We at least personally know of no human creature of whom we think so poorly as to hold him capable of devising it. But here it is, devised by some one or other, to speak for itself.

The thing goes on as it has begun. The next clause—a clause, be it remembered, to hold a place in an Act of Parliament—prescribes one general law for the appointment of preachers, a matter which in all reason should be left to each Bishop and Chapter to settle by statute, as the constitution and circumstances of their church may from time to time demand. The third clause seems designed for the special exaltation of Deans, a class of men who, during the last two or three hundred years, have grown not a little, partly perhaps through the abolition of Abbots. In the thirteenth century the Deanery of York could be spoken of as "tam nobilis prebenda," the highest prebend no doubt in the Church, but still only one prebend out of many; but now, in seeming forgetfulness of the Proctor's office, it is ordained:—

3. The services to be arranged by the Dean, subject to an appeal to the visitor, and from him to the Archbishop, or two Archbishops and Bishop of London.

Here again is the same monstrous doctrine of appeals which we had before; and it is hard to see what under such a system would be the rights and powers left to any other member of the Chapter besides the Dean. We get them, we suppose, in the next clause:—

4. The Great Chapter to meet twice a year, the Dean presiding. A majority to have power to suggest any alteration of services to the visitor.

How the Great Chapter is to be got together in the New Foundation Churches which have no Great Chapter our legislators do not explain. It would certainly be a great improvement to give the "Honorary" Canons of the New Foundations the same position as the non-Residentary Canons of the Old; but at present it does not belong to them, and such a clause as this would hardly give it to them. Then, if the Great Chapter came together only to suggest, one would have thought that for that purpose a majority was hardly needed. The humble right of suggestion might surely be entrusted to any clergyman of mark enough for his Bishop to have thought him worthy to be the occupant of a stall; but when we come to majorities, we naturally think of bodies which have something more than a mere right of suggestion. And this last sentence, short as it is, reads as if it had been begun on one principle and gone on with on another. The beginning sounds well—"The majority shall have power." Surely it was another hand which added the words "to suggest," which in truth is no power at all, but simply the right of petition, a right which in a free country is common to every human being.

Of the other three clauses we will mention one only:—

6. The Minor Canons to rank with the Prebendaries, and to be, in fact, Prebendaries.

This is really more wonderful than all. Whence can it come? One would have thought that it would have defied the powers even of two Archbishops and a Bishop of London to devise a provision showing such utter ignorance of the institutions with which the proposals profess to deal. The words "Minor Canons" are probably meant to take in the Priest Vicars of the Old Foundations, but how is the clause to apply to the New Foundations? How can the Minor Canons take rank with the Prebendaries, and in fact be Prebendaries, in churches where the title and office of Prebendary no longer exists? Then what is meant by the words "to take rank with the Prebendaries, and in fact to be Prebendaries"? We should not envy the Judge who should be called upon to get a meaning out of an Act of Parliament drawn up in this fashion. A Minor Canon is one thing; a Prebendary is another thing. It is possible to abolish either order; it is possible to merge one order in the other; it is possible to decree that, the two offices being distinct, their holders shall have equal precedence; but to legislate that "the Minor Canons shall rank with Prebendaries, and in fact be Prebendaries," is simply to put together words without meaning. It would seem that the authors of this clause, to whom the word Canon probably suggested no meaning but that of Residentary, had still, as the clause about the Great Chapter shows, some hazy notion that there were other clergymen about a Cathedral besides the Residentaries, and they jumbled two distinct classes together in this astounding fashion.

We wish our Cathedral institutions to be preserved. If they are to be preserved, they must be reformed; but this is not the way to reform them.

SNEAKING REGARD.

"TO sneak" is defined by Johnson "to creep slyly, to come and go as if afraid to be seen"; and "sneaking"—he ignores the substantive "sneak" altogether—as "servile, mean, low." Webster defines a sneak as "a mean fellow," and both he and Richardson connect the word with snake. We all know the sort of meaning the term bears among schoolboys, with whom, perhaps, it is most in vogue. The schoolboy idea of a sneak, as contrasted with the character deserving to be loved and honoured, is not ill expressed in Pope's couplet:—

Tom struts a soldier, open, bold, and brave;
Will sneaks a scrivener, an execrating knave.

How far either soldiers or scriveners always answer to the poet's description may be questioned, but there can be no doubt that a sneak is usually looked upon as very little better than a knave. The word, like the correlative term "gentleman," is one of peculiarly English growth, and we should hardly expect to find any equivalent in the current phraseology of a French lycée, whether secular or ecclesiastical, where sneaking, or something which would be so designated at Harrow or Eton, is almost elevated into a virtue. To English apprehension the term denotes that combination of selfishness, cowardice, and falsehood which is summed up in the lexicon definition of a "mean fellow," and is directly opposed to manliness and candour. It has sometimes even been made a charge against Christianity that it encourages or inculcates "sneaking" virtues, and there have certainly been religious systems, both Catholic and Protestant, to which the indictment might be plausibly applied. The designation of "saint," when used in derision or contempt, is often hardly distinguishable from sneak. And such being the direct force of the term, we may easily gather the meaning conveyed in its derivative and secondary application. When we speak of a "sneaking regard" for a person or a principle, we imply that the regard is, or is felt by those who entertain it to be, more or less discreditable, and that they do not venture openly to profess a feeling of which they are ashamed, while they nevertheless secretly indulge it. It has sometimes been said, for instance—very unjustly, we believe—that Mr. Gladstone has a "sneaking regard" for the Pope; but no one would dream of casting such a reproach on Archbishop Manning, because a Roman Catholic prelate may naturally and openly avow a sentiment which is justly thought out of place in the Prime Minister of a Protestant country. In the same way a democrat who hankers after titles and decorations may fairly be accused of having a sneaking regard for Royalty, but Sir Walter Scott's enthusiastic account of the coronation of William IV., which he came up from Scotland expressly to witness, is allowed even by those who have least sympathy with his political opinions to be creditable to his heart, if not to his head. Men can only be said to have a sneaking regard for what they either know or believe to be disreputable, and when depraved taste or self-interest leads them to act covertly against their better judgment. We must confess then that we read with some surprise, not to say bewilderment, the following paragraph in Mr. Goldwin Smith's article in the current Fortnightly on the "Aim of Reform":—

Mr. Gladstone was made in one account of his Greenwich speech to say, that in the heart of every Englishman there was a "sneaking" regard for hereditary rank. The phrase, whether he used it or not, is happy, and the remark need not be confined to Englishmen, for the most abject worshippers of the spurious nobility of England are the shoddy of New York. In the case of Englishmen, even of the lowest dunkey, faith is in some degree tempered by sight. Maintain institutions, the direct tendency—it might almost be said the aim—of which is to pervert and degrade the sentiments of the people, and the sentiments of the people will be perverted and degraded. The people themselves are all the time conscious that it is so; there is nothing "sneaking" in the homage which they pay to nature's nobility. But we must object to having a constitution based on the "sneaking" instincts either of English dunkeyism or of the shoddy of New York.

The notion of the British Constitution being "based" on any of the modern incidents of English dunkeyism, whether sneaking or not, is only less amazing than the notion of its being based on the "shoddy," or the anything else, of New York. If the writer had not once been a Professor of History, we should almost have ventured to say it was an anachronism. However, we are not concerned here with the origin of the British Constitution, or of our "nobility," but with the feeling asserted to be entertained towards them in "the heart of every Englishman." We are not sure that as Mr. Goldwin Smith is determined whether Mr. Gladstone's Greenwich speech was correctly reported, but we have little doubt that, if he did use the phrase attributed to him, it was not used, as it is by his critic, as grand diction; and we have no doubt at all that, if it was seriously intended, it was just the reverse of "happy." No doubt the fervent Republicans who demonstrate their admiration for Sir Charles Dilke by turning off the gas and breaking their neighbours' heads at public meetings, while scornfully able to conceal their pride at having a live baronet to lead them, are open to the soft impeachment of a sneaking regard for rank; and we ourselves prefer, though possibly he does not, the more consistent devotion of the International, which refuses him any other title than that of "Citizen Dilke." But Mr. Goldwin Smith is not speaking of the Dilkite democrats, but of the people of England, who certainly have "a regard for hereditary rank," so openly professed that it is difficult to understand the epithet by which he has qualified it. We should be rather curious to know whether he considers the popular demonstration of February 27 as indicating a "sneaking regard" for Royalty. To be sure, on that occasion, "faith" was "in some degree tempered by sight"; but the result of the tempering was not to diminish the intensity or the outspokenness of the sentiment. Mr. Goldwin Smith tells us that, if we maintain institutions the direct tendency of which is to pervert and degrade popular sentiment, it will be perverted and degraded. Taken in itself, the proposition sounds very like a truism; but in his particular application of the statement it seems—and that too on his own showing—very like an inversion of the truth. The obnoxious institution is still maintained in England, and has from the first been banished from New York; yet there, we are assured—and we quite accept the assurance—its "most abject worshippers" are to be found. If, then, we test the author's theory by his own appreciation of the facts, to abolish the institution would seem to be the surest way of perverting and degrading the sentiments of the people. He may reply, of course, that if it were abolished everywhere, its memory would perish from among men; but then it will probably take some time before the process of levelling down can be universally carried out, and meanwhile the result in any particular country appears, judging from the most complete precedent yet offered, to generate precisely that "sneaking regard" for the broken idol which is so degrading and perverse. We say to generate, rather than to increase, because, when Mr. Goldwin Smith admits that his remark "need not be confined to Englishmen" but includes "the shoddy of New York," he is very much understating, if not misstating, the actual facts. His criticism, broadly speaking, does not apply to Englishmen at all, whose regard for royal and aristocratic institutions, whether wise or unwise, is too openly, we might say too ostentatiously, avowed to be with any propriety termed a "sneaking" one. In America, on the other hand, the institution and the sentiment it evokes are ostentatiously denounced, while yet Englishmen who are settled there find that a handle to their names has a positive money value, so "abject" is the worship paid to the forbidden thing. One explanation of the difference Mr. Goldwin Smith has suggested. It may be quite true that distance lends enchantment to the view; but if the faith which is tempered by sight is a maulier and more reasonable faith, the visible institution has so far an elevating, and not a degrading, tendency. A further explanation, which has not apparently occurred to him, we will add. Is it not just possible that the sneaking regard for hereditary rank of which the "shoddy of New York" affords so "abject" an example is a perverted form of that instinctive craving for something to look up to out of ourselves for which Republican institutions provide no adequate satisfaction? We will not commit ourselves to Dr. Johnson's famous dictum that the devil was the first Whig; but it is easy to see what he means, and that his remark had a basis of truth. No one has insisted more pointedly than Mr. Carlyle, a very different type of thinker from Johnson, on the high importance of "reverence," as one of the divinest qualities in man. No doubt "nature's nobility" are the most legitimate earthly objects of such a sentiment, when we can discover them; but in the absence of hereditary rank, it is quite as likely to be devoted to a successful adventurer, or even a powerful millionaire, as to be concentrated on that "sole and unique nobility of virtue" which the Roman patriot commends, but which experience does not show that a system of social and political equality has any special tendency to produce.

We have said already that "sneaking idolatry" of rank is hardly a fault that can be charged on the great body of Englishmen. The feeling which finds its highest expression in loyalty to the Sovereign is honestly entertained and openly avowed among us, and is, in the main, both creditable and beneficial to those who entertain it and to those who are its objects. Like many other sentiments, it may be difficult to analyse minutely, but there is at bottom a belief, generally well founded, that merit of some kind was the foundation of hereditary distinction, and that the one is likely to become an heirloom in the family as well as the other. Noblesse oblige. Rank, like property, has its duties as well as its rights, and an hereditary aristocracy which had ceased to be respectable would not long continue to be respected. The point may be illustrated by contrast. There is both in England and elsewhere only too much "sneaking idolatry" of wealth. There are numbers of persons who are proud of the notice or acquaintance of a rich man, who pay a kind of instinctive homage to him, and that quite apart from any consideration of how his riches were acquired; yet no one would gravely maintain that wealth in itself constitutes any title to respect. There is no moral element and no poetry in such a feeling; and it may fairly be described, to quote Mr. Goldwin Smith's language, as perverse and degrading. Much the same may be said of the "sneaking" homage so largely paid in the present day to notoriety, as such, as though some newspaper fiasco, whether good or bad—of a great statesman, or a great speaker, or a great speculator, or a great criminal—was in itself a ground of veneration. We have no doubt there are thousands of men and women in England at this moment who would treasure up as a most precious relic a scrap of the Tichborne Claimant's handwriting, or even perhaps a fragment of one of the many tumblers he had drunk his brandy out of, just as thousands made a pilgrimage last year to the scene of the Eltham murder, and tried to carry off some permanent record of their visit. Even Mr. Chaffers, it may safely be affirmed, is an object of interest to a very large number of not disreputable persons, who would be ashamed to admit even to themselves any other opinion of his conduct than that expressed by Mr. Benson, while yet they have at least the amount of "sneaking regard" which makes them eager to see, or rather to be able to say they have seen, him. How far such a feeling falls under the category of flunkeyism we will not discuss, but it has little or nothing in it in common with the satisfaction felt by the multitudes who caught a passing glimpse of the Queen on her way to or from St. Paul's on Thanksgiving Day. And we are further disposed to believe that it is likely to be more prevalent and more absorbing in a country where there is no hereditary monarchy or aristocracy. We should be quite prepared to meet with it in full development among "the shoddy of New York." This is the kind of sentiment which may be most correctly designated a "sneaking idolatry," though, we trust, it will never become the basis of even a Republican constitution.

THE FOOLS OF COMEDY.

IN an age when wit condoned every offence, the epithet Fool became necessarily the one ill name to be averted at all costs:—

Ask you why Wharton broke through every rule?
'Twas all for fear the knaves should call him fool.

Still everybody could not be a wit, and as folly can never submit to obscurity, the emptier vivacity of social life was put upon its mettle, and had to cast off its slough and shine out in a new character, or else find itself nowhere. The top of the age was a natural correlative of the wit of the age, and those who had the will to be wits, but not the brains, contrived, by banding together in an offensive and defensive alliance, to make themselves a very formidable body, fully able to hold their own and avenge their wrongs. Warned by the poet that the policy of butts lies in combination, that

But fool with fool is barbarous civil war, they stood by one another, acted in concert, and by unanimity in attack made themselves terrible; harassing and disconcerting the adversary at the very crisis of his fate, and baffling hopes at the critical moment of triumph! As, according to the Spectator, "the seat of wit was the playhouse," the theatre was the obvious battle-field; and a fairer field than might at first be supposed. The wit had the stage, but the sop had the stage-box. The fool squabbled for in the select morning coterie, and peevishly grudged to the more glib and voluble railler as unlawful spoil—for "taking the fool out of one's mouth is worse than taking the broad out of one's mouth"—had his turn at night, figuring as one of a crowd of beaux, all as fine as the tailor and perriquier could make them, and all bent on the one object of diverting attention from the stage to themselves; at one time talking noisily, laughing loud, attracting all eyes; then again, when the wit was brightest, and the fun most exuberant, dropping all at once into attention the most profound, in order to render more effective an absolute immovable gravity which no humour of author or trick of actor could shake or discompose. We see what effect these various manœuvres had on sensitive nerves by the allusions in prologue and epilogue. There the habits of the stage-box furnish an illustration of ideal impertinence. Thus an "eternal babbler" makes no more use of his ears than a man who sits at a play in Kope's Corner; and the sops are flattered with ironical promises:—

So may you slowly to old age advance,
And have th' excuse of youth for ignorance.
So may Poppe's Corner full of noise remain,
And drive far off the dull attentive train.

But these hits and allusions are not confined to the outskirts of the drama, where the poet and his audience are brought into direct collision. We find the strategy of the sops a topic with the dramatis personæ. Congreve, who piqued himself, not without justice, on his foils, opens his Double Dealer with a complacent exposition of their fine of policy set forth by Lord Froth, a solemn coxcomb, and the livelier Brisk. It was the age for good spirits, and for the boast of them; therefore, Sir Paul commits no solecism in addressing the two as follows:—

We wanted your company; but Mr. Brisk—where is he? I swear and vow he's a most facetious person; and the best company. And, my Lord Froth—your lordship is so merry a man—he, he, he!

LORD FROTH. O joy, Sir Paul, what do you mean? Merry! O bar-baron! I'd as leave you had called me fool.

SIR PAUL. Nay, I protest and vow now 'tis true, when Mr. Brisk jokes, your lordship's laugh does so become you—he, he, he!

LORD FROTH. Ridiculous! Sir Paul, you're strangely mistaken; I assure you, Sir Paul, I laugh at nobody's jest but my own, or a lady's, I assure you, Sir Paul.

Brisk. How! how, my lord! What, affront my wit! Let me perish, do I never say anything worthy to be laughed at?

LORD FROTH. O foy, don't misapprehend me; I don't say so, for I often smile at your conceptions. But there is nothing more unbecoming a man of quality than to laugh; 'tis such a vulgar expression of the passion! everybody can laugh. Then especially to laugh at the jest of an inferior person, or when anybody else of the same quality does not laugh with one. Ridiculous to be pleased with what pleases the crowd! Now, when I laugh, I always laugh alone.

Brisk. I suppose that's because you laugh at your own jests—ha, ha, ha!

LORD FROTH. Ha, ha. I swear, though, your raillery provokes me to a smile.

Brisk. Ay, my lord, it's a sign I hit you in the teeth if you show 'em.

LORD FROTH. Ha, he, he! I swear that's so very pretty, I can't forbear.

CARELESS. I find a quibble bears more sway in your lordship's face than a jest.

This Careless, as the representative of common sense and independence, fights the battle of the wits. He asks his lordship if he never sees comedies:—

LORD FROTH. O yes, sometimes; but I never laugh.

CARELESS. No!

LORD FROTH. Oh no! never laugh indeed, sir.

CARELESS. No! Why, what d'ye go there for?

LORD FROTH. To distinguish myself from the commonalty, and mortify the poets; the fellows grow so conceited when any of their foolish wit prevails upon the side boxes. I swear—ha, he, he!—I have often constrained any inclinations to laugh—he, he, he!—to avoid giving them encouragement.

Here Brisk interposes:—

Let me perish, my lord, but there's something very particular in the humour; 'tis true it makes against wit, and I'm sorry for some friends of mine that write; but, egad, I love to be malicious. Nay, there's wit in't too, and wit must be folled by wit; cut a diamond with a diamond—no other way, egad!

CARELESS. Wit! in what? Where's the wit in not laughing when a man has a mind to't?

Brisk. O lord, why, can't you find it out? Why, there it is in the not laughing. Don't you apprehend me? My lord, Careless is a very honest fellow, but hark ye—you understand me? Somewhat heavy, a little shallow or so. Why, I'll tell you now. Suppose now you come up to me—nay, prythee, Careless, be instructed. Suppose, as I was saying, you come up to me holding your sides, and laughing as if you would—well, I look grave, and ask the cause of this immoderate mirth—you laugh on still, and are not able to tell me—still I look grave; not so much as a smile—

CARELESS. Smile? No. What should you smile at when you suppose I can't tell you?

Brisk. Pahaw, pahaw! prythee don't interrupt me. But, I tell you, you shall tell me at last—but it shall be a great while first.

CARELESS. Well, but prythee don't let it be a great while, because I long to have it over.

Brisk. Well then, you tell me some good jest, a very witty thing, laughing all the while as if you were ready to die—and I hear it and look thus—would not you be disappointed?

CARELESS. No; for if it were a very witty thing, I should not expect you to understand it.

LORD FROTH. O foy, Mr. Careless, all the world allows Mr. Brisk to have wit; my wife says he has a great deal. I hope you think her a judge.

Brisk. Pooh! my lord, his voice goes for nothing—I can't tell how to make him apprehend—take it tother way. Suppose I say a witty thing to you?

CARELESS. Then I should be disappointed indeed!

Having thus established a casus belli against the coxcombs, the dramatist adds a lady to their number. There is a Lady Froth, giving fair occasion to the remark that, though marriage makes man and wife one, it leaves them still two fools. Society, to judge from the universal consent of the literature of the time, was the very paradise of female fools. Affectation reached a sort of acme. It could go no further; and silliness in a pretty woman was so essential an attraction that, if she was not foolish by nature, she was advised to feign folly if she would please the men. Lady Froth is all affectation; nothing else about her is genuine. Her line is a prodigious admiration for her lord, giving occasion to a scene which recalls that ineffable bow and courtesy—relics of a lost civilization—which lately delighted English eyes in M. Delaunay's exquisite performance of Le Menteur, where he bows over the hand of Madame Favart. Lady Froth, apostrophizing to his face that "dear, deceitful tongue, that charming softness in your mien and your expression," particularizes the bow, and for the benefit of the company solicits him to repeat it:—

Good, my lord, bow as you did when I gave you my picture; here, suppose this my picture (gives him a pocket-glass). Pray mind, my lord. Ah, he bows charmingly. Nay, my lord, you shan't kiss it so much; I shall grow jealous, I vow now. (He bows profoundly, then kisses the glass.)

LORD FROTH. I saw myself there, and kissed it for your sake.

LADY FROTH. Ah! gallantry to the last degree. Mr. Brisk, you are a judge, was ever anything so well bred as my lord?

Brisk. Never anything but your ladyship, let me perish!

Lady Froth, being a woman of parts, affects the précieuse, and admits that she believes her brain would have turned under the excitement of courtship if her pen had not brought her relief:—

LADY FROTH. O, my dear Cynthia! you must not rally your friend; but really, as you say, I wonder too; but then I had a way. For, between you and I, I had whimsies and vapours, but I gave them vent.

CYNTHIA. How, pray madam?

LADY FROTH. O, I writ, writ abundantly. Do you never write?

CYNTHIA. Write what?

LADY FROTH. Songs, elegies, satires, encomiums, panegyrics, lampoons, plays, or heroic poems.

CYNTHIA. O, not I, madam! I am content to be a courteous reader.

LADY FROTH. O, inconsistent! in love and not write! If my lord and I had been both of your temper, we had never come together.—O, bless me! what a sad thing would that have been, if my lord and I should never have met!

CYNTHIA. Then neither my lord nor you would ever have met your match.

LADY FROTH. No more we should; thou say'st right. For sure my Lord Froth is a fine gentleman, and as much a man of quality—ah! nothing of the common air. I think I may say he wants nothing but a blue ribbon and a star to make him the very phosphorus of our hemisphere. Do you understand those two hard words? If you don't, I'll explain them to you.

She piques herself on her invention in titles and names, her genius being all for surprises. Confessing to an heroic poem "On my lord's love for me," she asks, "And what do you think I call it? I dare swear you won't guess—the Sillabub—ha! ha! ha!" This is pronounced both appropriate and inspiring; "Is it not?" she rejoins; "and then I call my lord Spremosa, and myself—what do you think I call myself?" Lactilla is suggested; but no, it is "Biddy, that's all! just my own name"—which is pronounced the most natural in the world, but more surprising still.

The fop is indispensable in genteel comedy, as imparting a flavour of high breeding. Every dramatist tries his hand on him, all ringing the changes of the argument on behalf of conceit and affectation set forth by Colman's Lord Trinket—that the aim of bon ton is to render persons of family different from the vulgar, for whom nature serves very well. For this reason it has at various times been ungenteel to see or hear, to walk, to be in good health, to have twenty other horrible perfections of nature. While gallantly allowing to Miss Russel that nature indeed may do very well sometimes—"It made you, for instance, and then it made something very lovely"—yet he owns to a higher ideal. But now me, madam, me; nature never made such a thing as me!" However, this is a deviation from the course of the sublimer fop, who never argues or defends his position. He feels supreme. The fop's palmist days were over when Colman wrote. The country booby, the lout, the younger brother, outshines him on the later stage. Different from both comes Marplot, the meddlesome fool, who has given his name to a class invaluable on the stage, where they keep everything in movement and a bustle. The passion for knowing everybody's secret and meddling with everybody's affairs is essentially the quality of a fool, though it is not always a fool that is possessed by it. In the case of Marplot his blundering good-nature, his incapacity to take a hint, his deadness to the aspect of things around him, his self-opinion, incurable conceit, and insatiable curiosity are true enough to some people's nature. The hero and heroine of the Bury Body are plotting to outwit a surly, jealous guardian, Sir Francis, throughout the piece, every scheme at the moment of success being foiled by Marplot's friendly officiousness. On one occasion the lady is visited by her lover, and, hearing the guardian coming, she hides him behind the chimney-board. Marplot, possessed by some scheme of his own, sees nothing of the warning nods and frowns of Miranda, and frustrates all her efforts to get the old gentleman out of the way; who, unluckily for her, not to disorder her parlour, insists on throwing a piece of orange-peel behind the chimney-board. Driven to her wits' end, she cries, "Hold, hold, dear Gardy, I have a—a—a monkey shut up there; a monkey waiting for the man coming to tame it lest he break all my china." At the mention of a monkey Marplot's whole being is possessed by the idea. Sir Francis is taken in—"I won't open it; she shall have her monkey, poor rogue"; but Marplot's curiosity is all on fire; there is something for him to do; he can manage a monkey as well as anybody:—

MARPLOTT. A monkey, dear madam; let me see it. I can tame a monkey with the best of them all. Oh! how I love the little miniatures of man.

MIRANDA. Be quiet, mischief! and stand further from the chimney. You shall not see my monkey—why sure—MARPLOTT. For heaven's sake, dear madam, let me but peep, to see if it's as pretty as Lady Fiddle Fiddle's. Has he got a chain?

MIRANDA. Not yet, but I design it one shall last its lifetime. Nay, you shall not see it. Look, Gardy, how he teases me!

Sir Francis actually interferes in her favour, and forbids him to touch the chimney-board; but at this moment he is called out of the room, Miranda accompanies him, and, to make all safe, bids Marplot "Come along, impertinence!" But he sees his opportunity, steps back, lifts up the board, and surprised to see a man there, shouts out "Thieves!" and "Murder!" Out jumps Sir George:—

Hang ye, you unlucky dog! 'tis I, which way shall I get out? Show me instantly, or I'll cut your throat.

MARPLOTT. Undone, undone! At that door there. But hold, hold; break that china, and I'll bring you off.

[Re-enter Sir Francis, &c.]

SIR FRANCIS. Mercy on me! What's the matter?

MIRANDA. O, you toad, what have you done?

MARPLOTT. No great harm; longing to see the monkey, I did but just raise up the board, and it flew over my shoulder, scratched all my face, broke your china, and whisk'd out of the window.

The character of Paul Pry, we are told, was taken from a certain Mr. Thomas Hill described in one of Theodore Hook's novels. This gentleman was so delighted with his own portrait, that he would cry, "All true, every word correct!" Possibly Marplot may have had some recognized original equally pleased to be assigned to fame. We must continue our list of typical fools on some future occasion.

FRENCH DRUNKENNESS.

SINCE the termination of the war the French press has been significantly prolific in reports, articles, and pamphlets on the subject of drunkenness. The increase of this vice in France would indeed be an alarming phenomenon if it bore any proportion to the energy with which it is discussed by the literary and professional classes, or to their inventiveness in devising schemes to suppress it. It is not only by the press that this hostile activity is manifested. A Commission of the National Assembly has recently reported on the subject; it was dragged last year into the discussion on the Budget, and it has been repeatedly before the Academy of Medicine. To all appearance, therefore, this vice has found a congenial soil in France, and has developed with remarkable rapidity. It would almost appear as if that unhappy country was about to succumb before an alcoholic invasion more dire in its results than that of the Germans. It may be doubted, however, whether to an enlightened censor of the national morals this evil would appear of such magnitude as some others of which much less is heard. That which in a nation corresponds to conscience in the individual is influenced less by ethical than æsthetic considerations. It is in regard not to its biggest, but to its ugliest sins, that a nation is generally most demonstrative in its remorse and resolutions of amendment. The standard by which it judges them is one determined very much by their different relations to the national history and characteristics. In the present instance not only the vice itself, but certain accidental aggravations of it, render it peculiarly heinous in French eyes. Drunkenness is in France a non-historical vice. In the lower districts of Paris and in the manufacturing cities of the North it has indeed been always more or less endemic, but it is only within the present century that it has attained proportions which may be called national. It has no claim, therefore, upon the indulgence which a nation accords to its own traditional vices. Again, it has the disadvantage of being not only a young national vice in France, but an old one among some of her neighbours. Every one knows with how much less tolerance we regard other people's shortcomings than our own. Even after our neighbour's faults have become our own, it is some time before we can regard them in ourselves with less severity than in him. Further, drunkenness is a vice of nations whose type of culture is not greatly appreciated in France. The epithet which her writers not unfrequently use to denote that type is one implying the negation of all culture. Now every one accustomed to analyse his own mental states is aware that the bad qualities of a person whose general character he does not admire look much worse than the corresponding qualities of the friend whom he esteems. To this result of the unconscious association of ideas may be due some little part of the demonstrative antipathy of the cultivated classes of France to the vice of drunkenness. But apart altogether from these aggravating accidents, the vice itself is from its very nature liable to be regarded by a Frenchman of those classes with impatience and intolerance. A toper may be said to be the personification of everything which a Frenchman is not. Drunkenness, at least in its penultimate stage, is savageness, grossness, stolidity, loudness. It cannot co-exist with refinement, vivacity, brilliancy, esprit—in fact with any of the typical qualities of an educated Frenchman. To him, therefore, French drunkenness is hateful, not only as being a new national vice, but as being one incompatible with the ideal national character. In other countries drunkenness unmanly; in France it denationalizes. Allowance on these accounts must be made for unintentional exaggerations in French statements in regard to the spread of the evil in France. But even after such deductions have been made, the phenomenon of its prevalence in modern French society remains of a sufficiently startling character. No adequate explanation of it, so far as we have noticed, has yet been given. Indeed the French themselves, in their hot haste to prescribe all sorts of quack nostrums for the unsightly disease, have neglected sufficiently to study its etiology.

The remedies suggested are certainly numerous, enough. If the sanguine prescribers only saw them fairly tried, they would probably contemplate the result with the saddened feeling of the well-known physician who began practice knowing twenty remedies for every disease, and ended knowing twenty diseases for which he had no remedy. Of course several of the proposals are notable only for their sheer absurdity. Why is it, by the way, that under almost every ethnological and climatic condition the discussion of this subject is provocative of extravagance and fanaticism? It is noteworthy, however, that in some respects French spirituous fanaticism is less irrational than our corresponding home commodity. Among the multitude of projects for eradicating drunkenness we have not met with one solitary proposal to introduce into France the "platform" of the United Kingdom Alliance, or even that of what is known as Teetotalism. If the principle of the latter has not taken root in France, it is not because no attempt has been made to plant it. In 1836 an American apostle of the "cause," named Baird, was sent by the American Societies to convert to total abstinence the wine-bibbing Parisians. "Presented at the Tuilleries," says a writer in the Revue des Deux Mondes, "he explained the ideas and plans of the Society before an august audience, but without success. 'Since Providence has given us such good wines,' was the reply made to him, 'it must be good for us to make use of them.'" To ask a Frenchman to abjure wine was about as reasonable as to request an Englishman to forswear roast beef. But the question has recently been asked, whether it would not be possible to adopt in France the machinery of our so-called Temperance Societies, with a bond of organization more adapted to French needs than the formula of total abstinence. In a paper published in the current number of Annales d'Hygiène publique, M. Foville, a physician of some note, answers the question in the affirmative. The evil in France, he says, "does not consist in drinking at meals in ordinary quantities either wine, beer, or cider, but in the custom, more or less general for men of all conditions, and too often also for certain classes of females, to instil themselves in the intervals between meals in cabarets, dram-shops, and cafés, and there to drink without necessity. In a word, the real enemy is not wine—it is the cabaret and the café." To meet the evil thus circumscribed, he proposes the formation of a National League against alcohol, the members of which would simply be under pledge never to set foot within one of the obnoxious establishments. M. Foville sees clearly that our Temperance Societies confound the use of liquors with their abuse. But his own Association would obviously be open to the same radical objection. That some people make a bad use of public establishments for the sale of liquors is not a valid reason why other people should interdict themselves from making a proper use of them. This plan is also open to the serious objection that it would lead to over-drinking at home. But, whatever its demerits, the Association would seek to attain its object only by voluntary agencies. This feature of the proposal is really in these days something worth noting. M. Foville would endeavour to coax the patient to swallow his bolus, but he would not attempt to get it down by compulsory deglutition. This latter process he leaves to our British quacks.

It is, however, in framing schemes involving legislative action that French zealots find full scope for their inventive ingenuity. Turning to these we find ourselves amidst chimæras, crotchets, and crudities of all kinds. M. de la Sicotière, a member of the Legislative Assembly, proposes to put tavern debts on the same footing with gambling debts. This is a sane proposal by the side of one by a Dr. Prosper Despine, of Marseilles. This gentleman deplors that such a large portion of the soil of France should be polluted by wines, and suggests that the culture of the noxious plant should be interdicted by law. Seeing little chance, apparently, of the Assembly giving immediate effect to his sapient proposal, he points out a sure means of attaining the same end without troubling the Legislature. It is simply to encourage the propagation of the worms which at present destroy the roots of the vines. The ingenious author of this radical scheme might fairly claim for it the double merit that it would rid the French, not only of their vines, but also of their vanity. It is impossible to conceive that vanity could remain in a nation whose salvation had been effected by so humble and earthy an instrument. Of course it is in exactly the opposite direction to that indicated by this odd proposal that the efforts of sane reformers are pointed. They see clearly enough that the true policy is not to begin a crusade against wine, but to restore it to its ancient position as the national drink. Their motto is not "abstinence," but "rehabilitation." It is not the prevalence of the use of wine that is the thing to be dreaded, but the taste which is becoming general for more potent liquors, especially absinthe and brandy. We fear that this class are too sanguine in expecting much improvement from a readjustment of the fiscal duties on liquors. When a taste for strong stimulants has become common, fiscal measures can do little to eradicate it. Besides, human nature is so complex—or, as some would put it, so perverse—that it is not always easy to predict in what direction an ethico-fiscal measure will operate. "Remove the duties entirely from wine," urge the French reformers, "and place the heaviest possible imposts on distilled spirits." But are they quite certain that this arrangement would tend to promote the general use of the one and discourage that of the other? Is there no danger, in regard to the cheaper liquor, of evoking that familiarity which proverbially breeds contempt? or, in regard to the dearer, of causing a factitious demand by creating for it a kind of adventitious value? To place heavy burdens on a certain class of drinks with the avowed object of discouraging their use is to add another to the ordinary motives for consuming them. With many people there is no surer method of intensifying a pleasure than by proscribing it. Eve's desire to taste of the fruit of the tree of knowledge was born of the fact that the pleasure was a forbidden one. Fiscal adjustments might no doubt have a real moral significance were it possible to tax a commodity such as absinthe, for which there is a general demand, so highly as to put it out of common use. But the power to tax effectively is tempered by fraud. It is safe to say also that, even in the interests of temperance, France will not be in a position for some time to come to forego the duties on wine.

To another proposed legislative reform the temperance agitators attach considerable importance, though it is not easy to see on what grounds. They urge that there should be an alteration in the laws, so as to prevent the plea of drunkenness being accepted in excuse or extenuation of crime. Under the present penal code (Art. 64) the accused is held to be irresponsible if, at the time of committing the offence, he was in a state of dementia, "or constrained by a power he was unable to resist." If the fact is ignored that in the case of drunkards the state is self-induced, they may be often fairly described as fulfilling the conditions of legal irresponsibility. On the general question of the accountability of drunkards we cannot enter. It has been discussed with the most opposite conclusions by jurists from Quintilian downwards. Perhaps the most original theory was that held by a toddy-drinking Scotch judge of the last century. To a prisoner charged with an assault with violence, who urged the plea of drunkenness, he put the crushing question, "If you could do such an act when drunk, what would you not do when sober?" Unfortunately neither the facts nor the psychology of the subject will bear out the old gentleman's implied opinion that sobriety is more favourable to law-keeping than sobriety. We are not aware whether French judges and juries are so prone to give effect to the plea of drunkenness. But any alteration of the French laws in the direction of limiting or excluding it would not operate in diminishing drunkenness, though it might operate to some extent in diminishing crime. A knowledge of the inadmissibility of the plea might have some effect even on a drunkard in restraining him from crime; but it could hardly have any effect in preventing him from getting drunk. People do not often put themselves into a state of ebriety with a deliberate intention to commit crime when in it. But this and some other suggested changes in the law are intended by some of the Temperance enthusiasts as merely ancillary to a great measure of a directly repressive character. The Commission of the National Assembly have reported in favour of the principle of repression. They propose, in fact, to constitute drunkenness, or at least public drunkenness, a crime. Private drunkenness, they admit with reluctance, it would be impossible to reach; but it is quite possible, they think, to grapple with the vice as it exhibits itself in the street, the café, or other places of public resort. M. Roussel, a member of the Commission of the National Assembly, has published the draft of an elaborate measure which may be taken as a fairly typical specimen of the "repression" scheme. He proposes that any person found in a public road, in a place for the sale of liquors, or in any public place, in a state of drunkenness should be taken to the nearest poste de sûreté, and kept till he is sober; that for the first offence he should be summoned before the tribunal of simple police, and for subsequent offences before the Correctional tribunal, and be liable to punishment ranging from a fine of five francs to one of twenty-five francs, with twelve days' imprisonment. If found more than three times drunk in a year, more than five times in two years, or more than six times in a lifetime, he is to be included in a new criminal category—that of "habitual drunkards," and rendered subject, as in the case of ordinary criminals, to deprivation, partial or complete, of all "civil, civil, and family rights." It is clear that the French reformers mean to stamp out this new national evil—if they can.

There is an air of downrightness and simplicity about these schemes which one cannot help liking in a kind of way. It is, however, the simplicity produced by ignoring all views of a question but one. In dealing with a social evil it is the part of a zealot merely to look it straight in the face; it is the business of a statesman to look on all sides of it. We find in these proposals few indications that their authors have thought out the subject to even the more prominent of its theoretical relations, or traced out to their logical limit the full applications of their own principles. What is the proximate legal principle on which public drunkenness could be erected into a crime? Is it that the vice causes a public scandal? If the French intend to put down everything—in Paris, say—which may be classed in this category, they will have their hands full for some time to come. Most people will think that the crusade against scandals might have been more fitly begun in other directions. Or is it that the person found publicly drunk is in a state predisposing him to commit crime? No doubt he is in this condition, but so is the private drunkard, and in consistency, he too should be equally treated as an inchoate criminal. Again, if a person seen drunk in public is to be treated as a criminal, the tradesman who sold the drink, the companions who connived at his consuming it, even the host at whose too generous board he may have sat, should all be treated as accessory to the crime. Further, if public drunkenness, per se, were to come under the cognizance of the law, it would be necessary to formulate some workable definition of drunkenness. This definition would require to demarcate with some precision the boundary between sobriety and ebriety. An attempt to frame such a definition on ascertained physiological and psychological data would give an ardent reformer some idea of the difficulties of these schemes on the theoretical side. It needs no prophetic eye to foresee that they would be as inefficient in practice as they are untenable in theory. Repression, whether direct or indirect, can have very little influence in diminishing drunkenness. The reason is obvious. Any influence which could effectively act upon the vice must take into account the force of the vis à tergo which impels to it. It has long been known that its antecedents are ignorance, disease, poverty, home discomforts, and the like. To attempt to remove or diminish the evil by penal enactments is to begin at the wrong end. These simply add to the miseries which follow upon being drunk, whereas the proper course is to diminish the miseries of remaining sober. The experiment in indirect repression which Mr. Robertson Gladstone is at present making at Liverpool, by enforcing the full penalty exigible under the law, has not yet, we learn, sensibly diminished his weekly list of drunkards. Nor is it likely to do so. It may be questioned whether it would be a whit more successful if, in addition to the present statutory penalties, the magistrate had in his quiver the more appalling terrors of "deprivation of civil, civil, and family rights." We do not say that some impression might not be made on the extent of the evil if the penalties were made severe enough. Should the French, after vainly trying the comparatively milder class of correctives, including even the threefold deprivation just referred to, revert to the law of Francis I., which, among other disagreeable consequences to the drunkard, involved the deprivation of his ears, they might possibly have more success. But the question might fairly arise whether a person reclaimed from the vice at the expense of his ears, or by the fear of losing them, was, after all, worth reclaiming.

INCLOSURE.

THE Inclosure Commissioners report that their operations are suspended until Parliament shall determine on some distinct policy in reference to inclosures. The object, they say, of the General Inclosure Act was to bring into use that large portion of the waste land of the country which was capable of profitable cultivation or other improvement, but which, from the expense of procuring and carrying into effect private or local Acts of Parliament, was suffered to remain comparatively unproductive. The extent of waste land held in common was estimated at the time of the passing of the General Inclosure Act at 8,000,000 acres. In addition to common land there is also a considerable extent of "commonable" land—that is, land held in severalty for a portion of the year, upon which, after the summer crops are removed, certain rights of pasturage are exercised in common during the remainder of the year. These commonable lands have been supposed to amount to 2,000,000 acres, but there is no certain basis for this estimate. It is perhaps surprising that the Inclosure Commissioners should not possess more accurate information. They do not, however, venture further than to estimate the common and commonable lands of the whole country as having been somewhat over 9,000,000 acres at the time they commenced their operations; and as they know that 670,000 acres either have been, or are in course of being, inclosed, there remain still to be dealt with 8,000,000 acres and upwards, or more than one-fifth of the entire acreage of England and Wales.

It is not wonderful that these Commissioners continue to believe in the soundness of the policy which called them into existence. A large proportion of the commonable lands, which are situated chiefly in the lowland counties, would undoubtedly be susceptible of more profitable use after inclosure. It may be assumed as a moderate estimate that one million acres of common land might still be added to the productive area of agricultural land in England. The Commissioners regard the work which thus offers itself to their hands as one of unimixed utility. They observe that this is a country of limited extent, where mining and manufacturing industry, railway extension, and urban population are constantly pressing upon the narrow limits of the cultivated land. The addition of one million acres would be sensibly felt. It is more than has been won from the sea in three centuries and a half by the laborious industry of the Dutch, and would be nearly equivalent to one-tenth of all the land at present under crops in England, exclusive of grass. This would be an outlet for labour and an enlargement of cultivable country exactly the same as the addition of an equal extent of territory. It is impossible to dispute this reasoning of the Commissioners, but undeniably the economic view which they take of inclosures is opposed to another view of the subject which we will call, for want of a better word, sentimental. That which is done where the former view prevails is almost certain to be repented under the influence of the latter. A large tract of land which once was Hainault Forest has been cleared of picturesque timber and planted with corn and turnips. When this work was done, the doers of it considered themselves benefactors of their species; but a proposal to treat in the same way the adjoining Forest of Epping would now be almost universally condemned. There is something like a general agreement in the expediency of preserving commons and open spaces in the neighbourhood of large towns, but this extent of concession to the sentimental view will hardly be satisfactory to those who hold it. Take, for instance, the New Forest, of which the aspect has remained in many parts unchanged since the days of Rufus. The economists are very strong upon the inclosure of the New Forest, and they would obliterate in a few years that which has existed for many centuries. It would, however, be open to Parliament to say that the New Forest is a national property which shall be preserved in its present state as a picturesque memorial of old England. But suppose the New Forest to be rescued from the economists on account of its special character, they may urge that there are many commons which are not near any great town, and are not picturesque, while they must be unwholesome and unprofitable so long as they remain undrained and uninclosed.

Among the cases in which the Commissioners have reported that inclosure is expedient is that of Wolstanton Marsh, in Staffordshire, containing thirty-one acres. It is distant one mile from Newcastle-under-Lyne, one mile and a-half from Burslem, two miles and a-half from Hanley, and three miles from Stoke. The aggregate population of these four towns is upwards of 213,000, and this marsh in its present condition is a nuisance instead of a benefit to the locality. The Commissioners propose to appropriate six acres of this marsh for commonage, and four acres for gardens for the labouring poor, leaving the remaining twenty-one acres for division between the land of the manor and the commons. They say that at present the land is wet, the turf is pealed, and the soil is completely taken away; the pits and open drains, being neglected for refuse, are breeding places of fever, ague, and rheumatism complaints. The inclosure is expedient, because as it would put an end to these evils. The Commissioners are certainly correct in holding that six acres of drained and well-cultivated land would be a benefit to the neighbourhood, whereas the present state of the marsh is a nuisance. But it is a serious consideration whether the whole marsh should not be appropriated for the advantage of the large towns which surround it, making of course adequate compensation to those whose rights which the Commissioners would recognise if they proceeded to inclose according to the rule which has hitherto guided them. This is the sort of case which seems to call for the application of a different principle from that on which extensive commons in agricultural districts have been inclosed. We may compare it with the case of certain waste lands of the manor of Gladestry and Colva, in the county of Radnor, containing about 3,000 acres. The population of Gladestry is 350, and that of Colva is 185, and their employment is agricultural. The town of Kington, with a population of 3,000, is five or six miles distant. An allotment of four acres is proposed to be made for the purpose of exercise and recreation. The site fixed upon is on a steep hill commanding a beautiful view. An allotment of six acres for garden ground for cottages is thought by the Commissioners to be sufficient, and probably they are right. It is useless to offer to a labourer more garden ground than he has time to cultivate, or to expect him to cultivate a plot of ground at a great distance from his dwelling. As regards the recreation ground on a steep hill, it may be doubted whether a labourer after his day's work would care to ascend it for the sake of the most beautiful view in England or Wales; but at any rate it can do no harm. It is anticipated that the productiveness of the land will be increased by this inclosure of nearly three thousand acres, and the question is whether Parliament will allow the Commissioners to proceed with it. There are several other cases of the same kind, and they all appear suitable for the application of the principle on which the Commission was established, unless indeed that principle is to be wholly set aside. "In this, as in other civilized countries," say the Commissioners, "it has hitherto been held meritorious to increase the fertile area of the soil." We hear so much of improved methods of cultivation that the object of enlarging the breadth of land to which they may be applied can scarcely be unimportant.

By the Metropolitan Commons Act no "common" or "commonable" land within the area of the Metropolitan Police district can now be inclosed—that is, divided and allotted in severalty—under the General Inclosure Act of 1845. It has been proposed to adopt the same policy with reference to uninclosed lands within certain distances of towns with large populations. It is advisable in the public interest to guard against such populations being hemmed in by injudicious inclosures; but it should also be remembered that in some cases it will occur that the population is now hampered, and that the interests of the town are injuriously affected, by the proximity of common lands, which, not being private property, cannot be sold or dealt with for building and other purposes. Indeed, this observation is applicable to the neighbourhood of the metropolis, where large tracts of land which once were common have been appropriated for building, to the great benefit, as we take leave to say, of the inhabitants. Possibly this process has for the present been carried far enough, and it may be desirable to preserve existing open spaces from being further occupied by suburban villas. Yet if a demand for houses arises it must be supplied, and the sale by lords of manors of portions of their wastes for building would compensate them for the prohibition to exclude the public from the remainder. It must always be remembered that the lord of a manor is, in the eye of the law, owner of the soil of the waste lands belonging to it, and it can hardly be that a legal right is to be taken away without compensation because it happens to exist in the neighbourhood of a large town. The discussion of this subject in Parliament will probably result in the establishment of some equitable principle for the adjustment of conflicting rights or claims. But beyond the line which may be thought necessary for preserving in perpetuity sufficient open spaces for fresh air, exercise, and recreation, it must be advantageous to the country socially, economically, and financially, that every acre of its cultivable soil should be rendered as productive as possible. We do not think, therefore, that the principle on which the General Inclosure Act was founded ought to be hastily abandoned. But at the same time it is satisfactory to know that there will long exist in the more mountainous districts of this country extensive wastes too poor in quality for any purposes of agricultural improvement. When the Inclosure Commissioners have done their best or worst, there will still remain at least one-sixth of the entire area of England and Wales as free to public enjoyment as it has ever been.

THE TRADESMEN AND THE CLERGY.

IT is natural that the shopkeepers should feel aggrieved at the success of the co-operative movement, and that they should make a stout fight to recover the customers who have deserted them. It is no complaint to be made of them to be assured that if they have anything to complain of they have brought it on themselves, and that the Civil Service and other Co-operative Associations have only been started in self-defence, in order to protect the citizens who deal with them from the remorseless exactions and persistent ill-usage of retail tradesmen. The ordinary householder belongs to a long-suffering race, but his patience has at last been exhausted, and in sheer desperation he has been driven to set up shop for himself. Nobody would go to a co-operative store, which is usually at a considerable distance from his residence, if he could get what he wanted on reasonable terms at a shop close at hand. There are many respects in which a tradesman might compete vigorously and legitimately with the co-operative enterprise, and yet without being in any way prejudicial to its estimate of the relative merits of stock purveyors that he would be certain to regain more than he has lost if he would only study the convenience of customers and supply them with good articles on fair terms. We are afraid, however, that the tactics which the tradesmen are now pursuing are calculated to injure rather than to serve their cause. It will be found that menaces and entreaties are alike unavailing to induce the public to go to a dear shop instead of a cheap shop, and to put up with inferior goods at a high price, when they can procure goods of a superior quality at a lower price. If it is a delusion that it is more profitable to deal at a Civil Service warehouse than at an ordinary retail shop, by all means let the delusion be exploded; but if this is not a delusion but a fact, all the whining and bullying in the world will not save the shopkeepers from their inevitable fate. When the beggar wound up an appeal to Talleyrand for alms by the declaration that "a man must live," the diplomatist replied that he did not see the necessity. In this country we are in the habit of holding that absolute destitution carries with it a claim for relief, and the Poor-law stands between a pauper and starvation. But we have not yet got the length of admitting that, because a man chooses to open a shop, all the inhabitants of the neighbourhood are therefore bound to lay themselves under contribution in order to enable him to make a comfortable livelihood. If this principle is to be established for the benefit of tradesmen, it must be carried a little further. If it is the duty of professional men to support the tradesmen on their own terms, then the tradesmen must return the compliment. There are not a few persons who have taken chambers in the Temple, or who have gone to the expense of red lamps and brass plates in the suburbs, who will probably have no objection to a fair reciprocal arrangement of this nature. We are under the impression that it is some time since the shopkeepers discovered the advantage of applying the co-operative principle to legal expenses. If a man sets up as a doctor or a lawyer, he has to take his chance of getting patients or clients; and if they will not come to him, but prefer to go to a cheaper practitioner, he has no alternative but to give up medicine or law, as the case may be, and try to get a living in some other way. We can imagine how the shopkeepers would look, and what they would say, if he sent them a threatening letter because they did not provide him with employment and pay such fees as he chose to demand.

We are afraid that the retail tradesmen, who are not very wise themselves, are just now acting under the guidance of others who have still less pretensions to that quality. They must surely have discovered by this time that they only made a laughing-stock of themselves by going to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to complain that Civil Service clerks endeavour to turn their moderate incomes to the best account by clubbing together to purchase goods in large quantities at ready-money prices, and by thus saving the cost of a number of middle-men and the heavy percentage which is added to the actual value of all wares by the compound operation of the credit system. If the civil servants had not discovered this means of making their money go a little further than it used to do, one result might have been a demand for an increase of salaries at the expense of the public. It is a mistake to suppose that civil servants are paid by the State in order that they may spend their wages at retail shops; they are paid in order to do certain kinds of work, and if it can be shown either that any of the work is superfluous, or that more clerks are employed to do it than are really required, or that the clerks are paid too highly in proportion to the market value of their services, Mr. Lowe, we are sure, will be very glad to hear of it, and he may be trusted to do what is necessary if he finds that there is any ground for these representations. It appears that an attempt has also been made to persuade the Directors of the Bank of England to coerce their clerks into devoting their earnings to the support of retail tradesmen. There is a tradition that the Directors of that institution once passed a law against monastiches during business hours, and we have some recollection of another set of Bank Directors issuing a foolish and futile decree against improvident marriages on the part of their clerks. But on the present occasion the freedom of the clerks to buy their provisions where they please was fully recognized; and the silly person who introduced the question took nothing by his motion. It is evident that a certain section of the shopkeeping community is pretty much in that state of mind which is associated with "ratting" and warning letters signed by "Mary Anne." A missive of this character has in fact already been circulated among the clergy of the Church of England. It purports to be written by "A Tradesman," but it bears the counter-signature of "Arthur A. Beckett," and is stated to be issued by order of the Committee of an Association which calls itself the "National Chamber of Trade," and of which Mr. A. Beckett would seem to be Secretary. The "Tradesman" professes to have a profound respect for the clergy and great confidence in the soundness both of their heads and hearts, and he is anxious that it should be understood that he disclaims "entirely any and every notion of a threat"; only he feels bound to warn the clergy, as a friend, that if they persist in buying goods at Civil Service Stores they will "produce bitter and un-Christian feelings," and must expect to suffer for it. It is not explained how these bitter and un-Christian feelings will take effect, but the drift of the communication appears to be, that if the clergy go astray after strange Co-operative Stores, they must not be surprised if the shopkeepers join the Liberation Society. It may be admitted that they could hardly find a more appropriate means of giving vent to "bitter and un-Christian animosity."

The "Tradesman" argues that the Co-operative Associations are unfair, because they are "organized for the deliberate purpose of taking away the business, the very means of livelihood, from a large and respectable class of responsible and hard-working men." But, in point of fact, these associations are established, not with a view to injure any one, but in order to increase the resources of "a large and respectable class of responsible and hard-working men," who are thus enabled to make a better provision for their families, and also to furnish well-paid employment to a largest staff of clerks and warehousemen. It must not be forgotten that there are grocers, haberdashers, &c., in the Co-operative Stores as well as in the retail shops; and if the stores were to be shut up, not only would the classes who now deal there be injured, but a large body of assistants would be deprived of a livelihood. Moreover, there are many retail tradesmen who are affiliated to the stores; so that even all the shopkeepers are not on one side. The "Tradesman" goes on to show what constitutes the special unfairness of the Co-operative Stores; but his feelings are somewhat too much for him, and after a few gasps he becomes ungrammatical and incoherent. As far as we can make out, however, the following crimes are alleged against the co-operative people. They give no credit, they deliver no goods, they do not provide attractive premises; they are patronized by large numbers of the clergy and gentry, and even by members of the aristocracy. The obvious conclusion to be drawn from this indictment is, that shopkeepers who do not waste their resources in credit and flashy premises, and who separate the charge for goods from the charge for the carriage of goods, give great satisfaction to all classes. The wonder is that the "Tradesman" should not see this, and advise his fellows to go and do likewise. The truth is, the main difference between the co-operative shops and other shops is simply that the former place all their customers on an honest equality by insisting upon ready-money payments, and further by having a fixed price for every article, which can be at once ascertained by reference to the list of prices which is issued periodically. And these advantages are esteemed so highly that people are willing for the sake of them to go a long way to the stores, and to wait in a crowd, and to lose a great many little attentions which would probably be paid to them in an ordinary shop. If the shopkeepers would only do business on the same principles, they would find that customers would be delighted to come to them. The "Tradesman" seems to think he has made a good shot at the clergy when he says that "the temptation to buy cheaply assails very successfully a large and important section of society"; but we imagine that the "Tradesman" and his friends are also in the habit of buying in the cheapest market, as well as of selling their goods at as high a price as they think they can get for them. Why should a clergyman hand over to a shopkeeper the savings which he would otherwise be able to apply to the education of his children, or perhaps to the relief of the poor and sick? Why, for example, should a clergyman who can buy arrowroot at one shilling a pound, pay two or three times as much for it to a shopkeeper, and thus reduce the quantity at his disposal for distribution among the poor? Nobody desires to do any harm to the shopkeepers, but there are some other people in the world who also deserve consideration, and if the shopkeepers persist in doing business in a perverse and foolish manner, they must take the consequences.

FORGIVEN.

THOSE who object to Mr. Albery's play as too long ought to remember that it occupies the evening as well as any substitute that is easily available. But as a work of art it is undeniably faulty in construction, and some of the characters are made to utter speeches which cannot without protest be allowed to pass for comedy. The peer and the gardener who have served together as officer and private soldier at Waterloo need not, we think, have searched so far back in history for a pretext for introducing those interesting relics, the sabre and the snuff-box. One cannot but feel compassion for the actor—a veteran of the stage, if not of the army—on whom the author has imposed the absurd duty of performing the sword-exercise in front of his cottage with the sabre which he had carried at Waterloo. We would suggest that, as the opening of this play is not particularly lively, the gardener's daughter might avail herself of the introduction of this formidable weapon to sing "Le sabre de mon père" while executing the movements of attack and defence for which the limbs of her valiant and venerable parent must be almost too stiff. Considering that both the peer and the gardener must be older than the century, it would seem that the other relic of Waterloo, which is a snuff-box indented by a bullet, is likely to be more useful to them than the sword. But in the interest of spectators it is to be observed that the sword is brought out once and taken away, whereas the peer demands a pinch of the gardener's snuff with such exasperating iteration as to enable us when the curtain falls to assure our French friends that Waterloo is fully avenged at last.

The gardener's daughter marries Claude Redruth the painter, who neglects his young and pretty wife, and thereby disturbs the equality of her father. But when his emotion is noticed, he explains that it is "new bread" which troubles him. We should like the critics who approve this play to explain to us whether this is comedy, or farce, or mere stupidity. It is true that an author is not responsible for every silly speech that actors choose to utter in the course of performing a play which is nominally his. Mr. Toole, for example, performs parts in plays by various authors, and it is improbable that they have all agreed in making this actor state in different characters and under different circumstances that he is not happy. Mr. Toole, however, is a chartered libertine. People go to the theatre where he acts to see, not "a new and original comedy," but simply to see Mr. Toole. But when a manager announces that he aims at something higher than other managers, we are entitled to complain if he falls lower. The manager of the Globe Theatre appears to have engaged in a laudable attempt to produce something like the comedies of the late Mr. Robertson, and probably he could not find a more competent assistant in such an undertaking than Mr. Albery. But although Mr. Robertson often wrote very poor stuff, he was never vulgar; and we do not think that he could either have himself introduced or endured the interpolation of such an outrage on good taste as this mention of "new bread." Considering that this play begins with one wedding and ends with another, there would have been perhaps more pertinence in mentioning "plum-cake" as the pretended cause of the horticultural hero's discomposure. We are favoured in the last act with a view of a breakfast-table upon which is a wedding-cake, and one of the characters makes it the occasion of a remark which we should fear might be discouraging to persons about to marry. The effect of the remark is that as a wedding-cake is white outside and dark within, so married life often presents a bright exterior where there is a miserable home. We must say that that venerable institution, wedding-cake, is rather harshly treated by the author in his desire for epigrammatic smartness. The inside of a cake is at any rate less unwholesome than the outside, and although the joy which attends a wedding may be factitious and conventional, it may nevertheless be the beginning of a life of real, although sober, happiness. There is, however, a certain propriety in the use of this comparison by Rose Cudlipp, because her husband, the artist, with his good looks and slightly foppish manner, resembles the ornamental exterior of a cake, while his conduct has produced on her father an effect similar to that of the interior when eaten in too large quantity. This artist, as played by Mr. Montague, seems to care much more for himself than for his wife or any other woman, and his frequent changes of dress, although justified or perhaps required by changes of time and place, leave an impression that man-millinery is a principal element in the character. Taking the three parts of Claude Redruth, Rose Cudlipp who becomes his wife, and Lady Maude who disturbs their domestic happiness, and looking at them from the point of view of the clothes-philosophy of Mr. Carlyle, we have to remark that the first dresses above, the second on a level with, and the third decidedly below, their respective circumstances. Perhaps, like the young ladies in Middlemarch, Lady Maude, being well born, might claim the privilege to be plainly dressed, and we suppose that in the last scene the idea of penitence is meant to be conveyed by a gown of Quaker-like simplicity. Still the impression which the tailoring arrangements of the whole play make is that the display of the personal graces of the unstable painter was their leading object. The title of the play is Forgiven, and the moral, we suppose, is that such a good-looking man, so nicely dressed, ought by a woman to be forgiven everything. But the final tableau, where Rose and Claude strike an attitude and embrace, does not excite any great enthusiasm among the audience, who perhaps have not quite made up their minds upon the question whether an erring husband ought to be more readily forgiven because he comes home in knickerbockers.

It is really touching to observe the eagerness of the public to recognize and reward any moderately successful effort to amuse it. A play by Mr. Hyron which immediately preceded Forgiven, and which we hope is by this time forgotten, was performed to full houses for 130 nights, although it was one of the most flimsy of this author's fabrics. To judge from present appearances, Mr. Albery is likely to be equally successful in bringing prosperity to the Globe Theatre, which certainly we should view with ungrudging eyes. In one respect he has improved upon the later plays of Mr. Robertson, in which eating and drinking were brought into undue prominence. A pretence is made at cutting up the bride-cake already mentioned, but nobody even pretends to eat it, and there is no other feeding-time in the play. But, on the other hand, smoking is introduced in this, as in almost every other modern play; and without going the length of inquiring, as some writers have done, what is the use of Mr. Richard Fallow, we may be permitted to ask what is the use of Mr. Richard Fallow's pipe, which can scarcely be considered ornamental? We wonder whether the people who object to smoking in railway carriages go to theatres, and, if so, whether they like what they find there? Perhaps in dearth of other novelties to attract a manager's purpose to advertise that at his theatre smoking would be permitted upon the stage. We should be disposed to view this practice with some leniency, as a substitute for the use of the snuff-box which was so valuable to comedians of both sexes in the last century; but Mr. Albery has availed himself in this play both of snuff and tobacco, and this is perhaps a dangerous prodigality of dramatic resources which are by no means inexhaustible. It is the fashion to call such plays as this "satirical," and we have perhaps discovered the true reason of the success of the same moment that we observed that pipes are introduced into them. There is, indeed, this difference between the modern and the ancient idyl, that in the latter the pipe is not a mere prop for the gratification of a hobby, and in the former it is a symbol of the same idea which a snuff-box represents by the same means.

pressed adversely by the term "cup-and-saucer comedies," which has been applied to the works of Mr. Robertson and Mr. Albery. The truth, whether politely or harshly spoken, is that the genuine dramatic product of the age is a puny, although not unwholesome, plant. The crop is small and poor, in spite of the encouragement which is offered by two worlds for diligent cultivation. It is curious to observe that Mr. Robertson's plays are almost as popular in America as in England, although we should think that Ours, with its picnicking business in the Crimea, could only be endurable by an intensely patriotic audience. An inspection of the theatrical advertisements of New York may suggest a doubt whether America has any dramatic literature at all. We seem to discover in the lowest deep a lower deep of literary destitution if we imagine an American dramatist setting to work without any Court or aristocracy to build upon. Mr. Albery's play is founded on a poem of Mr. Tennyson's, which supposes nobility, which depends on monarchy. Such a play, therefore, would have been impossible in America. We really hope that Sir Charles Dilke will consider this, and will pause before he resolves to sweep away all dramatic possibilities. Readers of Mr. Forster's Life of Dickens will have been struck by the evidence which it affords of the dulness, in an English point of view, of American society. The same inference may be drawn from the eagerness of American newspapers to import European news. It appears to us to be clear that monarchy and aristocracy are worth preserving for dramatic purposes, if for nothing else. The character of Claude Redruth the painter could not be adequately developed unless he could be placed between the haughty Lady Maude and the gentle Rose.

REVIEWS.

FRIEDRICH'S DIARY OF THE COUNCIL.

THIS Diary of Dr. Friedrich has an historical as well as a personal interest. It goes over much of the same ground as the Letters of Quirinus, to which the author is reputed to have been a contributor, but with the more minute filling in of details which belongs to a private journal written from day to day, and evidently published as it was written. In some cases, as is natural, names and particular circumstances, only revealed in confidence, have to be suppressed; but if this necessity detracts somewhat from the completeness of the narrative, it does little to mar its general interest. The Diary is written throughout currente calamo, with the freedom and vivid distinctness of a keen observer engaged in jotting down the experiences and impressions of the hour, though its publication is no doubt intended also to serve an ulterior purpose, which may be gathered from the closing words of the preface:—"We too are contending for the authority of the true and genuine Councils and their decrees, for the tradition of the holy Fathers against Papal mandates, issued at what our bishops themselves in Rome described as a pseudo-Council." A narrative must inevitably be more or less coloured by the feelings and convictions of the author, especially where, as in this case, the situation is a critical one, and the sentiments it evokes are of a very emphatic kind. But there is a transparent freshness and simplicity about Dr. Friedrich's manner of writing which excludes all suspicion of disingenuous special pleading; and, indeed, in a work appearing with the author's name within a year of the events related, and when nearly all the actors are still in a position to challenge its accuracy, such an attempt would be hardly conceivable. Nor was Dr. Friedrich's an unknown name in Germany before. He is a man of about thirty-five, and had for several years been a distinguished member of the Theological Faculty at Munich. When Dr. Döllinger's letter requesting him to undertake the important office of theologian to Cardinal Hohenlohe, brother of the then Bavarian Premier, reached him, he was busily employed in studying from manuscripts on the spot the history of the Council of Trent. To suppose that all the so-called "theologians" (or official counsellors), of whom every bishop brings one to a Council, were equally qualified for their post would be a great mistake. The Archbishop of Munich, for instance, took his own secretary, who admitted that he had studied nothing beyond ephemeral literature, and had no acquaintance with original authorities. And when Friedrich spoke to him of the importance of such studies for the bishops and their advisers, he replied, "You know little of the bishops if you suppose they study anything as you would wish it studied." Even a very learned man, like Dr. Hipler, theologian to Bishop Klementz of Ermland, had made no special study of the infallibility question, as no sort of intimation had been given to the bishops of what subjects were to be discussed in the Council; indeed the reports current as to this particular matter had been to the last officially contradicted. And such jealousy of the presence of men of mark was felt among the dominant party that, at the station at Munich, an attendant of the Archbishop of Bamberg's asked Dr. Friedrich if he was going to Rome as a spy? His subsequent experiences on the road were curious enough, but we cannot dwell upon them here. He found that the farther south he travelled the less the clergy were respected, and a Prussian nobleman told him that the clergy, both Catholic and Protestant, were not so much looked up to anywhere else as in Germany. Hatred of the Jesuits he found very general, and he was actually cautioned against the danger of being poisoned by them at Rome, by a scholar, who observed that "it was well Döllinger was not going there, as he might never return." The landlord of his hotel at Trent replied to an inquirer that he was certainly a clergyman of some sort, but whether Catholic or Protestant he could not tell; "he had only seen him say mass in the German church."

Dr. Friedrich reached Rome on December 2, a week before the opening of the Council. His knowledge of books was far wider than his knowledge of men or public affairs, and he was only gradually undeceived as to the real state of things in the Church. But his mental development, as he tells us, made gigantic strides at Rome, and from a very early period he ceased to have any confidence in the stability or straightforwardness of the Opposition, and felt sure that the programme of the Curia would be carried out to the bitter end. The wording of the first official draft of the Conciliar regulations, combined with a little acquaintance with "the Roman atmosphere, and the origin, development, and grounds of the infallibilist theory," supplied matter for grave suspicion; and the notorious design of carrying the dogma by "acclamation," openly proclaimed in the Civiltà Cattolica, confirmed it. The persistent resolve, in defiance of precedent, to exclude Catholic Governments from all participation in the Council was significant, and the minority, who were always looking out elsewhere for the help they could not find in themselves, felt sensibly their disappointment of any such external support. As soon as the Council was opened, the evidences of everything being prearranged for a foregone conclusion rapidly multiplied. The well-known acoustic defects of the Council Hall; the almost entire exclusion of the minority from the various Commissions; the prohibition of extra conciliar meetings of bishops; the stringent control of the press; and the peremptory order to Theiner to allow no one even to see the Regulations of the Council of Trent, which presented a glaring contrast to the first, and still more to the second, Order of Business imposed on the Vatican Synod—to say nothing of the scandalous outrage on the Chaldean Patriarch, and the strange utterances of the Pope on all sorts of occasions, as when he called the Munich Faculty of Theology "heretical"—were but a few of the signs that could hardly be misinterpreted. What respect was felt for the "holy Vatican Council" by the higher powers themselves, who thought it a serviceable instrument for inflicting a new creed on the masses, may be inferred from their presenting "a wretched patchwork" compiled by two Jesuits, Franzolin and Schrader as the original draft of the Schema de fide, and entrusting the revision after the rough handling it received in the course of debate to another Jesuit, Kleutgen, who had actually been imprisoned for criminal offences by the Holy Office. So again, to take a different illustration of the same supercilious treatment, Antonelli commanded all the bishops lodged in the Quirinal, twelve in number, to attend the baptism of a child of the ex-Duke of Parma on a morning fixed for a Session of the Council. Already, before the end of December, Dr. Friedrich had observed on a remark of the Allgemeine Zeitung that, instead of a "Synod of Robbers," like that of Ephesus, this would be a Synod of Sycophants, "It will be both in one." "Count L." said he felt ashamed of being a Catholic priest when he saw a Council treated like a comedy, and the Opposition complained bitterly of being "treated like slunkies;" but they took their snubbing too meekly to excite any very profound sympathy or respect. Many of them in fact "had never broken with their Ultramontane antecedents, and only wanted to present an appearance of opposition which might tell in their favour at home." Forster (of Breslau) "was a Jesuit in act, if in words one of the Opposition." Ketteler, who professed to lead them, never seemed to know his own mind from one day to another, and was always, so to speak, trying to hedge, and he was living in the (Jesuit) German College. Haynald, who complained that at this Council there were "matriarchs instead of patriarchs," had a Jesuit "theologian." Hauser from the first betrayed signs of weakness, and while bitterly denouncing the new dogma in private, could only reply, when asked what he would do if it was after all carried, "Ah, that I really don't know." Most of them knew little of the subject in debate, and there were no available resources for studying it; for books and manuscripts cannot be taken away from the libraries at Rome, and there are hardly any modern theological works, except by Italians, to be found there. Hefele, who has since succumbed, said that he had studied Church history for thirty years, and could discover no trace of Papal infallibility in the early ages. Döllinger was felt all along to be standing behind the Opposition, and Cardinal Bizzarri, who judged of him from what he saw of his professed followers, expressed regret that he had not been summoned to Rome, "for then he could have been won over to become an advocate of the Curia." With this estimate of the Opposition as a parcel of naughty children, it is perhaps not wonderful to hear of Cardinal Barnabo soundly rating the Oriental missionary and bishops for "eating the Pope's bread and resisting his will," and threatening to enforce obedience on them.

The theological standard of the majority may be inferred from a remark made to Friedrich by the Canon De Angelis on Graty's pamphlets, that they "required an answer"; but when asked if he knew how to answer them, he said "No, but it is clear to me some answer must be given." (Of course none was attempted. Still more characteristic was the proposal, seriously entertained, of trying to devise some formula which might cover the infallibility of all future Popes without clashing with history by asserting the infallibility of their predecessors. When Schwarzenberg ventured to remonstrate against the expediency of the definition to the Pope, he called him (in reference to a Christmas observance at Rome) "the sub-deacon in the stable"—namely, a donkey, and replied that the Cardinal had made similar remonstrances against the definition of the Immaculate Conception, but they were signally refuted by the fact of its being pronounced on a morning when the sun shone with peculiar brilliancy. No wonder that "some high dignitaries thought Pius was not quite in his right mind." For independence and moral courage there was not much, in truth, to choose between the two rival parties. Hefele compared the majority to a bull rushing at a red handkerchief, and the minority was described by one of themselves as "just like a boy on a rocking-horse, brandishing a wooden sword, and thinking himself a great hero, while never moving from the same spot." They were always for waiting, and they waited, as Dr. Friedrich prophesied they would, "till the yoke was fixed firmly on their necks." Yet the more they yielded, the less excuse of ignorance could they plead for their weakness. One archbishop, who had only been converted from infallibilism since coming to Rome, offered a thousand pounds reward to any one who would produce a single testimony to Papal infallibility from the ancient Church. One passage was presented to him, but it turned out to be spurious. The decisive step which alone would have given practical effect to their protests the minority always shrank from taking when it came to the point, and that was to break off all connexion with the Council till their demands were complied with; they forgot that even Bellarmine teaches the duty of resisting the Pope when the interests of the Church are in jeopardy. Some few of them probably, like Darboy, agreed with the liberal Benedictines of Monte Cassino, who "thought it would be a misfortune for the Church if the majority did not carry their point, for it would only defer a crisis which had now become inevitable for the welfare of the Church." One bishop alone never faltered, and that was Strossmayer; but he was not supported by the rest. Dr. Friedrich gives a graphic description of the famous scene in Council, which Ultramontane journalists and prelates have so vehemently denied, and which led the Prussian military bishop to observe that in Germany an assembly of shoemakers would have known better how to behave. Thrice Strossmayer protested with uplifted hands against this violent interruption, but he was rung down by the Legate's bell, while the majority shook their fists in his face, and screamed at the top of their voices, "Nos omnes te damnamus." One voice only was heard to reply "Ego te non damno." It was Bishop Placo of Marseilles who spoke.

It is true certainly that the opponents of the Curia had not a pleasant life of it at Rome. Dr. Dressel, a friend of the author's, was summoned before the police, and ordered to leave the city, on the mere suspicion of being associated with him in writing the articles in the Allgemeine Zeitung, and he himself was threatened with a similar fate; Strossmayer's theologian was brought before the Inquisition and reprimanded; Roman clerics openly boasted that the Opposition was to be suppressed by measures of police, and were not slow to supplement force by calumny, saying that "it was high time for the German bishops to return home to their mistresses." "Calumniare audacter" became a recognized rule of action. Two Oriental bishops of the minority were imprisoned by the Inquisition, and the system of espionage recalled the Rome of Juvenal's days—"cum plena et litura multo delatore forent." A Papal officer stated that "out of fifty persons fifteen were spies," and he enumerated among them a marquis, a shoemaker, and some porters. Whole bundles of letters and books were detained at the Post Office, "that the minds of the Fathers might not be distracted" by receiving them. But from the first Dr. Friedrich had a clear view, and made no secret of it. He declared that he never could or would recognize the Council as Ecumenical, that all the so-called General Councils of the middle ages were in fact only Western Synods, and that decrees drawn up in the form of a Papal Constitution could not be Ecumenical. He was quite aware that persevering opposition might end in schism, and said that, "if Rome and the majority forced the necessity on them, they must accept it"; he did not feel equal to "converting all Church history into a vast system of lies," and he could not regard the Greeks as heretics for repudiating Curialism. Nor did the visible results of the Papal regime appear more lovely in his eyes on closer acquaintance during several months' residence in Rome. Neither the piety nor the morale of the place impressed him favourably. The habitual chattering and promenading in St. Peter's, the gaping irreverence at the Holy Week Communion, and the polka tunes played on the organs during mass, were very unedifying novelties to a German ecclesiastic; and there was worse behind. "Heathenism never surpassed modern Rome." The tribes of monks had a loathsome appearance, and the Archbishop of Munich complained that, with one solitary exception, he had not found a single edifying convent in Rome. It seemed open to question, under existing circumstances, whether the rule of celibacy ought to be maintained. Bishop Dinkel of Augsburg actually thought a certain kind of concubinage admissible, and Bishop Martin of Paderborn—a strong infallibilist—had received favourably several applications from Protestant pastors who were willing to conform to the Church if marriage of the clergy and the chalice for the laity were conceded. It was the prevailing view, Dr. Friedrich tells us, in Rome, and even in the Roman Inquisition, that Protestants lead a more moral life than Catholics, and it is certainly startling to be told that, under the rule of Pius IX., "a Homage of Morale in Rome kept a brothel for priests." Then, again, it was strange to find Rome, which claims to be the teacher of pure doctrine and morality to mankind, alone of all States encouraging and making capital out of a public lottery, where the tickets were drawn in presence of a purple-robed monsignor, by a boy in a soutane holding a crucifix in his hand. And, mixed up with this odd compound of religion and morality, there was a "Pius-cult, which becomes actual blasphemy, or rather idolatry," and which the author describes with a startling minuteness of detail, into which we will not shock our readers' feelings by following him. There are many other interesting matters touched on in the Diary, which want of space compels us to pass over; nor can extracts or abridgments give any adequate idea of a work necessarily written in a desultory style, where the impression mainly depends on a succession of varied and minute touches. Those who read German will find it abundantly worth their while to examine it for themselves, as well for the light it throws on the secret history of the Council as for the incidental revelations of the character of various personages prominent on both sides in the present conflict within the Catholic pale. The last two sections are, however, too characteristic to be passed over, and with a brief notice of them we must conclude our review of this unique and very suggestive volume.

On the 13th of May Dr. Friedrich went to take leave of the Archbishop of Munich before quitting Rome. "How happy I should be if I could go with you" was the Archbishop's first remark, and he then sent an imploring message to Dr. Döllinger to beg him to keep quiet, as he would only augment their difficulties, adding that "he (the Archbishop) had always, even in his last audience, stood up for Döllinger, and had not yielded at all"; and then he entreated Friedrich to use all his influence with Cardinal Hohenlohe to vote non placet in the Solemn Session; "for if a Roman Cardinal has the courage to say non placet, it will be easier for the bishops to do so." The next and last entry in the diary is two months later, under date of "Munich, 21 July, 1870." The Archbishop had reached Munich at midnight on the 19th, and on that morning the Theological Faculty were summoned to his palace, with Dr. Döllinger at their head. After greetings on each side, there was a short pause, and then the Archbishop said, "Roma locuta est—gentlemen, you know what follows. We can but submit." Döllinger's face spoke volumes, but the Archbishop proceeded to recount in his own fashion, and much as the story is told in Quirinus, the last moves of the Opposition, the counter-move of the infallibilist leaders, the manœuvring of the Pope, and the final result. At last he turned to Döllinger, and said, "Are we then to begin again to labour for the holy Church?" Döllinger replied in his peculiarly sharp manner, "Yes, for the old Church." The Archbishop with difficulty controlled his rising anger, and said, "There is but one Church, no new and no old one," when Döllinger promptly interposed, "A new one has been made." Then the Archbishop, who was in tears, floundered about in a hopeless sort of way, first observing "there had constantly been changes in the doctrines of the Church," and then, perceiving what a sensation the statement had made on his auditors, correcting himself by adding, "I mean the dogmas have often required explanations." What dogma was to be explained by the Vatican decree he did not add, and no further remark was made, as both parties were anxious to bring so embarrassing an interview to an end. By the following April the rest of the Faculty had submitted—"with a smile or a sigh"—and Döllinger and Friedrich were excommunicated.

HOLLAND'S RECOLLECTIONS OF A PAST LIFE.*

THE "Recollections" embodied in this narrative were originally composed at the solicitation of the author's family and friends, who were naturally desirous that one who had seen so much of the world, as well as lived so long in it, should himself be the chronicler of his own experiences, and we may fairly say his adventures, at home and abroad. Seldom indeed has it been the lot of any one, except a statesman, a soldier, or a diplomatist by profession, to have been brought in contact with so many distinguished persons, and as seldom has one bound by professional ties travelled so widely, as Sir Henry Holland. His book may take its place—in consideration of his opportunities for observation of men and cities—among that valuable class of annals, "Mémoires pour servir," so welcome to the historian. Circulating for some time privately in a circle of immediate friends, these "Recollections" are now most properly communicated to the public; nor does the writer of them stand in need of any apology for occupying his pages with personal details. On the contrary, the hero of the story is by far the most interesting character in it; the other personages, distinguished as many of them were in their day, or still are, stand second in our esteem. Sometimes, indeed, as was the case in the late Mr. Crabb Robinson's journals, they excite more than they satisfy the reader's curiosity. Like good children, they are seen rather than heard, or, if heard, what they say is not very important. They come like shadows, so depart. On the other hand, the recollector himself presents to us the very rare spectacle of almost unbroken prosperity. The priceless gift of a vera senex is nowhere else to be seen; and at the age of eighty-four Sir Henry Holland records a happy boyhood, an active manhood, and a useful and honoured old age. No man of the latter, it would seem, can have been absent from his recollections. His labours and his cautious often have been prosperous and pleasant. He was not less fortunate in choosing than in choosing a profession. His very early discovery that a clerk in a merchant's office was not suited to him; and that the career of a physician was. Not less fortunate was he in escaping from the trammels of an ordinary public school or University training. That he would have distinguished himself at Eton or King's College, at Winchester or New College, there can be little doubt, since his mind was singularly active, and his perseverance in any chosen path unflagging. Yet school prizes and a College fellowship might very probably have caged and cribbed his energies, and rendered his "Recollections" far less diversified and interesting than they are. For many, if not for most, men, movement in a fixed groove is a wholesome necessity; their nature, like that of some plants, requires an external prop. For others it is good to be exempt from such shackles; and of these Sir Henry Holland is one. It is perhaps more to be wondered at that foreign travel did not occupy more of his time than it did. No very thick partition divided him from explorers of the globe. He had in him some of the temperament of a Mungo Park or a Livingstone. He has been a hard and fearless tamer of horses, a pre-Alpine tourist, an almost ubiquitous wanderer by land and sea. After a sort of rehearsal in boyhood of the excursions in riper years, he began his annual journeys—not by any means in his case things of the past only—with a voyage to Iceland in 1810. Such an expedition more than sixty years ago was adventurous as well as novel. It entailed a long, and not always a safe, voyage; for at the time he took it, to reach that "extraordinary island" required as many weeks as now, in a well-equipped yacht like Lord Dufferin's, it requires days. Two years after climbing Mount Hecla, we find him on the summit of Atna; then crossing the Balkan; next taking his coffee with Ali Pasha at Janina, as he afterwards did with Mehemet Ali; now in Algeria; not long afterwards in the United States; and had he added to his journeys one to Australia, he might have literally applied to himself the Latin poet's line:—

How congenial, and indeed necessary, to one of his temperament periodical migration was, he has told us in his "Recollections":—

When first settling in London, I was menaced by the opinion, coming to me from friends, and not without justification from prior experience, that this scheme of annual travel would be injurious to me professionally. But my early resolution as to the matter of travel, steadily persevered in, has proved a gain to me through all succeeding life. I have come back each year refreshed in health of body and mind, and ready for the ten months of busy practice which lay before me.

Among the feats achieved by this systematic wanderer, one is recorded with evident complacency—that of returning home on the very day, and often at the very hour, fixed upon when he started from London. So punctual indeed was Sir Henry in this ceremony, that often he has kept a professional appointment at the time fixed by him for it eight weeks before. We have known a similar instance of exact calculation in the case of a great, and latterly an aged, traveller; the dinner he had ordered, the friends he had invited to it two or three months before, he was sure to be ready for when door or dinner bell rang the hour; and he accounted this precision among the happy incidents of his ramblings.

During the more than half century which has elapsed since my first settling in London (Sir Henry tells us), only two years occur (and these devoted to Scotch and Irish excursions) in which I have not passed two autumnal months in journey or voyage abroad. In the series of these annual journeys I have visited (and most of them repeatedly) every single capital of Europe, have made eight voyages to the United States and Canada, travelling over more than 26,000 miles of the American Continent—one voyage to Jamaica and other West Indian islands—have been four times in the East, visiting Constantinople, various parts of Asia Minor, Damascus, Jerusalem, and Cairo; have made three tours in Algeria, two journeys in Russia, several in Sweden and Norway, repeated visits to Spain, Portugal, and Italy, a second visit to Iceland, voyages to the Canary Isles, Madeira, Dalmatia, &c., and other excursions which it would be tedious to enumerate.

Seeing so many cities led to seeing many men also, such as for various reasons have left behind them good or evil names. Some of them were tyrants of Greek or Italian stamp—nineteenth-century Dionysiiuses or Sforzas, political curiosities verifying or recalling to mind many historic scenes and characters. Sir Henry more than once encountered royalty in its lowest form, and Presidents of Republics vigorous, able, and remarkable alike for their lives or their deaths. He saw the almost idiotic King of Spain, the Bourbon Charles IV., accompanied by that hideous Megara his wife, and the handsome adventurer, Godoy; he saw and knew also Abraham Lincoln and Jefferson Davis. Few living men indeed could write such annotations on the Almanach de Gotha as Sir Henry Holland. For such conferences as those of Verona, Vienna, or Radstadt, he would be like the interpreter in the House Beautiful, or like a nomenclator to a candidate canvassing the plebeian voters in the Roman forum for prætorian or consular chairs. He had indeed a twofold opportunity for becoming acquainted with such celebrities as councillors and princes of the world—one as a traveller, the other as a physician. There are a few fortunate persons who can dispense through life with the aid of a lawyer, some few also who need not visitations of the clergy, but sooner or later every son of Adam, unless death clutches him too quickly, must open his door to a medical adviser. Even in such primitive days as were those of the Trojan war, Podalirius and Machaon were indispensable to the host and guest Achæans. The secrets of the sick-room are indeed sacred as those of the confessional; yet it is no violation of duty, where disease is of an ordinary type, to describe the temperament of different patients. Sir Henry attended professionally six English Prime Ministers. In 1825, Mr. Canning was dangerously ill, and at that time Sir Henry's acquaintance with him seems to have begun—commencing professionally, ending in friendship. "There was a charm," he says, "in Mr. Canning's fine countenance enhancing that of his conversation, and felt by all who knew him. His voice well harmonised with these endowments." Two years later Canning was suffering at Brighton from severe illness, and Sir Henry was summoned to attend him:—

On my return to London [he says] I hastened to Lord Liverpool, to report to him on what he himself strongly expressed to me as a matter vital to his Government. Having satisfied his inquiries as to Mr. Canning, he begged me to feel his own pulse—the first time I had ever done so. Without giving details, I may say that I found it such as to lead me to suggest an immediate appeal to his medical advisers for careful watch over him. The very next morning Lord Liverpool underwent the paralytic stroke which closed his political life.

Six months afterwards Canning himself was no more:—

Successing to Lord Liverpool's place as Premier, when exhausted by recent illness; and harassed by unceasing toil and turmoil, personal as well as political, from the moment of his taking the office, an attack of internal inflammation came on, under which he rapidly sank. I scarcely quitted him during the last two days of his life.

The malice and rancour of faction were never more signally displayed in this or any country than in the case of this accomplished statesman. Whig magnates stood aloof from him; Tory lords looked down on him as a parvenu, an adventurer; and perhaps the malignity of the male sex was less virulent than that of titled and coroneted women. The owls of the period booted at him, the wolves and unclean jackals of both Houses raised a bark of triumph when his death was announced. In a note Sir Henry records that Mr. Canning said to him, while sitting by his bedside in this his dying illness, "I have struggled against this long, but it has conquered me at last."

The following comparison will be read with interest by all who delight in tracing the relations of physical temperament to mental power:—

Without infringing on my rule of abstinence from professional anecdotes, I may briefly notice the singular contrast of natural temperament between Lord Palmerston and Lord Aberdeen. The inborn vivacity and optimism of the former pervaded his life, both public and private, rescuing him in great degree from many of those anxieties which press, more or less, upon every step of a Minister's career. He had a singular power of clear and prompt decision, as I had often occasion to know, and was spared that painful recurrence to foregone doubt which torments feeble minds. Lord Aberdeen looked at objects and events through a more gloomy atmosphere. He was wanting in that elasticity of body and spirit so influential in a public career. I recollect on one occasion to have seen them as patients in immediate succession for several days together, when this contrast was presented under strongly marked colours, which illness more especially discloses.

Travelling at the time when Napoleon I. dictated to nearly all Europe the laws of peace or war, of alliances or commercial intercourse, and when he was straining every nerve, to the great detriment of his own Empire, to isolate the "divided Britons" from the society of nations, was accompanied by perils both by land and sea. There were "land rats"—French soldiers from the heel of Italy to the Baltic—and "water rats"—privateers in all waters. No ancient tyrant, Greek or barbarian, had longer hands or drearier prisons, as poor Forsyth the traveller found to his cost, than the French Emperor. When Sir Henry was in Spain, Marshal Suchet had not quitted "the beautiful province of Valencia," and the English tourist had a narrow escape from capture by Harispe's cavalry, near Castalla, whither he had gone to see the Pantano, "the magnificent artificial reservoir for irrigation in the vicinity of that town." At another time he was in danger of visiting Algiers on board a galley belonging to that then famous piratical city. Perhaps his medical skill would have lightened his bondage, and he might have been as welcome to the Dey as the Greek doctor Democedes was of yore to King Darius. Yet Democedes had to use all his wits to escape from Susa, and Sir Henry might have been too highly prized by the ladies of the harem for him to be suffered on any pretext to leave the African den of thieves. At Madrid he found the Spaniards intoxicated with joy at their deliverance from the French, who had so generously come to deliver them from their home-born tyrants. At Vittoria he found abundance of professional employment in the military hospitals, then filled with the wounded in the great battle there. "No spectacle," he says, "is more painful than that of the carnage of the wounded, sick and dying, in the midst of a campaign." It is agreeable to know that, hideous as the scenes of war still are, and will always be, some of this misery is now alleviated:—

I have since [says the ubiquitous traveller] seen the effects of war in Algeria, and on a much larger scale in Virginia, during the late American struggle; but there mitigated, as far as was possible, by the excellent hospital provisions of the Federal army, which I have never seen equalled elsewhere.

We now turn to "Recollections" at home, and they are not surpassed by any recorded of foreign travel. The London of the present hour has almost grown up under the eyes of the recollector. Sixty-six years ago he visited London for the first time, and having known it through all its intermediate changes, he has some difficulty in recalling its exact picture at that time, and the impression it made upon him:—

The memory of the old has been gradually obliterated by living for more than half a century under the growth of the new. I have often sought to recall the aspect of Charing Cross, Pall Mall, Piccadilly, &c., as first I saw these great thoroughfares. I can better recollect the occasional shooting of the Fall at the Old London Bridge in a Thames wherry. The picture too is still before me of the bare and dismal fields lying outside Tyburn turnpike and Hyde Park Corner—now covered by two new cities, each rivaling many European capitals in extent and grandeur.

Hæc data fata diu viventibus; nor is so long a retrospect as that of fifty years without its pleasures as well as its pains. The London that sixty-five years since met the eyes of the youth was little in advance of the city that Samuel Johnson loved so well. It was ill lighted, undrained, nearly as dirty as Rome has always been under its priestly rulers, and almost as dangerous to life or pocket as Paris was under the Most Christian kings. Pleasant also it is to remember that the improvement of its capital is not due to any particular zeal or activity on the part of any Government, but to the increasing intelligence of the English people. Our process may be more tedious than that of a Cæsar or a Haussmann, but though tardy is more sure now, and more like to be progressive as well as permanent hereafter. The present embankment of the Thames, in nearly every material point, was planned and prepared nearly forty years ago. But the scheme was then viewed with suspicion, if not as the dream of a lunatic. The people were not ripe for it, but regarded it as a vain luxury, rather than a social necessity. One change, indeed, Sir Henry has not sanctioned, and his mention of it is among the most pleasant passages in his "Recollections":—

In January 1816 I entered on my professional life in London, at the age of twenty-seven. My first residence was in Mount Street; but four years of prosperous practice enabled me to remove to the house in Brook Street, where I have ever since lived; running deeply into a long lease by the length of my own life, while there is scarcely a house within sight of mine which has not changed its tenancy four or five times over. Time has endeared my own habitation to me, and I shall never seek to change it.

Remarks on London society, as it was and as it is, by one so eminently social as the recollector of sixty years' standing can hardly fail of being welcomed by readers:—

I have often put to myself a question, which indeed every existing generation has motive and right to ask, as to its relations of better and worse—morally, intellectually, and socially—to the generation going before it. The changes which have occurred, whatever their nature, have come on gradually. That there is a certain balance of gain and loss is a safe conclusion, but a very useless one, unless expressed by details which few can render impartially even to themselves.

The changes which have occurred in my time, and especially those of deterioration, are chiefly such as arise from the over-crowding of London. The influence of this increase (in population) pervades the whole economy of social life from the highest to the lowest. It is testified generally by a more miscellaneous intermingling of the different elements of society. The crowded dinner tables of the present day, and still more those evening assemblages, under whatever fanciful name evoked—stifling breath as well as conversation—have largely swelled society, but not improved it. The practical definition of a crowd, of whatever rank it be composed, approaches closely to that of a mob; the intellect and happier refinements of society alike suffer from it. The men of genius, literature, and wit are doubtless as numerous in London as heretofore, but they are less marked individually in the multitude, and many of them partially concealed by their connexion with the anonymous periodical writings of the day.

We conclude our notice of these "Recollections" with a useful hint to all who have to deal with charlatans. Sir Henry, indeed, recommends his scheme of refutation to medical men only, but it may be quite as properly applied to political, legal, or clerical quackery:—

I have witnessed, in my professional career, many charlataneries coming rapidly in succession to one another, and each drawing largely on public credulity. The name of physical science wrongly usurped, and the claim of curing every disease—a claim which carries its own refutation with it—are brought in to sanction what is purely imposture. Here, unfortunately, the lists of truth are of a kind easily over-ridden by extravagant pretensions, commonplace fallacies, or the strong seduction of novelty; and the particular folly or fraud is often corrected only by the intervention of some other deserving a like fate. Argument is seldom of much avail with those thus imposed upon; and the time and temper of the physician are both grievously wasted, if submitted to controversies utterly useless, where ignorant asseveration takes the place of that evidence which alone can establish a medical truth. In such cases I have myself generally found the refusal of discussion a more effectual answer than any train of reasoning. One of the sharpest weapons in argument is silence.

JONES'S EPISCOPATE OF WILTS AND DORSET.*

MR. JONES is already known as something more than a mere local antiquary by his edition of the Wiltshire Domesday. In his present book or pamphlet, whichever we are to call it, he has gone to the right sources, and has put one or two points more clearly than they had been put before. He has brought together, we will not say all, for that might be dangerous, but certainly a great mass of the ancient authorities for the early ecclesiastical history of a part of England whose ecclesiastical geography has been more than usually fluctuating down to our own day. The one county of Dorset, for instance, has at different times looked as its episcopal head to Dorchester—not its own Dorchester—Winchester, Sherborne, Old and New Salisbury, Bristol, and now Salisbury again. Mr. Jones himself, in his historic parish of Bradford-on-Avon, has, if we may identify him personally with all his predecessors, looked up at different times to Dorchester, Winchester, Ramsbury, Sherborne, and Old and New Salisbury, and, to judge from the fate of some of his neighbours, he has narrowly escaped a recent translation to the jurisdiction of Bristol. Mr. Jones traces all these changes out with great care, and so to trace them out comes nearly to tracing out the history of the great West-Saxon Bishopric out of which these smaller dioceses were at different times cut and carved. It strikes us, however, that in working at the ancient authorities he has hardly paid enough attention to the light which may sometimes be got from their modern commentators. On one or two points in the intricate geography which he has to deal with he seems still to be only feeling his way towards conclusions which researches of other scholars have already put beyond doubt. We know not whether Mr. Jones is, as his name might lead us to think, of British descent; if so, we can forgive him a certain tendency to make the most of the Celts in the West, though it is a little hard that this tendency show itself at the expense of his brother Celts in the North. It is only when Mr. Jones comes across the darling ancient British Church that he shows the slightest sign of controversial feeling, and even then it does not come out very strongly, and in no way affects the accuracy of his statement of facts. Still there is always something amusing in the way in which people will cling to dreams of this kind, sometimes out of national feeling, sometimes in the pious hope of finding new weapons against the Pope. But if Mr. Jones really is a true Briton, we shall not be angry at his speaking in a somewhat slighting tone of "the monk Augustine," and at his special rejoicing when he finds that two British Bishops did once join in an English consecration.

The ecclesiastical history of South-Western England is the history of the divisions of the great diocese the seat of which was very early, though not quite from the beginning, placed in the West-Saxon capital of Winchester. As the kingdom of Wessex was founded by an independent Teutonic settlement quite distinct from the earlier Teutonic settlement in Kent, so the Church of Wessex was founded by an independent mission from the common centre at Rome distinct from the mission which had already brought Kent within the Christian fold. Birinus certainly came into Britain at the special bidding of Pope Honorius, but there seems some reason to believe that he was sent at the suggestion of the sainted Northumbrian King Oswald. At any rate it is hard to see how this independent origin of the West Saxon Church proves anything on behalf of the British Church, though it might have been used with some force to show that Winchester ought to be a metropolitan see independent of Canterbury. Mr. Jones argues that the connexion of St. Oswald with the conversion of the West Saxons "shows the indirect influence of the Celtic Church in bringing about so important a result." Of a Celtic Church undoubtedly—namely, of the Scottish Church which had so much to do with the conversion of Oswald and Northumberland—but surely not of any British Church, which it would have been hard to find at Winchester or Dorchester in those days. Then too the next Bishop, who, though described as a native of Gaul, bears the strangely English-sounding name of "Agilbertus," or "Ægelbryht," is recorded to have studied in Ireland. But it is hard to see how this was "another instance of the indirect way in which the British Church was instrumental in Christianizing Wessex." His Teutonic name shows him to have been of Frankish birth; but it should be noted that, while the earlier chronicles describe him as "of Galwalum," the late Canterbury version speaks of him as "æ Frencisca." This is the language of the eleventh or twelfth century, not of the seventh; and it makes needless confusion to talk, as Mr. Jones does, of both Ægelbryht and his English successor, Wine, as coming from "France" or being consecrated in "France," when Ægelbryht returned to his own land and exchanged his English bishopric for that of Paris. The geographical description of the chronicles is that he "oufeng Perna [Parisiana] biscopdomes on Galwalum be Sigene."

The seat of this earliest West-Saxon Bishopric was at Dorchester on the Thames, the place which afterwards appears as the seat of the great Mercian Bishopric which was at last removed to Lincoln. At first sight we are apt to be puzzled at finding the West-Saxon see placed on a spot which was actually beyond the borders of the later Wessex, of which the Thames was the northern frontier. But to the West-Saxon dominion of those days, which has as yet barely spread itself into Somerset while it took in a large territory spreading northwards towards Bedford, Dorchester was really a central spot. The changes in the geography of Wessex, its losses towards the North, its gains towards the West, must be borne in mind through the whole of this period of our history. Mr. Jones is feeling his way towards an appreciation of this fact, but he has not yet grasped it with much vigour. He is more at home when he gets to matters somewhat later and more strictly local, in which he shows himself a clear-sighted and trustworthy guide. We find in Beda that Oenwulf grew tired of his foreign Bishop because of his "barbarous" speech—"rex, qui Saxonum tantum linguam noverat, perferens barbaræ loquelæ." This is a most remarkable way of speaking; as "barbaræ loquelæ" cannot possibly mean Latin, it shows that the High-Dutch of a Frank was already, if not absolutely unintelligible, at least disagreeable to Saxon ears. Oenwulf therefore founded a new bishopric at his own door in the royal city of Winchester, to which he appointed the Englishman Wine, while he left Ægelbryht in his midland see at Dorchester. But this first division, as Mr. Jones says, was only a modus vivendi, for as the offended Ægelbryht at once went off to Rome, so Frank and Gal-Welsh by the same—the old and the new bishoprics were again joined together in the hands of Wine. The see was not finally removed to Winchester till the episcopate of Hereford, in 689. By that time Wessex had begun to be cut short to the North. After Hereford's death, in 703, the West-Saxon diocese was first permanently divided by the foundation of the new see of Sherborne by Ine. The boundary of the two sees has been more clearly traced out by Mr. Jones than we have ever seen it done before. According to the entry in the Chronicles in 709 the two dioceses answered to the country east and west of Selwood. Mr. Jones marks out the exact frontier with much accuracy of local knowledge. For general purposes it is enough to say that the latter diocese of Ramsbury, taking in the greater part of Wiltshire, still remained to the diocese of Winchester. The Bishop of the capital had thus under his jurisdiction Hampshire, Wiltshire, Surrey, Berkshire, and whatever territory Wessex may have kept north of the Thames. It is not till Ælfred's time, in 897, that we hear of a Mercian Bishop of Dorchester. The older site of the see which is now at Lincoln was at Leicester, and its removal to Dorchester was most likely connected with the revolution which made Leicester a Danish borough. The other diocese west of Selwood was that of Sherborne, taking in the shires of the Sumorsetas and Dorsetas. For such a diocese Sherborne was a very central place. The notion of a separate Bishop of Somerset so early as this, at Wells, Congresbury, or anywhere else, may be set aside as legendary. But there seems no need to cast away the tradition which makes Ine found at Wells, not indeed a bishopric, but a church of secular priests.

Mr. Jones holds that, by thus keeping Wiltshire after this division in the diocese of Winchester, he gets rid of the difficulty which has been felt, and about which Professor Stubbs said something in his Registrum Sacrum Anglicanum, at the description of Æthelred, who became Archbishop of Canterbury in 870, as having before been "Wiltunscire biscop." The words are found only in one or two manuscripts, but it strikes us that in any case he must have been a coadjutor, as Mr. Jones suggests, as there is no other sign of an independent bishopric in Wiltshire so early. Mr. Jones brings together a good many cases of the employment of coadjutor or suffragan Bishops at these times.

Under Eadward the Elder in 909 comes another division of dioceses which is connected with the story of the consecration of seven Bishops at once by Archbishop Plegmund. This story in its essence Professor Stubbs accepts, though with some suggestions as to the names given to the particular Bishops in the common story. But as to the division of the dioceses there is no doubt. Winchester and Sherborne were both divided. The former lost Wiltshire and Berkshire, which now formed the diocese of Ramsbury, whose prelates are in the list given by Florence of Worcester called Bishops of Sunning. Sherborne diocese was divided into three. Somerset was taken off to form the new diocese of Wells, while Dorset remained to the original mother church, which, central as it had been for a diocese taking in both Somerset and Dorset, became eminently the opposite for a diocese taking in Dorset only. We may suppose that, with the successive advances of the West-Saxons westwards, the spiritual jurisdiction of the Bishops of Sherborne advanced also. It was now time to create a separate English Bishopric for Devonshire, the seat of which was fixed at Orediton, the Cornish Bishopric as yet remaining untouched. Thus far we have to do with the division of dioceses, a process which can hardly have had any object but that of real ecclesiastical reform, by giving the Bishop a smaller sphere of work over which his influence would be more effectual. In the next century we find the exactly opposite process, the union of dioceses, which can hardly have had any object except the temporal aggrandizement of their prelates. In the reign of Edward the Confessor the Bishoprics of Devonshire and Cornwall were finally united, and the seat of the two fixed at Exeter, thus forming that unwieldy diocese which modern reformers are anxious to divide back again. Sherborne and Ramsbury were in the like sort united in the same reign, and their united seat was again removed under the Conqueror to the Old Salisbury, and under Henry the Third to the New. Of the four dioceses thus made out of the original West-Saxon Bishopric and its British dependencies, those of Winchester, Wells, and Exeter have undergone no important change. But the diocese which lies between the three, that which forms Mr. Jones's immediate subject, has been followed to our own day by a destiny of endless choppings and changings. Certainly no district, ecclesiastical or civil, could be geographically more awkward than one which took in Berkshire, Wilts, and Dorset, including Windsor at one end, and touching Devonshire at the other. But the remedy hit upon by King Henry the Eighth was passing strange. He again made Dorset a distinct bishopric, but placed its seat not at Sherborne, or Wimbome, or Milton, but in the distant city of Bristol, cut off by the whole diocese of Wells. The last changes have been to form a new diocese of Salisbury out of Dorset and the greater part of Wiltshire, a small district in the northern part of the shire being added to Bristol. This is a distinct inroad of Mercia upon Wessex, but the other change which has transferred Berkshire from Salisbury may be looked on in two lights. A diocese taking in Berkshire may be looked on as representing, not the later Mercian Dorchester, but the earlier West-Saxon Dorchester, when Wessex stretched north of the Thames.

The subject thus taken up by Mr. Jones is a curious place of ecclesiastical history. Few parts of England have so constantly shifted to and fro in their ecclesiastical relations as the two counties with which Mr. Jones has had to deal. The diocese of Salisbury and Wilts have gone through a good many changes, but there has not been that radical shifting, from the very beginning of the

to our own day, which we see in the case of Winchester and Dorset. But we may mark one difference between ancient and modern changes in this way. The early changes are almost always cases of simple union or simple division, which do not disturb our geographical ideas. But the modern changes are often very perplexing, and upset all our notions of history. For Gloucester and Malmesbury to be in the diocese of Bristol is not quite so wonderful as for St. Albans and Colchester to be in the diocese of Rochester, but it is perplexing nevertheless. Something of the same sort has happened with the Judges' circuits as with the Bishops' dioceses. It was curious to see how nearly the former circuits, doubtless through sheer accident, answered to ancient kingdoms and earldoms. But when York, for so many ages the capital and metropolis of the North, is now no longer Northern but Midland, the historical geographer begins to rub his eyes, and to wonder whither the world is going.

THE MISTRESS OF LANGDALE HALL.

GENERALLY speaking, in criticising a novel we confine our observations to the merits of the author. In this case we must make an exception, and say something as to the publisher. The Mistress of Langdale Hall does not come before us in the stereotyped three-volume shape, with rambling type, ample margins, and nominally a guinea and a half to pay. On the contrary, this new aspirant to public admiration appears in the modest guise of a single graceful volume, and we confess that we are disposed to give a kindly welcome to the author, because we may flatter ourselves that she is in some measure a protégée of our own. A few weeks ago an article appeared in our columns censuring the prevailing fashion of publishing novels at nominal and fancy prices. Necessarily we dealt a good deal in commonplaces, the absurdity of the fashion being so obvious. We explained, what is well known to every one interested in the matter, that the regulation price is purely illusory. The publisher in reality has to drive his own bargain with the libraries, who naturally beat him down. The author suffers, the trade suffers, and the libraries do not gain. Arguing that a palpable absurdity must be exploded some day unless all the world is qualified for Bedlam, we felt ourselves on tolerably safe ground when we ventured to predict an approaching revolution. Judging from the preface to this book, we may conjecture that it was partly on our hint that Mr. Tinsley has published. As all prophets must welcome events that tend to the speedy accomplishment of their predictions, we confess ourselves gratified by the promptitude with which Mr. Tinsley has acted, and we heartily wish his venture success. He recognizes that a reformation so radical must be a work of time, and at first may possibly seem to defeat its object. For it is plain that the public must first be converted to a proper regard for its own interests; and, by changing the borrowing for the buying system, must come in to bear the publisher out. He must look moreover to the support and imitation of his brethren of the trade. We doubt not he has made the venture after all due deliberation, and that we may rely on his determination seconding his enterprise. All prospectuses of new undertakings tend naturally to exaggeration, but success will be well worth the waiting for, should it be only the shadow of that on which Mr. Tinsley reckons. He gives some surprising figures; he states some startling facts; and, as a practical man, he draws some practical conclusions. He quotes a statement of Mr. Charles Reade's, to the effect that three publishers in the United States had disposed of no less than 370,000 copies of Mr. Reade's latest novel. He estimates that the profits on that sale—the book being published at a dollar—must amount to 25,000*l.* Mr. Reade of course has a name, and we can conceive that his faults and blemishes may positively recommend themselves to American taste. But Mr. Tinsley remarks that if a publisher could sell 70,000 copies in any case, there would still be 5,000*l.* of clear gain; and, even if the new system had a much more moderate success than that, all parties would still profit amazingly. For Mr. Tinsley calculates the profits of a sale of 2,000 copies of a three-volume edition at 1,000*l.*, and we should fancy the experience of most authors would lead them to believe he overstates it. It will be seen that at all events the new speculation promises brilliantly, and reason and common sense conspire to tell us that the reward must come to him who has patience to wait. Palmam qui meruit ferat, and may he have his share of the profits too. Meanwhile, here we have the first volume of Mr. Tinsley's new series in most legible type, in portable form, and with a sufficiently attractive exterior. The price is four shillings, and, the customary trade deduction being made to circulating libraries, it leaves them without excuse should they deny it to the order of their customers.

We should apologize to Miss Kettle for keeping her waiting while we discuss business matters with her publisher. But she knows no doubt that there are times when business must take precedence of pleasure, and conscientious readers are bound to dispose of the preface before proceeding to the book. For we may say at once that we have found pleasure in reading her story. In the first place, it has a strong and natural local colouring, and we always like anything that gives a book individuality. In the next, there is a feminine grace about her pictures of nature and delineations of female character, and that always makes a story attractive. Finally, there is a certain interest that carries us along, although the story is loosely put together, and the demands on our credulity are somewhat incessant and importunate. The scene is laid in the West Riding of Yorkshire; nor did it need the dedication of the book to tell us that the author was an old resident in the county. With considerable artistic subtlety she lays her scenes in the very confines of busy life. Cockneys and professional foreign tourists are much in the way of believing that the manufacturing districts are severed from the genuinely rural ones by a hard and fast line; that the demons of cotton, coal, and wool blight everything within the scope of their baleful influence. There can be no greater blunder; native intelligence might tell us that mills naturally follow water power, that a broad stream and a good fall generally imply wooded banks and sequestered ravines, swirling pools, and rushing rapids. Miss Kettle as a dweller in the populous and flourishing West Riding has learned all that of course. She is aware besides of the power of contrast; that peace and solitude are never so much appreciated as when you have just quitted the bustle of life, and hear its hum mellowed by the distance. Romance is never so romantic as when it rubs shoulders with the practical, and sensation "piles itself up" when it is evolved in the centre of commonplace life. So the heroine's father, although a man of high spirit and ancient family, is set to earn his living by honest industry. Frank Langdale is manager to a great house of business, and domesticates himself in a picturesque old mansion in the country within easy reach of his work. Langdale is his veritable name, but with a queer pride of his own he drops the second syllable, that he may assume a semi-incognito. He is on the worst possible terms with his near neighbour, Miss Langdale, heir female in possession of his rich family estates. There are old griefs between them; the chief of them the marriage which Mr. Langdale has formed somewhat beneath his station. His wife is accordingly the subject on which he is exceptionally susceptible, and Miss Langdale will persist in ignoring her. Hinc illa lacryma, and the somewhat melancholy story Miss Kettle has to tell; melancholy at least in its course, although generally happy in its ending. Miss Langdale is cold and lovely, strong-minded and self-contained. We see at once that she has taken the world in hatred, and before the story has proceeded far we are suffered to surmise something of the cause. In the world, and especially in the world of romance, "love will still be lord of all." However, in one of her solitary rides, chance sends the hard Miss Langdale an adventure. She lights upon a beautiful child, and something in its looks awakens old associations, and at first sight she falls fondly in love with it. When she identifies it with little Florence Langdale, the child of her cousin Frank, she chills, although only for a time. Her small acquaintance has touched a tender place in her heart. Actuated partly by affection, partly by the less laudable motive of hurting her cousin, she sets herself to make the attachment mutual. An old family servant who acts as Florence's nurse plays into her hands, and she succeeds. Florence is a spoiled child and a sharp one, and very fond of petting and pomps and vanities. She knows her parents would not approve of her stolen interviews with her new acquaintance, and she keeps them secret. But we do not mean to tell the story in detail, although so much as we have told seemed necessary to make our comments intelligible. Miss Langdale, as time goes on, succeeds in the designs on Florence. But although she takes her to her house, declares her her heiress, and opens a wide breach between her and her family, the better part of the girl's heart remains in her old home and with her own family. There are love and gratitude on the one side, remorse, regrets, and deep mutual affections on the other. Circumstances arise to call all these successively into violent play, and Florence's heart is sorely torn in the conflict.

We do not know that she is a very natural character, and yet she cannot be very unnatural, for Miss Kettle has made her both interesting and engaging. Thoughtless she might well be as a spoiled child; nothing sounds more likely than that she should be caught by kisses, flattery, and costly presents. But surely a child designed to turn out so well under systematic disadvantages would never have practised in her infancy a deceit so sustained. And, considering that she dearly loved her mother and sisters, and the love was warmly returned, that her home was a happy one, and the family singularly united, it seems improbable that she should have submitted to renunciation by one and the other, without struggling for their mediation and striving to make her father reconsider his harsh sentence; that she should have severed herself from them, and clung to her patroness until her mother's last illness and death led up to a dramatic reconciliation. Indeed, the vice of the story is general improbability. We do not altogether subscribe to the dictum that fact is stranger than fiction; at least, if it be so, it says little for the imagination of our romance writers. We own to a prejudice against the hum-drum stories that pick out half-a-dozen commonplace fellow-creatures, and elaborate the dull details of their monotonous lives, as if each writer were a Rembrandt and could make a masterpiece of a leg of mutton. We are content to admit a wide latitude in the central sensations of a piece of agonising interest, but it is a mistake in an artistic point of view to be for ever trying our faith. The inconsistencies of the heroine's conduct and character have led to these observations; but, if we need further illustration of them, we have only to open Miss Kettle's pages at random. Miss Langdale, for example, almost burlesque eccentricity. Her inheritance, her claims, the disposition of her property, would all have been matters of her family, had the validity of a testament of hers been questioned by a disappointed heir. Mr. Langdale, a sensible man of business, drops, and is suffered to drop, the half of his patrimonial, although settled on his family acres and among his own people. On the other hand, Martha Noel, the representative of a great, though decayed, family in the neighbourhood, remains there, living in a sort of tower house, preserves her aristocratic name, and accepts a place as overlooker in a cotton-mill. But unlikelyhood culminates in the life of Bertie's father, the spendthrift proprietor of Noel Hall. He comes home reformed years after his supposed death, settles in disguise under his own ruined roof-tree, which has passed to the Langdales, attracts attention and invites talk by collecting Noel pictures and articles of virtù in his couple of rooms, and is permitted to do it although the new mistress of Noel Hall takes a strong antipathy to him. Worn out by a hard life and broken down by disease, he performs extraordinary feats of skill and courage in flood and field and on scaffolding. And he keeps his incognito until it pleases him to throw it off; although he wears no disguise, although at one time he must have been familiar to many of his neighbours, and although his manner and way of life must have made him universally conspicuous. We are aware that Walter Scott gives some sort of precedent for this sort of thing. But Sir Walter's Black Dwarf burrowed out of sight in a lonely moor, and invoked the superstitions of a darker age to help him to keep his secret. Although, however, the story unquestionably often loses in interest by the very efforts made to excite it, still it is interesting, and very pleasantly written, and for the sake of both author and publisher we cordially wish it the reception it deserves.

TORRENS'S BOOK OF CONFESSIONS.*

THE sort of tone in which Mr. Torrens has set about his task may be inferred, to take one illustration out of the many scattered through his book, from the comparison made at p. 61 between the cession by the Emperor of India of the Dewanny of Bengal to Olive, and the relations between Louis XIV. and Charles II. Because the secret service money paid to the English King cannot be construed as constituting a mortgage of the soil of England, neither can the firman by which the Great Mogul conferred the perpetual Dewanny of Bengal on the English be held to have conferred that Dewanny. According to Mr. Torrens, there is no difference between the two cases, and this shrewd inference may be accepted as a test of his discernment as an historical critic. We fail indeed to perceive the exact object which Mr. Torrens has had before him in writing this book. He appears to assume a considerable acquaintance with the subject on the part of his readers, for his treatment of it is too sketchy and allusive to be otherwise intelligible; but he can hardly expect that those who have any previous knowledge of Indian history will accept his view of the case. And as regards the earlier days of the English in India, it was not necessary to write the story afresh to inform us that we did not come out of those transactions with clean hands. This story, we may observe, has already been told, and not without effect, by Macaulay; it is the one part of Indian history which everybody knows who knows anything at all about it, and the moral to be drawn from it appears tolerably plain. When the state of political morals was thoroughly corrupt in Europe, it was not surprising that men placed almost uncontrolled in positions of peculiar temptation in the East should have succumbed to temptation. Mr. Torrens's account, however, differs from those which have gone before, not so much in blackening the character of the English as in whitewashing the native parties to these transactions. Anybody reading Mr. Torrens's book might suppose that at the time when we first appeared on the scene, Indian politics were uniformly peaceful, and Indian princes living quietly on terms of mutual goodwill and amity with each other, under the reign of a settled and recognized system of public law; further, that all the Indian princes we had to deal with were models of honour and disinterestedness; while, to complete this distorted picture, and obtain the reader's sympathy for the objects of British oppression, he goes out of his way to describe the Rohillas as "brave mountain clans." He might just as well talk about the highlanders of Plumstead marshes.

Perhaps the most prominent distortion of Indian history for the development of his pet theory to be found in Mr. Torrens's book is his account of Lord Wellesley's administration. Any one reading this without being first fortified by some acquaintance with facts might be led to suppose that Lord Wellesley was an exaggerated Indian Napoleon, who trampled upon the unoffending and order-loving princes of the country without a shadow of justification. According to Mr. Torrens, a quarrel was deliberately picked with Tippee Sahib, and that unhappy monarch was the first sacrifice to Lord Wellesley's insatiable ambition. Mr. Torrens is indeed forced to admit that Tippee did not come rightfully by his kingdom, but when he says (p. 143) that "a long series of domestic troubles had unnerved the vigour of the Mysorean Government, and opened the way for the elevation of a Mohammedan soldier of fortune to more than a pre-eminence in the power and dignity of the ancient Hindu throne," this is, to say the least, rather a euphemistic way of putting the fact that Hyder Ali was simply a usurper, whose only possible claim to consideration at our hands would have consisted in his being a the peace and proving himself a quiet and respectable ally. To point out how completely Mr. Torrens has perverted the whole course of events which led up to the final war with Tipoo and the restoration of the kingdom by the British to the right of his would be too long a task to undertake here; it must suffice to say that Hyder and his son Tipoo are represented throughout as models of chivalry, moderation, and good faith, and the English as crafty, deceitful, and overbearing. But the picture given of the Marhatta war is still more distorted. Here, indeed, Mr. Torrens is forced again to admit, in order that his narrative should be intelligible, that the heads of the three great Marhatta States—Scindia, Holkar, and the Raja of Berar—were always quarrelling among themselves, and severally menacing the independence of their nominal sovereign the Peshwa, who, by the way, was in his turn a usurper. But he omits to add, what is equally essential to the right understanding of the story, that the Marhattas were in fact a nation of freebooters, whose ascendancy was gained by cruelty and fraud; that they had desolated and depopulated some of the fairest tracts of India, which have indeed not yet recovered from their ravages, and had made their progress to complete little less disastrous to that country than were the inroads of the Huns to Europe.

The truth is, Lord Wellesley was the first statesman who grasped the idea that a balance of power in India was a simple impossibility; that anything like a condition of permanent peace among a number of independent and powerful native States was a thing which had never had any existence before, and which there was no reason to suppose would ever arise in the future; and that the only chance the English had of maintaining undisturbed possession of their own territory was to be found in the establishment of their complete and undisputed supremacy as the paramount power of the country. They must be strong enough, not only to prevent attack from the native princes, but to prevent the latter from indulging in their favourite practice of chronic warfare among themselves—strong enough, in short, to act as guardians and conservators of the public peace throughout the whole country. This idea conceived, Lord Wellesley carried it out to its legitimate conclusion; and if any one will take the trouble to think the matter out, he will readily satisfy himself that a policy of neutrality, as a thing to be persisted in, was simply impossible. So long indeed as the Marhatta empire remained in the fragmentary state in which it existed in 1803, it might no doubt have been practicable by stress of diplomacy and constant preparation to maintain an armed neutrality. But that the political status quo of the Marhatta kingdoms could have remained thus nicely balanced for any considerable length of time is an inference wholly unwarranted by the course of previous events. Sooner or later the head of one State would have overrun and trampled down the rights of the rest, or the whole would have succumbed to some fresh adventurer, ready in his turn to attempt to realize the dream of universal empire, and bringing as a matter of course the whole force thus united under one head against the remaining independent Power. And meantime, while the Marhattas were fighting out their quarrels, subduing the remaining independent Rajpoot and Mahomedan States, including our ally the Nizam, and laying waste the country generally after their favourite manner, while the English exercising a benevolent neutrality looked on unconcerned, satisfied to take care of their own possessions so long as they themselves were not attacked, how about the happy people whose lands were to be the scene of this perpetual strife? In his sympathy for the loss suffered by the half-dozen persons, the descendants of the freebooters who had established these mushroom dynasties, Mr. Torrens can find no room for sympathy for the fifty or sixty millions of people whom Lord Wellesley redeemed from the slavery endured by any people whose lands are the scene of perpetual and barbarous war. Wherever the British standard has been planted there henceforward the land has known peace, and this is surely something to be set against the wrongs of three or four usurpers who probably deserve compassion on the score of legal rights and personal merit as little as any rulers that ever lived.

Even the British treatment of the Mogul appears not to satisfy Mr. Torrens. If the vague tirade at p. 290 means anything, it means that we ought to have given him back his kingdom—a kingdom which, with his eyesight, the Marhattas had taken from him, and which the poor old man and his effete descendants would have been unable to keep for a week if it had been restored. The English gave back the unfortunate monarch his liberty, allotted him an enormous pension, and treated him uniformly with every show of deepest respect; but they refused to make over lands to him when no organization any longer existed for governing them. It would be interesting to know what other course, short of withholding the pension and the honours, Mr. Torrens or any one else would have been prepared to recommend.

We have said that Mr. Torrens's mode of handling the events of Lord Wellesley's administration appears to be the wildest thing in the book; but even that must, we think, give place to his distorted account of the Sikh war of 1845-6. According to Mr. Torrens, the Sikh chieftains were anxious to rally round the throne of the infant prince and carry on a united and cordial government in his support during his minority, and to remain on peaceful terms with their neighbours, but were galled on the invasion of the British territory in consequence of a remark made by Mr. Dalhousie in the House of Commons. It would be almost as reasonable to say that Hsiao Pootsien was murdered in consequence of an article in the Record. The fact is that as soon as the strong hand of Runjeet Singh was withdrawn, the Punjab became a scene of anarchy. One prince or Minister after another was murdered, while the whole Khalsa army became quite ungovernable, and to avert its attention from themselves the Sikh Ministry incited it to march across the Sutlej. If there was any one historical fact which it might be thought had been established beyond cavil, it was that the invasion of British territory by the Sikh army was an act of wanton, unprovoked aggression, instigated by their leaders as a political diversion, just as was the late war got up by the French Government; while, as to the threatening preparations made by Lord Hardinge for the collision, it ought to be well known to everybody who professes to have made a study of the subject that the British authorities were quite taken by surprise; that the first battles were fought by a mere fraction of the Indian army, hurried up to the spot; and that after they were with difficulty won, the contest was long doubtful because the British were unprepared and short of men, and the further attack on the invading army was delayed for several weeks from want of ammunition, which had to be brought up from the magazines far off in our distant provinces. If ever there was a war unprovoked and fought purely in self-defence it was the Sikh war of 1845-6, and it requires a quite ludicrous distortion of the facts to try to make out that we were the aggressors.

Equally distorted is the account given of the annexation of the Punjab, in which we certainly came out with clean hands, whatever might have been the case on other occasions. We had tried honestly to establish a native government on a stable basis, by which the country might be kept in order till the young Maharaja should be old enough to assume the management of affairs; but the experiment failed because all the elements of a stable native government were wanting. Runjeet Singh by an iron rule had kept the Khalsa army in order, but since his death there had been a demoralizing period of anarchy, nor could any Council of Regency or British officials repress revolt and crime by the same stern methods that he employed. The outbreak of 1848 began with the revolt against the Sikh Council of a district governor, Moolraj, who set up the standard of rebellion at Moodian, and the troops who should have suppressed the revolt followed suit, whereupon the task of putting down the army which had mutinied against the only existing authority devolved upon the British. The sort of treatment which this episode receives from Mr. Torrens may be gathered from the remark he makes (p. 337), that one cause of the outbreak was the resentment occasioned by the insult of the Mahomedan servants of the British Government, supported by ten thousand bayonets, to Hindu caste and creed. What really happened was, that the British Government, acting on the principle it has always maintained in India of exercising the most complete religious toleration, insisted, when the first occupation of the Punjab took place, on the discontinuance of that persecution of the Mahomedan part of the population which the dominant Sikh faction had practised. Mr. Torrens has therefore here completely misrepresented the facts, while his talk about the ten thousand bayonets is sufficiently absurd when we remember that ninety per cent. of the British Sepoys were themselves bigoted high-caste Hindus, and therefore scarcely appropriate instruments for carrying out systematic insults to the Hindu creed.

After this it need scarcely be said that Mr. Torrens denounces the annexation of the Punjab, although neither in this nor any other case does he point out what the better course would have been. It was just because there was no alternative practicable that the annexation was determined on; and without wishing to defend all Lord Dalhousie's course of policy, we may at least assert that, if ever annexation was justifiable, it was in this case; while the result has been to convert a land of anarchy and bloodshed into one of the most prosperous, well affected, and peaceable regions of Asia.

We have said that Mr. Torrens's book is not likely to make many converts to the opinions expressed in it; we venture to add our belief that the author himself is not among the number. He writes throughout more in the style of a man playing with an ingenious paradox or speaking up to a brief, than of one holding decided convictions. We venture also to hazard the prophecy that a few years hence the author will not continue to regard this production of his with much complacency, but will be disposed rather to feel just a little ashamed of it. It is to be hoped that if he again employs his unquestionable talents on this important subject, he will take it up in a more impartial spirit, with a view of pursuing the truth, instead of writing throughout as a prejudiced advocate of one class of extreme and irrational views.

FARRAR'S GREEK SYNTAX.

WE have too long left unnoticed the third edition of Mr. Farrar's Greek Syntax, which bears date 1870. The preface to the first edition, which is dated three years earlier, offers some apology for the author's venturing on so much an act as the publi-

* A brief Greek Syntax, and Hints on Greek Accidence; with some references to Comparative Philology, and with Illustrations from various Modern Languages. By the Rev. Frederic W. Farrar, M.A., F.R.S., Honorary Chaplain to the Queen; late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge; Honorary Fellow of King's College, London; one of the Masters at Harrow School; Author of "The Origin of Language," "Chapters on Language," "Familiar of Speech," &c. cation of a Greek Grammar in addition to the number already in the field; but the success of the book shows that no apology was called for, and that the reproduction of the original preface in a new edition was superfluous. It originated in a somewhat narrow view of supplying boys with the means of answering grammar and scholarship questions in examination papers, the author having observed, as he says, a remarkable recurrence of the same questions, or at least of questions involving the same points of scholarship, in different examination papers. In drawing up his Greek Grammar rules to meet this want, the author found that there was no school-book which entered as fully as seemed desirable into the subject of the structure of the Greek language and the general subject of Philology. And the present work must be considered as an enlargement and amplification of the useful publication which preceded it.

Mr. Farrar has achieved a great success, and that principally because he knows what boys can understand and what they will be interested in. His Grammar takes for granted that boys are already up to the mark commonly reached by boys in the sixth, possibly even in the fifth, form of a public school; and, accordingly, though, as his title-page implies, it contains a few hints on Greek Accidence, the main subject of the book is Syntax, the first fifty pages being introductory, and treating of the subjects which are on the border-land between what is commonly called Accidence and the Syntactical arrangement of sentences. The book has a tolerably copious table of contents, but is unfortunately wanting in an index. This is the one fault in the structure of the book, which contains more information on Greek grammar than we have ever before seen put into so small a compass. And many advanced scholars may learn much, both directly from the information conveyed in it, and indirectly from the extremely suggestive nature of many of the remarks made in it. There is just enough of explanation on subjects which boys would not find out for themselves, and we think we may congratulate the author on having succeeded in both the objects which he set before himself in commencing his work. He has made it both intelligible and interesting, and perhaps few writers could have brought to bear upon the subject so large an acquaintance with modern languages, and so extensive a familiarity with the best writers in English literature. The chief defect which strikes us is a want of what we may call logical strength. His mind, we should think, has not been formed either by the study of logic or by acquaintance with Greek philosophy, other than that narrow part of it which goes by the name of philology, in which his principal strength lies. We need not multiply instances to show this; one will suffice. There is one page, and only one, in the introduction (p. 40), which treats of the dual number, and it is the most unsatisfactory page of the whole volume. Mr. Farrar very truly remarks that many grammars throw no light whatever on the ordinary omission of a first person dual in the active. We do not ourselves know of any grammar which elucidates the subject; but after meeting with this observation on the part of the author, we were disappointed to find, first, that he has thrown no light whatever upon it, and then that he throws dust in our eyes by appearing to assign a reason for the absence of the first person dual in the active tenses as contrasted with its presence in the passive. Every schoolboy knows, and perhaps many schoolboys have commented upon, the fact which they so soon learn, that the dual in the present active is

whilst that of the passive in the same tense has these forms—

τύπτεσθαι, τύπτεσθαι, τύπτεσθαι.

Why, it will reasonably be asked, is there a form for we two are being struck, whilst there is absolutely none for we two are striking? Now we submit that Mr. Farrar's reason is nothing in the world but a mere re-stating of the same proposition in other words. If he had told us that in the active the first person plural is always used for the first person dual, whereas in the passive it is not, we should certainly have understood the statement. We should simply have observed that it was unnecessary, for it had been more forcibly stated before in the mere enunciation of the two tenses in the two voices respectively. But when we are told that the reason why the first person dual does not exist is that the first person plural is always used for it, we simply answer that there is nothing else that could be used for it. It seems to us that possibly there might be a greater necessity for distinguishing the case of two persons, one of whom was the speaker, being acted upon, than there would be of two persons who were professing to do something. This hypothesis, however, would entirely fail when applied to the case of the passive aorist being inflected like the active, and like it having no first person dual. We are more inclined ourselves to fall back upon the theory which denies that there was any first person dual at all. Elmsley, in the very scarce edition of the Actarismos published at Oxford in 1809, says (p. 127) that he considers it wholly originated with the Alexandrine grammarians, and observes that he has only met with three passages in authors of good note in which it appears, every one of which admits of easy emendation. The author makes a similar mistake in the very same page in speaking of the controverted point of the second and third person dual in the historical tenses having the same or a different termination. The fashion on this point—which was first, we believe, altered by Elmsley—seems gradually veering round to the old belief that there were two forms—

τύπτετον, τύπτετον;

but again the author has been most unfortunate in his mode of expression. He tells us that this latter is the more correct, for the Attics always prefer the form in or for the second person of the dual, if we may trust the best manuscripts. Now the matter is not in the least degree one of more or less correctness, but one of right or wrong; though it is very difficult to decide which is right, owing to the extreme paucity of passages where the second person dual occurs at all, and to the variation in the manuscripts in those places where it does appear; but we quite agree with Mr. Farrar in the conclusion which he has so awkwardly expressed, that there are probably two distinct forms for the second and third persons of the dual in the historical tenses.

Students will find in this Syntax some very useful remarks upon the cases. Nevertheless, there are points both here and elsewhere in the volume where we entirely differ from the writer's opinion. For instance, in treating of the accusative case he says:—

The accusative is probably, next to the vocative, the oldest of the cases, as is seen from the fact that its characteristic suffix -α appears even in the nominative of pronouns; as αἰαμ, ἰγόν; τῶν βοῶν, τοῦ, ἰδὲ, &c. This suffix probably acted the part of an article—i.e., it called attention to the word to which it was attached.—P. 81.

And, again, carrying out the same idea:—

The fundamental conception of the accusative is motion towards, and therefore also extension over space. It is the case to which, and is therefore put after transitive verbs to express the end of the motion or action; as τύπτετον αὐτόν, I strike him—i.e., the direction of my blow is towards him. It also expresses the action itself; as τύπτετον πλῆγην, I strike a blow.—P. 82.

The author proceeds to trace this idea through various significations of the accusative. To us it appears much more probable that the accusative, as being the case of the object, is the oldest form of the noun. Certainly we can see no reason for supposing the vocative to be the oldest case; it seems to us the height of absurdity to suppose the nominative of the second Latin declension, or the lengthened form of the nominative in Greek, to be derived from the vocative, and possibly Mr. Farrar may mean, in thus speaking of the vocative, to exclude the nominative as not being counted as a case at all. But the fact that the accusative is the older form admits of being argued from many considerations, and especially from the continued existence of the personal pronoun in that case ungrammatically supplanting the nominative in so many languages in common conversation, and from its existence in the first person singular of verbs in μ in Greek.

In another place he observes that

Neuters plural take a verb singular, because mere multitude or mass implies no plurality or separation of agencies; in fact, the neuter plural is an accusative or objective case, things not animate being regarded as only capable of being acted on. Hence, τὰ ζῶα ῥίπτεται properly means "as to the animals there is running."—P. 65.

Now, in a note to this passage which the author has quoted from Coleridge's Table Talk, it is implied, though Mr. Farrar scarcely appears to see it, that the accusative was the more ancient form. It is as follows:—

The neuter plural governing, as they call it, a singular verb, is one of the many instances in Greek of the inward and metaphysical grammar resisting successfully the tyranny of formal grammar. In truth, there may be multitude in things, but there can only be plurality in persons. Observe also that, in fact, a neuter noun in Greek has no real nominative case, though it has a formal one—that is to say, the same word in the accusative. The reason is—a thing has no subjectivity or nominative case; it exists only as an object in the accusative or oblique case.—Coleridge's Table Talk, quoted at p. 65.

Perhaps one of the best parts of Mr. Farrar's book is that which treats of prepositions, in which there is a continuation of some very good and instructive introductory remarks on the tendency of language to change from synthetic to analytic forms; as, for instance, from case-inflections to the use of prepositions, and from tense-inflections to the use of auxiliaries. Modern as compared with ancient Greek affords an easy method of comparing the two classes of language, though, as the author observes,

The simplest way of studying the tendency is to compare Latin with any of those six Romance languages (Italian, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Wallachian, and Engadish, which have been immediately derived from it—e.g., amabo becomes in French j'aimerai, which is a corruption of the analytic expression ego amare habeo, I have to love.

As regards prepositions, Mr. Farrar observes that it is the case which indicates the meaning of the preposition, and not the preposition which gives the meaning to the case. Every preposition has its distinct meaning, which meaning varies according to the cases with which it is connected. It is no doubt very difficult, perhaps impossible, in our present state of knowledge of the subject, to determine exactly how the central or original meaning of a preposition ramifies into its derived senses. It would, therefore, be difficult to establish the truth of the assertion which Mr. Farrar makes, and to which we give our hearty assent, that it is inaccurate to talk of prepositions governing cases; since they rather denote the exact sense in which the case is used. He says:—

It is the case which borrows the aid of the preposition, not the preposition which requires the case. It should be observed also that when prepositions appear to change their meanings with the cases which they follow, it is really a difference in the meaning, not of the preposition, but of the case.—P. 95.

There are some explanations given here and there by Mr. Farrar from which we dissent, and sometimes he expresses his meaning in a way which puzzles us. We do not know whether to agree or differ. This is perhaps in some cases unavoidable, especially when distinctions of meaning are so refined as in Greek as to scarcely be admit of equivalents in English. For instance, in his notice of ἔς, ἔως, with a past tense of the indicative—e.g.

ἔς τὴν ῥηλικὴν καὶ αὐτὴν ἡλικίαν,

in the Œdipus Tyrannus. Now in this case we object equally to the rendering with which Mr. Farrar finds fault and to the one which he himself has given. He says:—"These passages are sometimes rendered 'in which case I should have been, &c.'; the negative μή shows that such a rendering is incorrect." But the English he has given is still less admissible—"that I might have been." The proper rendering is so had I been, implying just enough of purpose to account for the negative form μή being used, and excluding the possibility of the more direct negative οὐ being used.

Under this head we notice his explanation of the use of the same particles with the optative and the subjunctive in the same sentence, which he explains somewhat roughly by a reference to a note in Arnold's Thucydides, which is true as far as it goes, ascribing the change of mood to the fact that a succession of consequences is indicated. We must be allowed to express our surprise at so good a scholar as Mr. Farrar referring to Dr. Arnold as an authority. Whatever were the merits of the late celebrated Head-Master of Rugby, Greek scholarship assuredly was not among his strong points. In translating such passages into English, no such distinction of meaning can be represented; yet in the Greek the writer, by the change of mood, shows that in one case the writer throws himself more into the subjective view of the matter than he does in the other. The subjunctive is more graphic than the optative.

We suppose that the page which we have been discussing has been unlucky in the printing. It contains no fewer than three wrong references. Let us not, however, part from Mr. Farrar without adding that his book, in spite of faults of judgment or of printing, is the most useful work on the subject that we have seen.

MACLEOD'S CHARACTER SKETCHES.

DR. MACLEOD is an able and a practised writer. This little book of Character Sketches shows a certain literary facility, and, as we need hardly add, preserves throughout an excellent moral tone. Moreover, as it is obviously intended to meet the tastes of a class not likely to be very exacting in points of delicate criticism, it would be out of place to judge it by a very exalted standard. The stories are the common compromise between a fiction and a sermon. They are good reading on week-days for people who regard it as somehow savouring of a wicked complacency with the world to read purely secular novels; or perhaps they may be considered as Sunday reading for the less perfect race of beings which requires lighter sustenance than sermons on a Scotch Sabbath. At any rate they are harmless, and at times rather better than harmless. Dr. Macleod is not without a sense of humour, though, to do him justice, it is kept within the bounds of the very strictest decorum. Thus, for example, the first story, called "Billy Buttons," may be considered as a dilution of Bret Harte's powerful sketch, The Luck of Roaring Camp. The motive is the same, though the scenery is different. The arrival of an infant, whose mother dies at its birth, takes place amongst a set of rough sailors instead of a body of Californian rowdies. The captain is supposed to swear, but his oaths are judiciously kept in the background; and Dr. Macleod does not permit himself to paint to the life the manners of a class of men who, to say the truth, are frequently as coarse in their language as any set of gamblers and gold-hunters that ever congregated in the Californian diggings. The contrast between innocence and brutality is therefore considerably softened; but there are touches of humour which show that if the Doctor were not to some extent hampered by his clerical character, he could probably produce some startling effects. We have, for example, the funeral of the unfortunate mother; and after the Captain has said the Lord's Prayer, he turns to the crew and says, "My lads, I will now serve you out an extra glass of grog" by way of an appropriate conclusion to the ceremony. That is a good touch; and on the whole our chief fault with this little story is that Dr. Macleod, like most landmen, rather overdoes the peculiarities of nautical conversation. Sailors, so far as we have the honour of their acquaintance, are not much in the habit of referring to their early lives in such highly metaphorical terms as these:—"I can't remember how I looked when launched, and before I was rigged and left port." However, it is necessary to obtain the proper local colouring by some means or other, and perhaps we should not look into the details too closely.

The book at large will of course suffer in the eyes of cynical readers by the obtrusiveness of the moral embodied in each story; and we fancy that it will suffer also in the eyes of some who would not describe themselves as cynical. We do not speak of the general question of the propriety of making fiction subservient to moralising; for the objections to such a course apply chiefly to books of a more ambitious order. But we confess to being a little annoyed by the vein of sentiment itself. It is always rather difficult to indicate with any precision the disagreeable element which mixes itself with very excellent exhortations to sobriety, prudence, faith in God, and other undeniable virtues. Each sentiment by itself is perhaps unimpeachable, and yet the whole does not strike us as very elevating, though it is certainly moral. Perhaps we may say that in general the preaching is a little too much of that placid and contented kind which is perfectly satisfied with all the current platitudes, and amounts to saying, with more or less circumlocution, that everything is for the best in this best of all possible worlds, because people can make themselves very comfortable who save their money instead of drinking it. The preaching savours more of Franklin than of Pascal, and is decidedly more calculated for a warm tradesman with a balance at his banker's than for persons in a position more favourable to exciting the deeper spiritual emotions. When the Calvinism of the genuine old Scotch Covenanter has been softened down by modern influences, the poetry is apt to disappear along with the intensity of his terrible faith. Let us take a specimen or two of Dr. Macleod's moralising, which may illustrate the degree in which these remarks are applicable. We fancy that in most of his pattern characters a little too much prominence is given to the virtues thus summed up in reference to a certain model advocate of Savings Banks; "You have always good clothes," says the prodigal to whom he is talking, "pay for your seat in church, educate your children, are never behindhand with your rent, run no long accounts in the shops, and buy in the cheapest market." Somehow we cannot help fancying that in a story written south of the Tweed we should probably have seen in the place of that last cardinal virtue some such statement as that the model of prudence could always help a friend in distress. But the general tone of the remarks leads us to believe that good people in Scotland never are in distress; or perhaps that people in distress are never good, which is not quite an identical proposition. The same admirable person of whom we are speaking has been smashing his friend's Radical principles. "Tell me, Peter, seriously," asks Walter, "do you not think we are terribly oppressed?" To which the admirable Peter replies that there are no doubt evils from which all classes suffer, and which are being gradually remedied; "but depend upon it, my lad, that by far the worst evils, the most difficult to remedy, are those which men bring upon themselves." That is the Conservative working-man in a nutshell, and no doubt it is a perfectly satisfactory solution of the whole difficulty to Peter, who is never behindhand with his rent. Still we would suggest to Dr. Macleod that optimism of this kind is apt to be rather provoking to those to whom it is so fluently administered. It sounds rather like saying, If you are thoroughly and systematically selfish, if you always buy in the cheapest market, and are, in short, a good pawky Scotchman, you may escape the misery from which a vast mass of your fellow-countrymen are suffering. It is replying to people who complain of pauperism that it serves the paupers right. And why? Walter might ask. The answer would of course be, Because the paupers have been improvident. But is not the very point of my complaint, he might perhaps retort, precisely that the conditions of society are such as to foster improvidence? There are many replies which might be made to him, which would, as we certainly do not dispute, show the impolicy, and even the wickedness, of his subversive schemes; but to make them satisfactorily, Peter would have to go into the matter rather more deeply than is implied in his argument that people who attend sufficiently to making money can get out of the scrape.

A little further on, again, we have the normal infidel, who is to be converted from his irreligious ways by his model son, wee Davie, who takes almost as long about dying as Paul Dombey, and is the occasion of a good deal of eloquence from the admirable minister. Of the infidelity we have nothing to say; but the infidel adds another vice to his theoretical errors. He had formed the habit of going to a public-house on pay-nights. He was never, it seems, the worse for liquor; but he liked a chat with half-a-dozen old companions over a glass of whisky; he enjoyed singing a few songs and telling stories about "the tyrannical influence which some would presume to exercise on innocent social enjoyment"; and the consequence was—not that the sinner became a drunkard, or beat his wife, or ill treated his boy—but that his wages were lessened by the amount of the publican's gains. However it is truly remarked that he might have become worse in time; and accordingly the good influence of his boy causes the father to give up a practice of which it might possibly have been the result that his boy would have been sent to the workhouse. Of course it is very proper that between public-houses and tracts there should be an internecine war; and yet we don't feel clear that Mr. Thorburn the smith was necessarily and unequivocally improved when he gave up his only form of social indulgence in order to save every penny for his family. If he was flying from temptation, he was so far doing right; but he may have been changing into a Pharisee after being a prodigal; and from our knowledge of Dr. Macleod's countrymen, we think a word or two of warning in this direction might possibly have been useful. It is better to read the Bible at home than to sing songs at a public-house; but is there no connexion between the facts that Scotland is at once amongst the most drunken and the most rigidly puritanical of countries? Dr. Macleod is a little too fond of his commonplaces, and too apt to forget that all commonplaces have a reverse to them. To take an instance of a different kind, he writes a story to show that we ought not to believe in ghosts. It is not, perhaps, a very logical argument against supernatural apparitions to say that on one occasion a supposed ghost turned out to be a cat which had been caught by a fishhook; but that is the form of syllogism employed by all moralists. Let us, however, look at Dr. Macleod's moral. "All forms of superstition," he says, "are forms of unbelief," because they imply a distrust in a watchful Providence. This is one of the favourite retorts upon sceptics in which divines take a pardonable delight. The infidel likes to call all religious beliefs forms of superstition; and it is pleasant to invert the argument; we would suggest, however, that the argument is really altogether beside the purpose. The Highlander, says Dr. Macleod, believes in a "waterhorse," or kelpie, because he does not believe in Providence. A Highlander would utterly deny the imputation, and, we think, with perfect justice. He believes in Providence just as much as Dr. Macleod; but why should he think that a belief in Providence is more inconsistent with a belief in kelpies than with a belief in sharks? Dr. Macleod, we fancy, would be very much afraid of swimming in a creek infested with sharks, however firm may be his reliance on Providence; and the Highlander has just as good a right to be afraid of swimming in a lake infested by a kelpie. The real difference is simply that the Highlander has one belief more than Dr. Macleod, and, as the belief is an absurd one, he is a fool for his pains. It is a mere juggle of words to twist an attack upon a man for believing too much into an attack upon him for believing too little. It would be better and more honest to admit, what is surely a very harmless proposition, that a man may be too credulous, without trying to confound credulity with its logical antithesis, scepticism. They may sometimes have similar results, but that is a very bad reason for confounding them under the same name.

However, we are going into too elaborate a discussion of a very trifling point. We were merely endeavouring to illustrate the fact that Dr. Macleod has a little too much of the habit caught in the pulpit of treating us to very shallow commonplaces which are supposed to be excusable on account of their good moral tendency. In other words, his stories are too much of the ordinary type of religious tracts, and provoke opposition by an excess of complacent optimism. Otherwise we have no great fault to find with them.

EASTLAKE'S GOTHIC REVIVAL.*

(Second Notice.)

THE career of Augustus Pugin marks the turning-point at which the merely literary and antiquarian study of English Gothic architecture passed into the further stage of the practical resuscitation of the style. Mr. Eastlake does ample justice to the versatile genius of this most remarkable artist. And yet, had he known Pugin personally, he would have been, we think, still warmer in his appreciation of the uprightness, the geniality, the earnestness of the man. There is no doubt that a prodigious effect on the public mind was produced by the famous Contrasts; in which, with unmatchable skill of drawing, the actual degradation of modern church architecture and arrangement was contrasted with an idealized reproduction of the past. A long series of publications showed that Pugin was as much a master of the pen as of the pencil. It is to be regretted that this great artist never had an opportunity (as he used often to complain) of building a really fine church; but we see no reason to question Mr. Eastlake's opinion that Pugin's invention and imagination were superior to his constructive skill, and that his architectonic science bore no proportion to his mastery of subsidiary detail. His connexion with Sir Charles Barry in the completion of the Houses of Parliament is discreetly handled in these pages. By far the happiest work of Pugin, in our opinion, is his own unpretending little church at Ramsgate, of which a charming interior view is given as one of the few illustrations of these pages.

The history of the choice of Barry's design for the Houses of Parliament is told by Mr. Eastlake in a very interesting narrative. He might have spoken more strongly perhaps on the subject of the destruction of St. Stephen's Chapel. An unsuccessful effort to preserve this beautiful ruin was, we believe, the occasion of the first communication between Mr. Gilbert Scott and the Cambridge Camden Society in its very earliest days. It may be reasonably doubted whether even the adoption of a variety of the national Gothic style for the Palace of Westminster would have turned the scale in the most critical moment of the Revival, had not a new and much more powerful influence manifested itself at this very time. This was the great religious movement of this century in the bosom of the Church of England. The apathy and neglect of two centuries had suffered the old parochial churches to fall into a state of decay and squalor which the present generation would not believe to have been possible save for the evidence of the pictures in Pugin's Contrasts, already referred to. Comparatively few new churches had been built. And no wonder, so long as monasteries like New St. Pancras, costing tens of thousands of pounds, were all that the modern school of architects could produce. But now church expansion and church restoration became crying wants of the day. The "restoration" of churches has indeed been carried since those days to such a lamentable excess that many persons are inclined to wish it had never been thought of. But those who can remember how absolutely necessary it was, even for the common decency of divine worship, thirty years ago, will regret, not the fact, but the too sweeping mode in which church restoration was at first conducted. Societies for the study of Gothic architecture were founded, almost simultaneously, in the two ancient Universities about the year 1839. Of these the Oxford Architectural Society took the safer line of archaeological investigation into the past. The Cambridge Camden Society, on the other hand, threw itself with remarkable energy into the practical task of showing how old churches were to be repaired and new ones built. From that date, for the next quarter of a century, the history of the Gothic revival, notably in its ecclesiastical aspect, but indirectly also in its secular side, is to be read in the Eccelesiologist, the periodical organ of the Cambridge Society. Mr. Eastlake seems to us to have written the history of this academical movement with commendable fairness and accuracy. He has skillfully discerned the special peculiarity of the relation between the Ecclesiological Society (as it was called after its removal to London) and the leading Gothic architects of the day, which enabled the Committee to obtain the aid of all the more ardent members of the profession, while its own criticisms, being unprofessional, were listened to without jealousy by all alike.—

It is to be noted [he says] that although the Cambridge Camden Society reckoned among its members many architects of high repute, whose advice and assistance were always available, and fully rendered, it selected its working committee entirely from amateurs. By this rule, which from first to last was strictly maintained, the infringement of professional etiquette was avoided.

It is not a little remarkable that Mr. Eastlake, who has evidently gone to the best sources of information for the compilation of this part of his history, has made no mention of the first non-literary work of the Cambridge Camden Society, the famous restoration of the Round Church of St. Sepulchre. Had he known Cambridge personally, this omission would have been impossible. We cannot help noticing also that, in the enumeration of the names of those who, though not Cambridge men by education, joined the Committee when the Society had moved to London, there is a most unfortunate omission. The late William Scott, a man not less gifted in this than in almost every other branch of mental culture—quis desiderio sit pudor aut modus tam cari capitis—was for many years one of the most active members of the governing body, and a constant contributor to the pages of the Eccelesiologist. One subject was more particularly his own. Mr. Scott, after a visit to Madeira for his health, devoted much thought to the conditions of the Gothic style as modified by tropical, or semi-tropical, climate.

Proceeding in his history of the chief architects of the Gothic revival and their works, Mr. Eastlake does adequate justice to the great merits of Carpenter, in whose early death the movement lost one of its most promising artists. Mr. Gilbert Scott, Mr. Ferrey, and Mr. Butterfield come next into prominence. It is quite true, as our historian says, that the countless works of the first of these would require a whole volume for their description. But that is no reason why this very distinguished artist should occupy less space in the present volume than many less eminent men. It is remarkable how many of our leading architects have achieved literary as well as artistic success. Mr. Gilbert Scott, Mr. E. Sharp, and Mr. Street are alike examples of this, and Mr. Eastlake himself may be added to the number. It would have been a better plan, perhaps, if Mr. Eastlake had chronicled in successive chapters the contemporaneous stages of the Gothic revival in its two great aspects—the literary and the material. As it is, the writers and the builders are too often mixed up together. Mr. Petit, Mr. Edward Freeman, Mr. F. A. Paley, and Mr. J. H. Parker come in for adequate notice; and the great value of the Builder—which has done for the secular side of the revival what the Eccelesiologist did for the ecclesiastical—is not overlooked in its proper place. On the other hand, Professor Willis might fairly complain of being undervalued, nor has Mr. Gambier Parry received sufficient acknowledgment. The translation of Durandus on Symbolism by Mr. Neale and Mr. Webb, in 1843, is credited with great influence on the progress of the revival, not without a kindly smile at the extravagance of the mediæval symbolist. But the effect which that publication produced was due not so much to the quaint fancies of Durandus as to the introductory essay on what the joint authors called "sacramentality," but which was, in fact, on truthfulness, reality, and significance in design. It was on account of the novelty of this argument (which preceded Mr. Ruskin's architectural writings) that this essay received the honour of translation into French. We may observe here, in passing, that Mr. Eastlake has missed the opportunity of comparing the English revival of Gothic with the contemporaneous movements in the like direction in France and Germany. M. Viollet le Duc is, we believe, the only foreign writer or artist that is mentioned. Lamm and Dittion, in France; Reichensperger, Schmidt, and Stutz, in Germany; and Cuypers, in Holland, might have received a passing notice. Their influence may not have been very direct, but the subject is one which should not be treated in a merely insular aspect. At least the great triumph of Messrs. Clutton and Burgess, and Mr. Street, in the international competition for Lille Cathedral in 1867, would have legitimately found a place in Mr. Eastlake's pages. Mr. Ruskin and Mr. Bursford Hope, as important contributors to the literary side of the revival among ourselves, are consistently noticed. The latter of these is no more the case. He has had no small share in the practical development of the revival. St. Edmund's Church, in Kent, St. Augustine's College, Canterbury, and All Saints' Church, Margaret Street, are inseparably connected with his name. All Saints' indeed is, in a great measure, the structural monument of the Ecclesiastical school in the movement. It exhibited the first attempt at original development of the Gothic style from the copyism which had hitherto prevailed. Mr. Butterfield has vigorously carried out this type in other noble works, such as Rebol College Chapel and St. Alban's Church, in Holborn. His latest work, Keble College, Oxford, seems to us, we confess—as it does to Mr. Eastlake—a specimen of the degeneration of the style. Other architects, following especially Mr. Ruskin's lead, advanced in another direction—that of foreign, and especially Italian, Gothic. Among these is the most eminent of the younger school, Mr. Street, whose Law Courts when they are finished will, we believe, convince even obstinate gainsayers of the fitness of English Gothic for secular purposes. For the Battle of the Styles, as it is called, is not yet fought out, nor yet the subsidiary battle of the phases of Gothic itself, on which Mr. Eastlake is amusingly precise in chronicling the variations of style among the Gothic leaders, in which, however, he might have included some notice of the progressive growth of Mr. Scott's manner under the successive influences of German and Italian Gothic. Other names, such as Mr. J. L. Pearson, Mr. W. White, Mr. Waterhouse, Mr. Burgess, Mr. Slater, Mr. Bodley, Mr. Seddon, Mr. St. Aubyn, and Mr. Brooks, find their proper place in Mr. Eastlake's review; and there are many more, of course, who either are mentioned or might have been mentioned in this history. But the line must be drawn somewhere. It must have been a difficult task to avoid hurting many susceptibilities in the compilation of the later chapters of this history; and we may fairly congratulate Mr. Eastlake, on the whole, on his general impartiality and tact. The revival of Ecclesiastical Gothic in England has been mainly the work of the Church of England. The Roman Catholic body has never given its full adhesion to the movement. Cardinal Wiseman, indeed, is understood to have warmly preferred the Italian style to the last. Nevertheless, there have been, besides Pugin, several very able designers belonging to that communion, such as Mr. Hadfield, Mr. Nicholl, and Mr. Goldie. Mr. Eastlake has nothing to say, we believe, on the attempts to revive Gothic among the Nonconformists, and he has wholly forgotten the competition for the Law Courts. On the other hand, the notices of the most conspicuous new Gothic churches in London are very fairly complete. But the subject on which Mr. Eastlake most warmly expatiates is that development of freely handled Gothic in private residences in which Mr. Nesfield and Mr. Norman Shaw have made themselves conspicuous. Mr. Norman Shaw's peculiar facility in accommodating the principles of our indigenous Tudor to the wants of the reign of Victoria is shown in more than one illustration. It is curious that the one specimen of Mr. Burgess which is chosen for illustration should be a country house. Perhaps his magnum opus, Cork Cathedral, is excluded for geographical reasons; but we cannot accept the selected mansion as an adequate presentment of his powers. A fragment of his tendered design for the Law Courts would have been more to the purpose. It is to be hoped that any new edition of this book that may be called for will be "posted up" to meet the further growth of the Gothic revival. We have little doubt, for our own part, that many additional chapters will require to be written before the neo-Gothic shall cease to be a living style.

A BRIDGE OF GLASS.*

THERE is no saying what people may or may not do when in a state of chronic idiocy or intermittent madness. The possibilities of human action are great, and no man has yet exhausted them; but we do not often come across such extraordinary methods of procedure as those common among the actors in A Bridge of Glass. In the everyday world, lawyers when one's affairs go cross, doctors when one is ill, and even the police when one's neighbours annoy one, play not unimportant parts; and business in business, and is conducted more or less according to rules and prescriptions. But A Bridge of Glass deals with a world where business habits are apparently unknown; where everybody manages his own little affairs with an originality and independence which would be profoundly embarrassing to the ordinary citizen; and where events go in a series of surprises, sudden, startling, unexpected, and unprepared for, and as little according to the gradual growth, the bit by bit evolution of action as we find it in real life, as a kangaroo's leaps are like a man's walk.

One of the peculiarities of the people of this book is that they are mainly nocturnal animals, and roam about at night as if they were beasts of prey. At the least excitement they are delivered from the vulgar need of sleep, and set themselves to scour the country, wet or fair; turning up in all manner of unexpected places at any time between midnight and morning. And as almost all the dramatic persons have this propensity, it can easily be imagined what marvellous things they see and hear, and how every one is playing at hide and seek with everybody else, with the dead certainty of being found out surreptitiously. Another odd feature in this book is the confusion of classes, and the more than republican equality of intercourse that pervades it. Countesses and farmers; viscounts and farmers' daughters; clerks at shabby offices on eighty pounds a year, and well-to-do Q.C.'s living in grand West-end squares; ragged beggar-girls sleeping by the roadside, and sparkling doubtful English when they wake, and possessors of the realm; a high-shouldered poet, not above blacking his own boots, with five lords and ladies under his thumb—here they all are, mixed up together in a kind of social old padside, like to nothing on this side the globe, and, we should say, like to nothing on the other. Plots and counterplots exercise the ingenuity of the author and the intellectual perspicacity of the reader; spies who are in the pay of the one side and the service of the other, and who apparently are of no use to either, give occasion for a mild amount of curiosity as to what they really are, and to which party they are de facto loyal; secrets kept, now from the reader and now from certain of the actors, set a flood of guesses loose around the questions—who was the murderer? what was the mystery of widow Bennett's communications? when will Clem be told the truth? will Matthew triumph in the end, or that diabolical old Countess with her white face and her limp? will her habit of nocturnal prowling give her the last advantage, or will Matthew, with his variation of occasional sleep-walking, checkmate her abominable plots? will the good-for-nothing Viscount be kind enough to die and relieve poor Hesbie from her thralldom, or will fate and Nemesis prove too strong for her, and will she have to "dree her weird" to the bitter end? Guesses of this kind beguile the pages of the Bridge of Glass, as betting on the white horse used to beguile the coach-top journey; but the writer is merciful, and one sees every now and then a glimpse of the various solutions sought for, as we used to see the whisk of a white tail behind the distant hedge before the stage was done.

The motto of this book sufficiently indicates its intention:—

What a bridge
Of glass I walk upon, over a river
Of certain ruin.

Which is true enough for most of us; few of the sons of Adam or the daughters of Eve being fortunate enough to escape any such perilous roadway during their lives. But it is rare to find in one small village such a collection of glass bridges spanning such terrible rivers of ruin as Mr. Robinson has built up for us. For not only does the wicked old Countess limp over her glass bridge with no chance of getting on solid ground until she steps into the dark security of the grave, but every one else has his or her glass bridge also, where one unlucky fracture would tumble the miserable pedestrian headlong into destruction. Even Matthew the poet, a man blameless in his own life, and doing as he thinks best for the one dearest to him, deals with deception and suppression of the truth, unjust preference, and the unpardonable offence of acting for the brother without that brother's concurrence. He manipulates Clement's circumstances and irrevocably fixes them for life, keeping him ignorant of all that he ought to know, because he wishes to spare him the pain of a difficult decision for the first part—though Clem is no fool, and is well able to decide—and because he is in love with cousin Hesbie, and therefore desires to serve her for the second; hence he is always in terror lest Clem should come to a knowledge of the truth, and nullify the contract he has made with the usurper. Hesbie naturally has her bridge too, and that not a very safe one, when she consents to run away with Viscount Pounie, to whose mother she has been a kind of companion; and Viscount Pounie, who shares with the Earl his father and the Countess his mother the secret of their illegal possession and the fact that they are not the Earl and Countess Coldtown at all, nor is the Viscount Pounie, has his full share of slippery steps on an uncertain road. In fact, the only person among them all who walks as an honest man should, and who has no river of ruin running beneath his feet from which he is separated only by a frail partition, is Clement Quail, the poet's brother, who seems to us to be the shuttlecock and victim of everybody.

First, he is in love with Hesbie, and is allowed to be engaged to her after the proper amount of opposition from her father. He comes home, after an absence of four years in China, full of hope and happiness and energy, and with a beautiful brown tan on his face. But Hesbie has by this time fallen in love with Viscount Pounie; and instead of reciprocating her lover's raptures at their reunion, meets him with more than maidenly reserve, and something less than cousinly kindness; and in the second interview "declares off," and breaks the engagement. This is poor Clem's first ugly fall; and his sorrows are not assuaged when, on the night following this rude and sudden contact with earth after his lover-like flight to heaven, as he and his brother are shaking hands over his trouble—and Matthew's secret—Lady Coldtown comes knocking at the farmhouse door, bringing, as she says, "bad news"; to wit, that her companion, Hesbie Grace, Farmer Grace's daughter and cousin of the two Quails, has eloped with her son Viscount Pounie. The scene between this eccentric lady and what Mr. Robinson calls the "grim triumvirate" is immensely funny as a serious relation of possibilities; as a melodrama, scornful of all commonsense rules, it may perhaps pass. But after Farmer Grace has quietly asserted that he will kill Viscount Pounie "like a rabbit," and Clem has put in a generous word for the girl, and Matthew has insinuated something to the Countess which only he and she understand, and they have all been spasmodic and stagg, he, Matthew, insists on accompanying her home; and then the secret partially uncloses. Matthew is Earl of Coldtown, and somebody has murdered the beggar girl. Of course, if Matthew pressed his claims, it would be all the better for Clem; but the rights of this honest-hearted, brown-faced young man, do not seem to trouble his loving brother; and Matthew enters into an agreement to waive his own, consequently his brother's, claim, on consideration that the Viscount shall marry Hesbie, and so make an honest woman of her in the eyes of the world, though she is still one in fact. Thus poor Clem loses both his wife and his prospective title at one blow, and soon after he loses his situation, and is glad to keep himself from starving on eighty pounds a year. Fortune, represented by Mr. Robinson, certainly makes no favourite of this young man. He gets into an electioneering row, and is dragged out of it more dead than alive, with a broken arm and a head considerably the worse from untimely contact with a horse's hoofs; but as the Q. C.'s niece, Fanny Redbridge, a young maiden of about twenty or so, nurses him assiduously, and as he falls in love with her in consequence, perhaps his disaster this time may be taken to mean a mercy in disguise. Still it is not all plain sailing even now, and there are perplexing complications with Hesbie and Fanny, and claims on the one side, and renunciations on the other, which keep up the shuttlecock character for some time yet. For, by reason of the Viscount having broken his neck through tumbling into, or rather down, the trap which the limping old Countess has set open at night for the somnambulant Matthew, Hesbie is free to fall in love over again with Clem; which she does by no means uncertainly or with undue reticence. And as Fanny is generous and fond of Lady Pounie, besides having the loving woman's modest idea that she is not worthy of her hero, she bravely suppresses herself and tells stories; and Clem is led the traditional dance between the one who will when he will not, and the other who will not when he would.

There is a creditable attempt at character in this queer book, but character for the most part of a distorted and exaggerated kind. The dreamy, high-shouldered poet, who lives alone in his small cottage, and transacts his business by methods unknown to ordinary men; his active, brisk, and hopeful brother, strong, brave, and also doing what he has to do by unlikely means; the Earl, a sketchy old dotard, whom a schoolboy would have termed a "duffer"; Farmer Grace, coarse but honest, and his wife peevish but a slave; Hesbie, with her vacillation of feeling, her vanity, and her truth—these are creatures something like the flesh-and-blood brothers and sisters with whom we sit down to dinner and share our hymn-books at church. Fanny Redbridge also is a nice little colourless maiden of everyday life, dressed in good taste, and not likely to strike out an independent path anyhow. But the wicked old Countess, with her limp and her midnight prowlings, her murderous fingers and her burglarious capacities; the Viscount her son, who has wooed for passion and is married by force, and who openly tells his wife that he has flung her into the way of her cousin, the eighty pounds a year clerk, in the hope of occasion for a divorce; and Hannah Bennett, who reads like a fragment of Mr. Henry Kingsley, are all melodramatic and unlikely, and the book would have been much improved by their removal. This combination of realism and melodrama rarely answers; the one makes the other tame on this side, monstrous on the other. It is a jangle of discords, where the only fault lies in an inharmonious combination, not in the notes themselves. Melodrama is at all times a doubtful kind of thing to deal with, and realism, tenderly, truthfully, and delicately rendered, is a far wholesomer intellectual diet. A Bridge of Glass may amuse some of its readers, but they will not be of the more critical kind, or those who have cultivated a keen sense of the fitness of things.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

A MEMOIR of President Tyler* by a leading Virginian statesman cannot be devoid of personal and historical interest, however useless it may seem to revive in such a work the memory of political controversies belonging to a bygone state of things, and to renew on paper the discussion of issues long since decided by the sword. Mr. Wise, however, has views of his own upon the questions in which he bore an active part, and upon the various points of that great sectional dispute which was finally settled against his countrymen on the 9th of April, 1865; and he takes this opportunity of discussing the exact nature of the Constitution, and the precise duties and functions of States and Citizens under the Union as it stood in 1860. We should have thought it safer to rest the case of the South on two unquestionable facts; first, that several of the States in accepting the Union expressly reserved the right of secession; secondly, that the Convention of 1787, after full discussion, distinctly refused to the Federal Government the right of coercing a State by force of arms. But Mr. Wise prefers a point of view from which he thinks it possible to establish the illegality of all that Congress has done since the close of the war to extinguish the independent powers of the States and the liberties of the South. A very considerable part of his volume is devoted to these discussions. Its historical passages are chiefly remarkable for the light they throw on certain critical periods of American history, and particularly on the Presidency of General Jackson, from which dates the modern demoralization of American statesmen and American politics. The elevation of a man honest in his way, but ignorant, violent, and reckless in an extraordinary degree, to a position of enormous and practically irresponsible power, led to the overthrow of all the moral restraints recognized by the cultivated and well-trained statesmen who had preceded him—restraints without which no mere legal checks can render a free Constitution workable—and opened the way for a flood of political corruption which since that time has never subsided. The recklessness of law, of truth, and of all conventional rules of equity and honour which characterized the conduct of General Jackson; his determination to sweep away all opposition, internal or external, to his own policy; the violence of his action, and the unscrupulousness of his intrigues, are here exposed by one who was behind the scenes at the time, and has since had access to the public and private documents bearing upon the events of that day. Of the subsequent petty struggles in which he acted with Mr. Tyler, down to the death of the latter in 1862, while Southern hopes were still high, Mr. Wise gives a clear, though often a very brief account; and on the whole his book has this advantage over most American biographies, that the narrative is short, and, but for the interspersed political disquisitions, close and consecutive, and not overloaded by needless masses of uninteresting letters and unnecessary documents.

We have recently had occasion (Saturday Review, February 10, 1872) to speak in some detail of the career of Benjamin Thompson, Count Rumford. Very few lives afford more curious and interesting material to the biographer, or demand from him a deeper insight into the eccentricities of exceptional natures, and a more painstaking search for the motives and circumstances that governed a career altogether outside the average experience even of men of genius.* Endowments so various and so remarkable, fortunes so diversified, a life spent in great employments, and yet appearing altogether to have missed its fitting goal, marked by many great successes in utterly different fields of enterprise, yet on the whole scarcely to be regarded as other than a failure, require a very unusual discernment of character if the biography is not to be as fragmentary and incoherent as the life itself appears. A yeoman's son in Massachusetts; an apprentice; a student of science, with scarcely any means of regular study; an officer in the Colonial Militia; a suspected Royalist; a proscribed and banished Tory; an exile promoted to high office in England; a Royalist soldier in America; a wanderer once more out of employment, and finding favour in foreign Courts; a Minister in Bavaria, again advanced to high military promotion, and proving himself one of the ablest commissaries of his day; a Count of the Holy Roman Empire; an Ambassador to the Court of his native Sovereign, though not received as such; in his later life, again a devotee of science and philanthropy; the founder of the Royal Institution, the reformer of the German poor-law system, the inventor of stoves and kitchen-ranges, the deviser of the "English Garden" in Munich—Count Rumford displayed in every one of his various pursuits talents and resources which might have raised him to lasting fame, and yet he left behind him the reputation of eccentricity rather than of genius, of an adventurer rather than a statesman, a speculator rather than a discoverer. The peculiarities of character and fortune which brought about this result, which made the Count so successful in individual undertakings, yet so little successful upon the whole, which made him so popular in society, yet so unhappy in his domestic relations, Mr. Ellis has not succeeded in tracing, nay, hardly attempts to trace. As an American, he occupies more space than the true proportions of the subject demand with the discussion of his hero's relations with his native country; but even here, though in possession of special information, he fails distinctly to explain the real position of Mr. Thompson at the outbreak of the Colonial war, and, in trying to avoid imputations on either side, he leaves on the reader's mind a certain suspicion, which arises more than once in the course of the narrative, of the good faith and trustworthiness of the brilliant subject of the memoir. The story of such a career cannot be otherwise than interesting; but we hardly think that Mr. Ellis has done full justice to materials which should have made his volume one of the most popular and attractive of the season.

A really good life of the great Confederate General, as well as a Confederate history of the war, worthy of the name, is still a desideratum. One very creditable, though imperfect, account of General Lee's campaigns we have already noticed; another is now before us, somewhat less agreeable and genial in tone, but still painstaking and candid.† It is obvious that, unless the General himself should have left behind him materials for a history of the Virginian struggle—a task which he attempted, but in which he was greatly hindered by the destruction of his papers (by whom?)—any satisfactory narrative must be looked for from the few survivors of those who served with him in high positions. No one else can possess that intimate knowledge of facts which is necessary to an intelligible account of military operations; still less can any stranger to the head-quarters staff be expected to possess that personal acquaintance with the views and conduct of its chief which would be naturally desired in a biographer. With the domestic life of the General the present writer does not pretend to any acquaintance; in fact, he obviously knows nothing more of General Lee than might be known by any Virginian gentleman who had access to the ordinary sources of information respecting the previous records of the United States army, and who had been in communication with the Confederate leaders, civil and military, during and since the Civil War. His book, therefore, can do little more than recall what was known already. Concerning the youth and manhood of his hero Mr. McCabe can tell us nothing beyond his pedigree and the public mention of his services in the Mexican war; concerning his last years, all he has to say is summed up in a few paragraphs; and his history of the Virginian campaigns is neither valuable for new information nor particularly remarkable for clearness and vigour of style. It can at most only remind us how admirably General Lee conducted the struggle against tremendous odds and under terrible disadvantages; how his wise forbearance and Christian chivalry contrasted with the braggart arrogance and wanton violence of such antagonists as Hooker and Pope. In one respect, however, Mr. McCabe's narrative is original; but unhappily on that point it exhibits so marked a bias that we are inclined to distrust it. According to him, much of the difficulty and failure which attended the efforts of General Lee was caused by the mismanagement of the Government, and especially by the incompetence of the Commissary-General, and the obstinacy of President Davis. It is only fair to say that we have heard from other, and perhaps more impartial, sources a somewhat similar statement; that men who have no grudge against Mr. Davis insist that he was too confident in his own private knowledge and estimate of the men he chose to employ, some of whom he had known but imperfectly and very long before; and that when he had once appointed a man, he stood by him in spite of all representations, and against the most violent storms of public displeasure. But it is also just to say that we believe—and the biographer substantially admits—that General Lee, who must have been the chief and most conscious sufferer by such faults, never was said to have given any countenance to the charges against Mr. Davis, but, on the contrary, seems to have trusted him entirely, and to have been entirely trusted by him. Another of Mr. McCabe's criticisms is more novel, and perhaps more worthy of confidence, inasmuch as American writers are not, like Englishmen, prone to bestow lavish censure on the general body of their countrymen. The author points out that the Southern people were very long in learning the real character of the struggle on which they had entered, or appreciating the resolution and the power of their enemy; that after Manassas they believed the war to be at an end, and that the army nearly dissolved itself in consequence; that many of the disasters in the West were in great measure owing to this folly; and that at the commencement of the Virginian campaign of 1862, and on other critical occasions, the rolls of the Virginian army contained thousands of names whose bearers were not present with the colours. On the whole, perhaps the most original, and therefore the most interesting, part of this volume relates to the military policy of the Confederacy, the practical difficulties found in working a Federal Constitution in time of war, and the military shortcomings of the Southern people. Its worst defect is perhaps the absence of any detailed account of the career of General Lee from his surrender to his death—a period passed in formal silence and retirement, but during which his influence on the temper and conduct of the South was incalculable, and was exercised with a wisdom, a self-denial, an abnegation of personal pride and passion, and a pure devotion to the apparent interests of his unhappy country, which displayed a truer greatness, and perhaps did more to endear him to the Southern people, than even his splendid and spotless career during the four years of the war. Never, perhaps, was a great man more severely and searchingly tried; never was a man found more thoroughly equal to the trial. The one fact that the Commander-in-Chief of the Confederate armies, who had always maintained that his allegiance was due to Virginia, and who had taken up arms simply in her defence, should have set his comrades the example of applying for that pardon which the legislation of the conquerors rendered necessary to their private peace and public usefulness, though it could be of no avail to him, affords a signal and sufficient proof of superiority to some of the deepest and most excusable of human weaknesses. A biography of General Lee which practically ends in 1865, is but a fragmentary and mutilated representation of a noble life—a story from which the finest and most striking chapter is omitted.

Mr. W. D. Kelley is not a man of great note, and most of his speeches* may be passed over without other loss than the reader sustains in missing the lesson how ingeniously even so absurd a thing as American Protection may be defended by special arguments drawn from an exceptional state of things. The theory that Free-trade exhausts soils and impoverishes farmers may seem very absurd to English economists, but it sounds like practical common sense to a politician little acquainted with general principles, who has derived his concrete ideas of policy from merely American examples, and looks to the Cotton States as the current instance of Free-trade influences. But the speeches that are really interesting are those delivered by Mr. Kelley to Southern audiences. Taking for granted that the South was wrong from first to last—wrong in demanding equal rights within the Union, as well as in seceding when they were refused—Mr. Kelley nevertheless addresses his unfortunate fellow-countrymen in a tone of sympathy, courtesy, and earnest desire to help them out of their calamities, which, in spite of the offensive assumption of superiority often implied, presents an honourable and pleasing contrast to the general tone of Republican feeling, and to that impolitic spirit of proscription which, ever since the war, has governed the conduct of Mr. Sumner and the section of which he is the leader. And the reception given to these speeches by Southern audiences in the very centres of strong Southern opinion is in itself a sufficient proof that Mr. Kelley is as wise as he is generous, and Mr. Sumner as foolish as he is spiteful. When we find that a reform of the Civil Service is gravely objected to on the ground that it would admit ex-rebels, or the sons of such, or suspected sympathizers with rebellion—that is, that Southerners and Peace Democrats might, after seven years of peace, be gradually admitted to civil office—we may well welcome such evidences of charity and good sense as Mr. Kelley's speeches afford.

One of the bitterest controversies of the war will be revived for a time by the publication of a Memoir of Colonel Ulric Dahlgren*, written by his father, Admiral Dahlgren, and published after his death by the widowed mother. Colonel Dahlgren, a promising young cavalry officer, was in March 1864 placed at the head of a chosen body of men, with orders to penetrate into Richmond, and to release the Union prisoners there. What further orders were given, what further purpose was in view, we do not venture to say. The Confederate Government believed that it was intended to attack and murder Mr. Davis and his Ministers; the Federal authorities denied the charge, as Admiral Dahlgren does, in a manner which suggested suspicions that there was something at least which would not bear avowal. The attempt failed; and in attempting to escape Dahlgren was killed and most of his party cut off. The Memoir is written in a style such as might have been permitted or forgiven at the moment to a woman maddened by grief, and knowing nothing of the laws of war, but which is highly discreditable if we are really to suppose the language to be that of an experienced officer writing years after the event. Not only are all the charges of maltreatment of Unionist prisoners revived, in the teeth of the fact that the mortality was greater in the Federal prisons, where neglect or want must have been totally without excuse, than in those of the South, under pressure at once of invasion and famine; not only are the Confederate leaders reviled as men who had no cause of war, as mere pirates and murderers; but the fact, or allegation, that an ambush was laid, into which Dahlgren and his party fell, is made an excuse for calling the Confederate guerrillas "felons," and talking about "the assassin's bullet." That men have no right to resist invasion, and that it is murder to surprise a party of the enemy who have just failed in a surprise of their own, are doctrines which we should hardly have expected from a man of Admiral Dahlgren's rank and profession; and we venture to hope that these and other extravagances which are scattered through the volume may be due to another and a less responsible hand.

Mr. Talmage's Abominations of Modern Society† is a vehement invective against what he considers the worst and most prevalent vices of American city life; grinding oppression of needlewomen by hard masters, gambling, drinking, and so forth. Much of the declamation is really vigorous and effective, and some of the descriptive passages are graphic and terribly truthful. The impression left by the denunciation of drunkenness—that alcoholic indulgence is fearfully prevalent and fearfully destructive in the better classes of American society, and all the more so because wine and beer are banished from respectable tables, and men drink not at dinner and in public, but privately and all day long—corresponds but too well with what we gather from other sources. But the wild extravagance of other passages, the denunciation of clubs as an unmixed nuisance, the attempt to suppress the use of alcohol in all forms and in any quantities, the general disregard of proportion and moderation, can only tend to disgust and alienate sensible readers.

The idea of giving life and interest to a series of travel-sketches‡, otherwise too familiar, by throwing them into the form of fiction and shaping them into the story of a wedding-tour, is not altogether novel. But it is a plan which admits of various adaptations, and is plastic enough to furnish more than one writer with a model to his mind; and Mr. Howells has contrived to work the notion into a tolerably readable letterpress, illustrated after a serio-comic fashion by Mr. Augustus Hoppin. Their Wedding Journey, from Boston to Quebec, is not very striking, but it is lively, pleasant, and sensible, and may well furnish entertainment for an idle hour.

Day's Logical Praxis§ is a brief manual of logic, with somewhat less regard for the established formularies and technical terms of the science than might be convenient to students likely to require a treatise so elementary.

THE BUDGET.

THE Budget of 1872 effects a partial rectification of the error of 1871. The burden of the Income-tax is prospectively reduced within the limits which experience has shown to be desirable; but the holders of precarious incomes during the past year can receive no compensation for the unequal pressure which they have borne. Mr. Lowe stated that within three years more than 12,000,000*l.* of debt has been paid off; and he might have added that one-fourth of the amount has been unnecessarily extorted from Income-tax payers by the addition of twopence in the pound under the third Budget of last year. It cannot be too constantly remembered by Finance Ministers that income serves as an index of taxable wealth only when it extends over a long series of years. The modern practice of meeting exceptional liabilities by a temporary increase of the rate is not the less vicious because it has been adopted in turn by both the great political parties. Mr. DISRAELI and his colleagues compelled Income tax payers to provide for the cost of the Abyssinian war, as Mr. LOWE mulcted them on account of the failure of his unhappy match-tax and of his Succession Duty. Even if no other resource could be found, the result has proved that an addition of one penny would have been amply sufficient; and half an injustice is better than the whole. The increase in the rate, together with the new rule of collection which was established two or three years ago, fully accounts for the renewed agitation against the principle of the tax. It would be far better to make the collection half-yearly at some additional cost than to place an excessive and unreasonable pressure on the needier taxpayers exactly at the time of Christmas bills. The complaints which have been urged against the alleged harshness of the assessors are probably in the majority of cases unfounded. It is necessary to check the inaccurate returns of tradesmen, but the best mode of instilling into their minds a comparative regard for honesty is to impose a low rate of duty. As Mr. Lowe observes, the productiveness of each penny in the pound varies inversely with the rate of taxation. When the tax was, in the last year of the Crimean war, raised to sixteenpence in the pound, only the most scrupulous traders could afford to keep a conscience. With only fourpence at stake many taxpayers will be inclined to make true returns.

The deduction of 8*o* l. a year from the taxable value of incomes up to 300*l.* a year approximates but remotely to the Communism which is nervously apprehended by Mr. BENTINCK. It may be roughly calculated that the owners of incomes ranging from 100*l.* to 300*l.* a year are more heavily taxed than either the richer or the poorer part of the community. In proportion to their means, the poorer middle and upper classes pay more than their share of duties on consumption; and it is reasonable that they should be allowed a certain compensation in their assessment to the Income-tax. In some cases the exemption will perhaps be unduly favourable, as when a tenant farmer of 600*l.* a year is only taxed on an income of 220*l.*; but in matters of taxation nice distinctions are impracticable, and the limit of 300*l.* is as fair as any arbitrary line which could have been drawn. It is not easy to understand Mr. Lowe's definite estimate of the number of taxpayers to whom he proposes to extend the 8*o* l. deduction. It is possible that the contributors to the tax between 200*l.* and 300*l.* a year included in several of the schedules may number 167,000; but fundholders, shareholders, mortgagees, and several other classes of taxpayers, who will be entitled to the rebate, make no separate returns. It is much to be wished that Mr. Lowe and his successors may be able and willing to avoid any further changes in the rate of Income-tax for many years. Mr. VERNON HARRINGTON is too hasty in the expression of his hope that the pressure of the tax may render it unendurable. There is no juster or less oppressive tax in the entire fiscal system of England, as long as the rate is permanent and not excessive. Nothing can be more improbable than that the present generation should consent to abandon a mode of taxation which falls but remotely and indirectly on the poorer classes, and which is collected with a minimum of expense. Those who pay the tax would be short-sighted as well as selfish in endeavouring to relieve themselves of a contribution which mitigates the invidious character of wealth. Even Schedule D. ought to satisfy itself that the community would grudge the exemption of the vast aggregate income of the bulk of the middle class. Bankers, brewers, and cotton-spinners have little reason to complain of their relation to the rest of society. Revolutionary theorists never fail to include capitalists as well as landowners among their prospective victims of spoliation.

Experience will show whether the reduction of the duty on coffee by one half will encourage consumption, or even reach the consumer. It is not understood that a corresponding operation has reduced the retail price of sugar; but in both cases the advantage which must accrue to traders will perhaps ultimately benefit the general community. There is much force in Mr. MUNZ's remark that no reduction in the coffee duty will produce much effect until coffee is made more palatable. The inability to make the most of things which distinguishes the British maid and matron is nowhere more conspicuously displayed than in the muddy decoction which passes by the name of coffee. Fortunately no amount of stupidity can altogether spoil good tea, if only the water boils. As far as the revenue is concerned, there would be little advantage in increasing the consumption of coffee to the detriment of the receipts from tea. The whole amount is so trifling that, notwithstanding Mr. Lowe's just prejudices against a free breakfast table, it may probably in a future year be worth while to relinquish the remainder of the duty. The trifling alteration in the details of the House Duty will give satisfaction to the City and to other places of business; and the mention of the tax may suggest a feeling of satisfaction at the abandonment of Mr. GOSCHEN's preposterous scheme of handing over the proceeds of the duty to the local ratepayers. If the plan had been adopted, Mr. Lowe would have been compelled to retain one-half of his last year's addition to the Income-tax. Another negative merit of the Budget consists in the absence of any misappropriation of revenue to the creation of Terminable Annuities. The achievements of former years in this direction afford little ground for complacency. It is true that if nothing happens in the meantime to the contrary, the taxpayers of 1885 will be relieved from a capital amount of debt which will represent somewhat less than 2,000,000*l.* a year. They will also have the satisfaction of knowing that they and their predecessors have purchased the reduction at the cost of unnecessary expense and inconvenience. If it is thought desirable to pay off a part of the debt out of income, the easiest and cheapest plan would be to provide a surplus to be openly devoted to the purpose. It is a question whether it is desirable to anticipate the process by which the burden of the debt becomes annually lighter with the diminishing value of money.

In the discussion which followed Mr. Lowe's statement all the speakers naturally abstained from referring to the dark cloud in the West which renders the present prosperity of the country insecure. If peace is not disturbed, the great expansion of trade which has taken place in the last two years may probably continue. The termination of the French Commercial Treaty will be a check too insignificant to affect the general result; and it is not known that the markets of the world are yet glutted with English products. Nearly all branches of industry seem thus far capable of bearing the increase in the cost of production which is caused by the almost universal advance of the rate of wages and by the reduction of the daily time of labour. As long as the national prosperity is not impaired, it is in the highest degree satisfactory that the bulk of the population should have their full share of augmented profits; and the expenditure of the working classes, increasing in proportion to their receipts, contributes directly to the revenue. Mr. Lowe's reminiscences of the period during which he has administered the national finances were highly cheerful. For a long time, except for special and occasional interruptions, the public income has been irrepressibly elastic; and no economist seems to have made even an approximate estimate of the proportion of the increase which is due to the depreciation of gold. The rise of prices, or the fall in the value of money, also explains a part of the apparently unavoidable growth of expenditure. Mr. BRIGHT still believes, except when he is in office, that an expenditure of seventy millions a year is culpably excessive; and Mr. GLADSTONE has occasionally expressed a similar opinion; but year after year the Estimates exceed the prescribed limits, and there appears to be little hope of a large reduction. The golden age of the Duke of WELLINGTON, who was nevertheless driven from office by a vote for the appointment of a Committee on Finance, is not destined to return. The expenditure on the army and navy then amounted to 11,000,000*l.*, and the difference between the Estimates of 1830 and those of 1872 would admit of the abolition of the income-tax, of the Malt Duty, and perhaps of one or two other taxes. Some consolation may be found in the fact that the wealth of the country has grown more largely than the nominal taxation, which again largely exceeds the real increase of public burdens. A penny in the pound of income-tax now produces more than twice as much as in 1842.

THE RESTORATION OF SEBASTOPOL.

AFTER the rupture of the Treaty of Paris it was easy to foresee that the fortifications of Sebastopol would at the convenience of the Russian Government be reconstructed. It is fortunately not now necessary to repeat the submission of the English Government, or the repudiation of the Russian engagements. The Conference of 1871 formally and finally abolished the agreement which was the principal result of the Crimean war. The soundness of a policy of unlimited concession was examined at the time; and it would be useless to renew the discussion, though some popular delusions have since been disturbed by the failure of the simultaneous surrender of Washington. Notwithstanding verbal protests, Russia has established the principle that any Power which is strong enough to defy resistance may lawfully release itself from covenants which have at any former time been made under pressure of superior force. International obligations have in a great measure ceased to be practically binding since the dissolution of the European system which was once roughly administered by the Five Great Powers, or by the majority of their number; and the present generation has almost forgotten the profound security which prevailed in Europe during the thirty years which followed the end of the great French war. It would have been imprudent, or perhaps impossible, for England after the fall of France to offer immediate and active resistance to the new Russian aggression; but the contingent right of maintaining the Treaty might have been reserved, to be exercised at any future time in favourable circumstances. One effect of the abolition of the Treaty has been an ostensible change in the relations of Russia with Turkey. The SULTAN now professes the utmost confidence in the ancient enemy of his race, and the hostility of the semi-official Russian press is for the time almost wholly directed against Austria. The conduct of Turkey after the denunciation of the Treaty by Russia was straightforward, and in the highest degree honourable. The Porte was willing to offer its utmost resistance to the encroachment, if only it were assured of the support of England; but at the same time it declined to furnish a pretext for resentment by making any empty remonstrance. The truce which has ensued deceives neither Turkey nor Russia, although it is convenient to both. Some time must elapse before the fortifications and armaments in the Black Sea are complete, and in the meanwhile it suits the purpose of Russia to exercise a diplomatic influence at Constantinople. When the time for further aggression has arrived, there will be no difficulty in deriving a ground of quarrel as plausible as the famous grievance which related to the keys of certain buildings at Jeru-

Russian soldiers and statesmen now recognize the impossibility of advancing against Constantinople through the European provinces of Turkey as long as the power of Austria is unbroken; and it is not impossible that future operations may in preference be directed against the Turkish possessions in Asia Minor. The fleet which will be hereafter stationed at Nicolaieff or Sebastopol could at the most only act as an auxiliary force; for even if Constantinople could be occupied as the result of a maritime expedition, a garrison could not safely depend exclusively on communication by sea. For some years to come the Turkish fleet will be fully equal in strength to any naval force which is likely to exist in the Black Sea; and the Straits and narrow seas supply a refuge not less secure than the harbour of Sebastopol. If the Asiatic approaches to the capital can be successfully defended, the fall of Turkey may perhaps be indefinitely postponed. The unpleasant feeling which is caused by the intended restoration of Sebastopol is caused rather by the slight which seems to be inflicted on England than by the immediate risk of a new attack on Turkey. It is impossible to deny the fact that the fruits of the Crimean war have been lost, or rather that a security which had been intended to be perpetual has been, against the will of the holders, commuted into an annuity for eighteen or twenty years. The war itself, though it was not fruitful of military glory, was successful in the attainment of its main object. The ambitious projects of Russia were checked for the greater part of a generation, and the wanton invasion of the Danubian provinces was both repelled and punished. Although no warlike enterprise was ever more carelessly and thoughtlessly undertaken, the landing in the Crimea proved ultimately more injurious to Russia than any alternative mode of attack which could have been suggested. The long distances which had proved fatal to former invaders were turned against the defenders, and the Allies, with their own ports for a base of operations, were more easily supplied with stores and reinforcements than the garrison of Sebastopol. The provisional occupation of the Principalities by an Austrian army which professed to be neutral was in itself a decisive proof of the grave error which had been committed by the Emperor Nicholas; for offensive operations were rendered impossible by the action of a nominally neutral Power, while the enemy, after the destruction of the Russian fleet, invested the formidable stronghold of Sebastopol. Since the peace there has been no renewal of cordiality between Russia and England; but the animosity of Russia against Austria has been far deeper and more ostentatious.

The respite which was secured to Turkey by the war has not been altogether wasted. The domestic reforms which were enacted at the instigation of England have from the first not been wholly inoperative, and the present Ministers seem to be making serious efforts to render them practically effective. It was perhaps necessary that the equality of races and religions before the law should be proclaimed long before it was actually established. Innovations which have been but nominally introduced lose their paradoxical character by familiarity with an improved theory. It is doubtful whether it will be at any time possible for the Turkish Government to acquire the confidence of its Christian subjects; but it is certain that Russia has always been opposed to the trial of the experiment. During the slow progress of civil reform and of religious equality the Turkish army and navy have been more rapidly reorganized; and although the military establishments of Russia have been augmented in proportion, there would be a better chance of repelling an invasion in 1872 than in 1853. The triumph of a firm policy during the Cretan insurrection has for the time repressed the vexatious activity of Greece; and the Viceroys of Egypt, though he has often displayed tendencies to insubordination, has never yet ventured directly to disobey the orders of his Sovereign. Roumania is less troublesome since its acquisition of partial independence than in the period immediately before the war; and the Chancellor of the German Empire, for his own purposes, lately reminded the Government of Bucharest that Roumania was still feudally dependent on the Porte. If the numerous politicians who prophesy the extinction of the Turkish power are justified in their predictions, the interval which has been allowed may perhaps have partially prepared the subject races for the future enjoyment of independence. It is even now doubtful whether the Slavonic inhabitants of Turkey are anxious to accept the dominion of Russia; and the cherished dream of a Greek Empire has been temporarily or finally dissipated.

The abolition of the Treaty, and its practical result in the proposed restoration of Sebastopol, afford a striking, though superfluous, proof of the fragility of contracts as compared with territorial conquests and other material guarantees. The strip of land which was by the Treaty detached from Bessarabia for the purpose of excluding Russia from the left bank of the estuary of the Danube, is still held by Turkey, though perhaps on an insecure tenure. An attempt to repossess it by force would have been an act of war, while the repudiation of the undertaking to abstain from building an armed fleet in the Black Sea was easily effected by a couple of Circulars, and by a Conference charged to give effect to the policy of Russia. It is not certain that the additional alur which has been thrown on the credit of international engagements tends to promote civilization or to mitigate the evils of war. The restrictions imposed by the Treaty of Paris were only onerous to Russia as far as they threw impediments in the way of future aggression on Turkey. It might be contended with some show of reason that even to Russia it would be advantageous to prefer the peaceable development of her own resources to the forcible extension of an enormous Empire. A standing army nominally consisting of more than a million men involves, even in time of peace, heavy sacrifices of treasure and of life; and a change of fiscal policy would at once secure all the commercial benefits which could result from the acquisition of the most fertile neighbouring territories. In Central Asia it may perhaps be advisable for the Russian Government to establish order and to open intercourse by the process of conquest; but the annexation of Austrian and Turkish provinces could only gratify national vanity or ambition. No design can be more laudable than the establishment of commercial ports in the Black Sea wherever they may be required; but Sebastopol with nothing behind it in the nature of demand or of produce is not naturally calculated to compete with Odessa. The fortification of the town and harbour will suggest the expediency of providing ironclads and artillery, and when all preparations are finished, there will be strong temptation to make use of the resources which will have been accumulated. Happily the danger is not immediately pressing.

FRENCH FINANCE.

IN estimating the prospects of French finance we must take account of what is favourable as well as of what is unfavourable; and there are not wanting symptoms of the great wealth and resources of France, even at a time of much suffering and disorder. It is not a slight matter that the Bank of France should have found scarcely any of the debts contracted with it during the war bad or doubtful. The value of the notes of the Bank, again, is well maintained, and the circulation recedes from, rather than approaches, its authorised limits. The new taxes, too, are bringing in more than was calculated, and in no part of France and in no class of taxpayers have they provoked serious discontent. France is a rich country, easy to tax, with its commerce conducted on sound and cautious principles, and with a National Bank in a healthy and prosperous condition. But it is evident that, however great may be the resources of France, there is going to be a very heavy drain on them, and that French finance is under the control of men who have no scientific knowledge, and no conception of the exact nature of the burdens they are laying on the country. The Assembly quarrelled with M. THIERS because it thought his expenditure excessive, and his views of taxation dangerous. But after many weeks of consideration it has not succeeded in reducing his estimates, and it has nothing to propose in order to fill up the deficit, while he is always recurring to his cherished plan of the taxation of raw materials. It would have seemed as if a great fight might have been successfully made to reduce the enormous expenditure on the army. But M. THIERS wishes to have a very large and a very expensive army, and he is getting his way completely. He boasts that he has got an admirable army of 130,000 men near Paris, besides the large forces at Lyons and in the South, and that he will soon double the number of the soldiers ready for immediate war. He aims at having, and thinks he shall soon have, a French army which, with its reserves, will reach the enormous figure of 1,500,000 men. He has armed some portion of this army, and will soon arm the whole, with the best weapons that science can invent and money can procure, and he is highly pleased with the devotion and intelligence of the officers at his disposal. He is going to extend the fortifications of Paris so as to embrace the heights which the Germans fired in the late siege, and to cover the Eastern frontier of France with a line of fortresses. Such reductions as he once proposed to make in the navy are apparently to be abandoned. The general result is that France, which was taxed so heavily under the Empire for military purposes, is now to be taxed still more heavily. Englishmen complain bitterly of the sums they have to find for the army and navy, but England is thriving and at peace, while France, reeling under the calamities of a disastrous war, will have to find at least three millions, and probably five millions, more for its army and navy than England does. France has to choose between occupying for a time a secondary position in European politics and exhausting itself in order to become as quickly as possible once more a cause of alarm to its neighbours. M. THIERS has willed that the latter shall be the choice of France; and there is no one in France to stop him in anything on which he is bent.

The reasons why the Assembly has found itself unable to make any serious reductions of expenditure are very simple. In all great matters, such as that of the military policy of France, it has either to quarrel with M. THIERS or to obey him; and it has preferred to obey him. In smaller matters it finds itself almost entirely precluded from economy by the position in which it is placed. It is voting the Budget for the financial year which is almost come to an end, and the money has been spent. If it has not been actually spent, the Government has entered into engagements, or given promises, or held out hopes which make it necessary that it should be spent. A Government that wants to spend money is always extremely powerful, for each item of expenditure always receives the support of some class or clique who are much more anxious that the money should be spent than any other set of people are that it should not be spent. When a Government which cannot be overthrown confers with a body like a Budget Commission, it quickly converts it to Ministerial views; for the Commission has the reasons on which the Government is acting brought vividly before it, and cannot give much weight to arguments which would really involve the necessity of some other set of persons than the actual Ministry having the control of affairs. Individual members are powerless, for if the Government and the Budget Commission are agreed that money must be spent, a private member who advocates economy is immediately silenced as needlessly interrupting the course of public business. There are always, again, very excellent grounds why each little fraction of the public expenditure should have its place. One of the few recent discussions on the Budget of any interest arose out of a proposal to reduce the subventions to the French theatres. But M. JULES SIMON, in whose department as Minister of Public Instruction the care of the theatres is supposed to lie, resolutely refused to have 20,000*l.* cut off his estimates. His arguments were to the effect that it was art that made France great; that if the French did not write plays, and show how to act them, there would be no dramatic art left in Europe; and that unless the State provided a few theatres with money enough to act pieces of a high character, there would be nothing acted in Paris but burlesques and indecent farces, and then France would be indeed demoralized. Besides its large subvention, the Opera receives 60,000*l.* to be spent this year on the completion of the new building, and the two amounts certainly seem to make together rather a startling figure in the Budget of a distressed nation. But then, as M. BEULÉ reminded the Assembly, the French Opera is "the highest expression of lyricism," and that was an appeal which few Frenchmen would care to decline. There can be no doubt that France does not pay subventions to theatres without getting something very valuable in return, that the nation may be reasonably proud of the Français, and that it was the French Opera which enabled some of the greatest Italian and German composers to show what was in them. But at a time like the present to give 67,000*l.* in subventions, and to pay 60,000*l.* towards the construction of an Opera-house, would perhaps seem an exaggerated tribute to art, were it not that the expenditure is lavish on all hands.

Almost at the same time that the question of the theatrical subventions was discussed, another item of expenditure, that of prizes to be given at races, became the subject of debate. A private member with a sporting turn of mind proposed that on this head the expenditure should be not reduced, but increased, and, with the support of the Government, he actually succeeded in getting a hundred thousand francs devoted to racing beyond what the Government had itself agreed with the Committee should be asked for. If racing was to be thus encouraged, why, members might reasonably ask themselves, should the Français be discouraged? The old truth was once more apparent, that a popular Assembly can spend money, but cannot save it. On this occasion the friends of economy were even at a greater disadvantage than they usually are, for, if they seemed to be making a point, there was immediately a cry that they ought to reserve what they were saying until the Budget of 1873 came on for discussion. Even the very important question whether eight millions a year should be raised in order to pay off the Bank of France was considered as beyond the range of practical discussion, because an arrangement to pay off the advances of the Bank by annual instalments was made last June. No one doubts that the financial position of France can never be really what it should be until specie payments are resumed; and specie payments cannot be resumed until a very large portion of the advances of the Bank are repaid. At present the Bank charges one per cent. for its advances, and although the Commission hoped to get the Bank to take sixty centimes instead of a franc in the hundred as interest, the Bank resisted, and was successful, because the Government cannot do without the Bank. The credit of the Bank is necessary to support that of the Government, in order to maintain the value of a forced circulation; and the Bank is thus in a position to demand terms which are enabling it to pay a very handsome dividend to its shareholders. If France could raise eight millions a year for eight years without feeling it seriously, it would be quite worth while to do so in order that a specie currency might be resumed. But it is highly probable that France will do nothing of the sort, and that it will borrow at six per cent. to pay off money for which it is only paying one per cent.; and there is therefore much force in the reasoning of those who say that the true policy would be to go on paying one per cent. to the Bank until the country is in a position to raise on favourable terms the whole sum necessary for the resumption of specie payments.

It is obvious that one reason why the notes of the Bank of France maintain their present value is that the time can be calculated when, under existing arrangements, the advances to the Government will be paid off and specie payment resumed. But the real question is, whether the Government will not be always borrowing as much as it pays off. It is exceedingly difficult to say what would be the total amount required to free France from every claim, for every day some new demand is made on the Government, or the Government conceives that something new is necessary for its purposes. But the best French judges are of opinion that France, to clear itself from actual liabilities, must borrow four milliards of money, three for the Germans and one for internal purposes. This is the prominent fact in French finance. France must before long be a borrower of a hundred and eighty millions sterling. Perhaps it will not openly try to borrow so much. It may seek to confine its operations as much as possible to borrowing enough for the German indemnity. But it will then be obliged to have recourse to all those expedients by which a country in difficulties tries to encounter the pressure of a vast floating debt. It will in fact be paying off the advances of the Bank, which bear interest at one per cent., and borrowing from the Bank, or from other sources, at a rate which can scarcely be less than six per cent. And French financiers of the present school will be exceedingly lucky if they have merely to provide interest on funded and floating debts, and are not obliged to borrow new money to pay interest on their debts. It is by no means an exaggerated estimate to say that sooner or later they will have to get five millions more from taxation than the taxes now provide, even with all the augmentations agreed to by the Assembly. Whence is the money to come? M. THIERS resolutely says that it is to come from the taxation of raw materials, and that it can and shall come from no other source. But to say nothing of the standing arguments against the taxation of raw materials, there are the Treaties of Commerce, which, even after the Treaty with England is at an end, will throw serious obstacles in the way. It has been proposed, for example, to put a heavy duty on vegetable oil; but the larger part of the vegetable oil consumed in France comes from Russia, Germany, and Italy, and the result of an internal tax on oil would simply be that French oil would be driven out of the French market, as the whole of the oil necessary for the consumption would be imported on the favourable terms ensured by the treaties subsisting with foreign oil-growing countries. When objections of this sort are made M. THIERS turns round and asks what the objectors have to propose in lieu of the taxes he favours. Every possible tax is open to innumerable objections, and nothing can be easier than for the Government to show that each proposal made to it is equally ridiculous. Popular Assemblies and Committees representing them cannot invent taxes; they can rarely interfere with success in the details of expenditure. All that they can do is to determine the policy of a Government; and if the French Assembly once admits, as it appears to be willing to do, that France is to have, in the shortest possible time, an army of nearly a million and a quarter of men, raised and equipped and trained in the most expensive manner, it is at the mercy of a Minister like M. THIERS, who laughs at petty amendments on the details of the Budget, and has his pet theories of taxation which he is bent on seeing adopted at any cost.

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD.

IT has been said that an eminent artist is anxious to paint a great historical picture of the London School Board. There is nothing to be said against the interest or importance of the subject he has chosen; but if he wishes to do full justice to it, he must consent to sink the dignity of art, and make his picture a dissolving view. Nothing which is not in the nature of the slides in a magic-lantern could give the effect produced on the mind by the composition of this body. The School Board of to-day is not the same as the School Board of yesterday, and while the spectator is trying to estimate the gain or loss of the change, he sees a fresh change coming on, and the School Board of to-day begins to give place to the School Board of to-morrow. The frequent resignations which have lately been announced can hardly fail to injure the efficiency of such a body. The members who have retired have for the most part been among the most zealous advocates of educational progress; and if it has to be admitted that the work is heavier than a man who has other things to do can be expected to undertake, there must follow the further admission that it will be difficult to fill their places, except by an inferior class of men, or by men who will soon prove their likeness to their predecessors by resigning as soon as they find out what the work really is. It is not only the probability that new elections will not always call forth candidates of the old type that gives a serious aspect to those changes. The fact that the supplementary elections are carried on upon a different principle must also be taken into account. The cumulative vote is necessarily inapplicable to these supplementary elections. Where there is only one seat to be filled, the candidate returned must in all cases be the representative of the numerical majority in the constituency. It is quite possible, therefore, that before the next general election of a School Board the complexion of the existing Board may have been entirely changed, and that the latter part of its term will be spent in undoing the work of the earlier part, and in preparing work to be undone in turn by the Board which succeeds. It is unfortunate, to say the least, that the original members should not have been able to see out the three years for which they were elected.

Perhaps no one cause can be assigned for this dropping away. But there seems to be a certain uniformity in the reasons given in the several cases. The work has been too much for men occupied in other ways. The general control of primary education in London ought not, with the help of a sufficient staff, to demand more than a small proportion of an active man's time, and if the members of the Board really feel the strain to be too great, it must be because this sufficient staff is still wanting. If so, it is a kind of economy which defeats its own object. A good member is worth keeping, even at the cost of paying a subordinate to relieve him of some of his duties. It is difficult not to suspect that this is not quite the whole truth. Everybody knows how differently work weighs on a man according as he is or is not satisfied with the manner in which it is being done. There might have been fewer resignations in the School Board if there had been more children sent to school. So far as appears from a paper on the work of the Board, read by the Secretary a fortnight ago, this is a function which the Board has thought it advisable not to exercise at present. Before Easter 1871 a return had been made to the Education Department showing that accommodation for about 413,233 children was provided, or in course of being provided, in 3,130 schools of all sorts, efficient or inefficient. The Board has taken a whole year to draw any practical inference from this fact. "In each case," says the Memorandum, "an elaborate process of analysis had first to be undertaken. On the one hand, it was necessary to determine amongst the elementary schools which were and which were not efficient. On the other hand, it was necessary to eliminate from the total number of children between three and thirteen those for whom elementary schools need not be provided." The former part of the inquiry was undertaken by the Education Department, the latter part was undertaken by the Board, "through an ad hoc Committee."

"and with the assistance of a staff of enumerators, and a superintendent of enumerators for each division." Until these returns were made, the Board "have not thought it desirable to establish schools on a large scale, but rather to prepare the way for their establishment by dealing with other subjects." Accordingly they set to work in February to consider the question of compulsory attendance. The Stockport School Board had contrived to get by-laws on this subject passed as early as the 20th of April, and the Liverpool School Board had done the same thing by the 14th of June. But in the case of the London School Board the by-laws "did not come up for consideration before October, and were only finally passed at the beginning of November."

Having been safely delivered of the by-laws, the Board next set to work to provide the machinery for carrying them out. In the course of this process they have become officially cognizant of the fact that "there are considerable vacancies in existing schools." All this time another Committee was engaged in devising a scheme of education in School Board schools, and the Memorandum refers to the debates on Bible reading and instruction, on the payment and remission of fees, and on free schools, in proof that the time of the Board has not been wasted. By May the Board had become convinced that "it would be desirable in some cases, where the school deficiency was undoubted, to take immediate steps for the erection of schools." The (comparatively) headlong haste with which this resolution was taken was tempered by judicious delays in the execution of it. Twenty-four deficient districts have been selected, and ten sites (four have since been added) "will shortly be secured," five of which, the Memorandum says proudly, "may be considered practically available at once." In November the Board made another step in advance. It may have occurred to them that they had been in existence a year, and in that time had not made provision for the education of a single child who would not have been receiving instruction if the Education Act had never been passed. At all events, they resolved "that promises should be temporarily hired in those blocks where the Board had decided to erect new schools. As a result of this decision, it has been agreed to hire buildings in twenty cases with accommodation for 5,657 children" (the number is now, it seems, twenty-five buildings with accommodation for 6,530 children), "and"—our readers must prepare themselves for a surprise—"in seven cases the Board have already commenced school-work." Already commenced school-work!—it shows great self-restraint in the author of the Memorandum that he did not have these four words printed in capitals. After fifteen months of great and continuous exertion the London School Board has actually opened seven schools with accommodation perhaps for 2,000 children. There is something beautiful in the condescension of men who, though charged with the education of London, have not been above taking fifteen months to open seven temporary schools for just one-fiftieth part of the children who are without education.

It is not wonderful that busy men should ask themselves whether this is an adequate return for the time they have taken from other duties to give to the London School Board, or that they should determine within themselves that it is not adequate. A different procedure might have led to a very different result. If, instead of rushing at the outset into calculations which would delight the Statistical Society, the Board had been content with getting a rough estimate of the number of vacancies in existing schools, and of the number of children who ought to be at school but are not, they might in the first instance have filled up every such vacancy by the operation of their by-laws; and then, if voluntary agency had not come forward to help them, they might have established as many temporary schools as were required to provide for the children who found the doors of every school shut in their face. Probably this last class would have been but a small one, as the managers of voluntary schools would in many cases have been ready to provide increased accommodation if they had been assured that it would not be wasted. The prompt application of compulsion would have sent every child to school for whom a school could be found, and the cases in which attendance had to be excused on the plea that no school could be found would have furnished a rough, but sufficient, index to the amount of temporary accommodation which had to be provided by the Board itself. Why is it that a policy which had such obvious recommendations was not adopted at starting? Mainly, we imagine, from the culpable reluctance of the Board to confront the religious difficulty. The existing schools were for the most part Denominational, and they were afraid that the Secularist minority in their own body would resent a proceeding which sent children into Denominational schools, and thereby exposed them to De-nominal teaching: if their parents raised no objection. Rather than sanction so shocking a possibility, the Secularists, and the Dissenters who act with the Secularists, have avowed that they would rather see these children left in the street. Those who took this view were a minority on the London School Board, but they knew what they wanted, and their superior energy and decision cowed the majority into inaction. The ponderous statistics which have been evoked to veil that inaction would have been more in place if they had been compiled after, instead of before, the supply of crying educational destitution.

THE WARWICKSHIRE STRIKE.

A STRIKE of agricultural labourers is a novel, and by no means an unimportant, event. A new heaven must be working in the popular mind of England when those quiet, patient, dumbfounded creatures set up for having a will of their own. To see them attempting to manage a strike is as wonderful as to see any other of the beginnings of life in inert masses, as to see babies begin to walk, or tadpoles become frogs. If we may trust the accounts in the newspapers, the Warwickshire labourers seem to have begun it all by themselves, and to have met under a chestnut-tree, where they discussed their grievances; and then they took counsel, first of an experienced man who had once been into the Black Country and might there have learnt the elements of strike-making from the superior mining intelligence, and secondly of a Dissenting minister. These were their clever friends; the men something of their own stamp, but who know more than they did, and could give something like shape to their dim purposes. It is not education in any direct form that has stirred up to action this portion of the population, which it might have been supposed most difficult to stir; for most of those who joined the strike and testified their adherence to the movement could only place their mark to the document by which they signified their assent. But those whom education has not reached directly may be affected by it indirectly, and the agricultural labourers have learnt to strike because those who have got new notions and taught themselves to urge new claims in more advanced districts have silently penetrated with their influence the classes beneath them. The rural poor have been closely watched and tightly held down by their masters, the farmers, and the basis of rural life has been a humble obedience and unquestioning acquiescence on the part of the labourer. When change reaches so low a level, society must indeed be changing. Distress has in old days led to rick-burning, and brutal ignorance has led to destruction of farm machinery; but those were only the outbreaks of hungry or panic-stricken barbarism. But a strike, as a strike is said to have been conducted in Warwickshire, is a totally different thing. It shows a power of union, a perception of the respect due to law, a confidence that success can be achieved without violation of the law. The labourers may possibly be mistaken in thinking that they will succeed, or they may succeed at first, and then push their triumph too far and suffer for their temerity. But it is very improbable that a strike of any considerable magnitude should leave the condition of the agricultural poor in the state in which it found it. It will at least have taught them to think and to act. If labourers in villages could think and act, rural life in England would be a new thing. Some of its placid pleasures and animal content might pass away, there would be many victims of change, many would be crushed by a competition to which they were unequal; but the rural poor could never be as they once were, the bondsmen of those who, what with wages and what with poor-rates, secured them at least the certainty of a bare subsistence.

There are two questions to be asked as to this strike, which may be asked as to every strike. Has it a chance of success? and if it succeeds, what will be the consequences? Agricultural labourers must be judged as any other labourers are judged, and the great justification of a strike is success. How much employers can really afford to pay to those whom they employ is a point that is practically settled by strikes, as it is settled in no other way. The Warwickshire labourers, it appears, were, before the strike began, getting twelve shillings a week in many districts. They asked for sixteen, and now the farmers are quite willing to give fourteen, and are talking of fifteen as a compromise. Canon GIBBLESTONE, who, with a courage that does him the highest credit, has been the friend of the labourer in spite of the bitter opposition of all the farmers about him, has written to advise Warwickshire labourers who get fifteen shillings a week not to trouble themselves about strikes, and the advice of so true a friend ought to have weight with the labourers if it ever really reached them. But Canon Girdlestone seems to have supposed that, apart from the strike, the Warwickshire labourers generally were getting fifteen shillings; whereas this appears to have been only the case on a few estates, where intelligent, rich, and kind landlords set a good example. The men who struck were getting twelve shillings only; and now, by striking, they have a chance of getting the fifteen shillings which their judicious friend regards as the goal of rural happiness. The difference between twelve shillings a week and fifteen is practically enormous. It means the difference between having just enough to keep body and soul together, and having some of the rudiments of comfort and plenty; though it is of course possible that a rise of money wages may be accompanied by the withdrawal of allowances in kind which represent money. Canon Girdlestone seems to think it almost ungenerous in men who are getting fifteen shillings a week to strike while there are men in the South of England who do not strike, and probably cannot strike, and are only getting nine shillings. But the argument may be easily turned the other way. Warwickshire labourers could not possibly benefit Dorsetshire labourers by continuing to receive twelve shillings; but they might give new hopes, and offer new springs of action, to even the most suffering members of their class, if they showed that by a strike they could get their twelve shillings a week turned into fifteen. There is no reason why farmers should be viewed with any exceptional amount of sentimental tenderness. They have not been particularly liberal or mild or wise in their character of employers. They have, as a general rule, tried to keep the labourer rooted to his native village, as uneducated and as poorly fed as possible. The employers of factory hands and of mechanics have probably been just as hard and as narrow in their day, but the growing intelligence and independence of their workmen have gradually altered the relative position of the two classes. It is now the turn of the farmers to see their labourers meeting under a chestnut-tree and demanding those extra three shillings a week which, if conceded, will make their cottages something like happy homes.

The Warwickshire strike may be successful, and, if so, what will be the consequences of its success? It is said already to have spread into eight counties; but it is obvious that even if it succeeds in one place it may fail in another, and that its fire may be much sooner burnt out than its friends expect. There are many liberal employers, and in a crisis a good man deserves to have the reward of his liberality, and those whom he has treated well should treat him well in return. Those who are already as well off as can be reasonably expected may profitably take the wise advice of Canon Girdlestone and leave well alone. But supposing a considerable and unquestionable success to be obtained, what will be the results? In the first place, the men who have gained an increase of wages will be better fed and better clothed. They will work more and do their work better. They will be more alive to the advantages of education; they or their children will gradually acquire minds open to newspaper guidance; they will first feed on the homely platitudes of the county journals, and in time may become the disciples of the Daily Telegraph itself. They will perhaps criticize sermons with a sleepy superiority, and leave off touching their hats to the squire. They will on great holidays scent a whiff of butcher's meat, and will put into the pot a larger quantity of adulterated tea than one teaspoonful among seven. They will clearly have mounted some of the lower steps of the ladder of progress. They will also contribute, slowly, partially, and exceptionally, to a general rise of the condition of the agricultural labourer. Canon Girdlestone has lately been exerting himself with excellent effect to release the rural poor from the serfdom in which the more bigoted and shortsighted class of farmers try to hold them, and has been sending men who are not wanted in their own district to districts where they are wanted. Anything which, like a successful strike, gives new spirit and energy to agricultural labourers, will powerfully aid such a movement as that which Canon Girdlestone has started to promote, and will make them apter to learn and to profit by the variations of price in the labour market. How far the farmer will suffer is among those receding questions of political economy on which wise men shrink from passing judgment. Possibly he may recover a part of what he pays in additional wages from the consumer; possibly he may be able to get a part of it by throwing it on the landowner; possibly he may be able to get a part of it by getting his workmen to do better labour than he got from them before; and possibly a part may really come out of his profits and make him a poorer man. The real danger may be that the wages of those labourers who strike with success may be raised, and that the farmer may not very much suffer. But it is not to be supposed that a crisis such as that which would alter the condition of the rural poor could come without a large amount of suffering coming with it. If a strike succeeded, the men who were wanted on a farm would be better off, but those who were not wanted on a farm would be worse off. There would be more killed off, or sent into the workhouse, or forced into the slow decay of an alien life in big towns. Even those who were winning in the strife would have much to undergo. They would have to mourn the departed charities of life. They would no longer be looked after by the farmer, or tenderly overshadowed by the parson, or addressed with timid, high-principled condescension by the ladies of the squire's family. These are not perhaps great losses to set against the substantial gain of three shillings a week extra to a man who sees his children half-starved and his wife rheumatic from want of clothing. But the strife which strikes engender, even when successful, and especially when they are a novelty, is apt to take the bloom off success; and this should be well remembered by political philanthropists who profess to have the welfare of the labourer at heart. A grave responsibility will rest on any adventurous outsider who may imagine himself called upon to encourage such a movement without taking into full account the evil as well as the good which may be expected from it. Although, if the Warwickshire labourers really get three shillings a week more by their strike, they must, according to the standard by which other men who have struck are judged, be held to be justified, yet those who look on Warwickshire from a distance may feel some regret even on their behalf, and much compassion for the unknown innumerable crowd who will suffer, even if their class as a whole should gain by the movement thus set on foot.

THE FRENCH ARMY BILL.

UPON few points has the French Assembly shown such sturdy resistance to M. THIERS as upon the constitution of the French army. The difference between their views is fundamental. M. THIERS wants an army formed on the same basis as the army which capitulated at Sedan. He argues that the disasters which overtook the Imperial troops reflect no discredit on the principle on which they were recruited and trained. Their defeat was, he contends, due to the systematic neglect of those principles. If the army had been in fact what it was on paper, all might have gone well. What other motives M. THIERS may have for wishing the same principle maintained, why he has pronounced so decidedly against universal service, and in favour of a limited conscription, it is impossible to say. It may be that he is eager to hurry forward the day when France will be once more in a position to play an independent part in the affairs of Europe, and sees that it takes a shorter time to put an existing system into thorough repair than to organize a thoroughly new one. It may be that he is old-fashioned in his military ideas, and still thinks that the new levies of Germany would have had no chance against the veterans that France could once bring into the field, and, by going the right way to work, might soon bring into the field again. But neither his expressed nor his unexpressed reasons have had any weight with the Assembly. The Government Army Bill has been completely rejected in Committee, and the shape in which it is now presented shows how deep is the impression left by the war on the minds of Frenchmen. Both the Right and the Left in the Assembly would naturally be opposed to a large military establishment. It has been especially associated with the BONAPARTES, and Monarchists and Republicans are alike hostile to a restoration of the Empire. But the desire to give France the power to measure herself again with Germany is stronger than any dread of despotic tyranny. This latter fear, however, has exercised great influence on the construction of the Bill. Whatever may be the disadvantages of the Prussian military system, it does not like the old French system convert a national army into a Gendarmes Guard; and the Assembly is determined that the new French army shall contain representatives of every class of the community, and that the soldiers shall occasionally be exposed to the levelling contact of civil and military life.

As the Bill leaves the hands of the Government, it is for universal personal service, with the exception of those Frenchmen who are in the service of the State, or of the French Army for foreign wars, and of the Gendarmes Guard.

The first class, the active army, will be composed of young men in the effective army, and six years in the territorial reserve. There will be no exemption on the ground of conscientious objection, and no exemption on the ground of conscientious objection on physical grounds will be accorded only to those whose infirmities are such as to unfit them for service of any kind. Those exempted by the existing law on the ground of family circumstances, such as the eldest son of a widow, will in future be only dispensed from serving in the ground of exemption continues to exist, and in the event of war, the dispensation may be withdrawn. Scholars of certain Government schools, young men in training as schoolmasters or for the ecclesiastical state, are also dispensed on condition, as regards the first two, of their engaging to spend ten years, in those branches of the public service to which the schools are an introduction, or as teachers. Ecclesiastics who claim exemption must have taken holy orders before they are twenty-six. Forty per cent. of the young men pronounced fit for service may be dispensed on the score of being required for the maintenance of their families; and an armistice of one year, renewable for two more, will be granted in the same proportion of ten per cent. to those who can show that the conditions of their apprenticeship, or of the employment by which they purpose to make their living, require that they should not be immediately summoned away. The men adjudged fit for service, and claiming neither exemption nor dispensation, will be at once incorporated into the active army. This yearly contingent will be divided into two classes—those who are to remain with the colours during the whole five years, and those who will only be required to remain with the colours for one year. The number of the former class will be annually fixed by the Minister of War; the men who are to compose it will be determined by lot. The second class, after their year with the colours has come to an end, will remain at the disposition of the Minister, and will have to take part in certain military exercises. They will be allowed to marry. Young men who have taken their Bachelor's degree, or have been prizemen in the University, as well as the scholars at certain schools, will be allowed to contract an engagement for a year, upon passing an examination prescribed by the Minister of War. Young men not comprised in any of these categories, who pass the examination, will be allowed to contract a similar engagement in numbers to be determined every year by the Minister. Those who make these engagements must bear the expense of their own equipment and maintenance. If at the end of the year they fail to pass the appointed examination, they may be retained with the colours for a second year. Students who wish to finish their studies in any faculty or school will be allowed to postpone their year of service until they are twenty-three. By other clauses of the Bill provision is made for voluntary enlistments for five years, which will count as part of the legal service, and for re-enlistments for one or two years. The men who are sent home after a year's service, and kept at the disposal of the Minister of War, will be admitted, if they wish it, to complete their five years in the active army. Soldiers who have served more than five years with the effective army will receive higher pay, and those who have served twelve years will receive a certificate giving them a right to employment in the civil service of the State.

It seems to be supposed that M. THIERS will withdraw the opposition which he originally offered to the principle of universal service, and accept the greater strength of the army in the future as compensation for the greater delay in attaining that strength. There has been a conference between the President and the Committee, and the only point upon which any serious difference of opinion exists is the question of substitutes. The Government plead that it will be impossible, without allowing substitutes, to satisfy the requirements of a civil career. The Committee reply that these requirements are provided for by the clauses introduced into the Bill to meet the case of students and young men preparing for professions. It is clear that the prohibition of substitutes is essential to the success of a system of compulsory service. So long as they are allowed, the army will not be a really national force. It will be composed of men who serve because they cannot help it, and of men who have been obliged to serve by those who wish to avoid the obligation which has devolved on them. As to the particular difficulty stated by M. TAYLOR, it is disposed of as soon as service becomes really universal. It cannot be maintained that a year of army life interrupted between the study and the practice of a profession would be very injurious to a young man, when it was considered that himself, not from his trials. All that is beyond upon all sides, it simply lengthens the suffering which it would be, by succeeding. All that would come would be to the plea of doing away with an imaginary pain. It would make suffering more, more unpleasant, as being the punishment of a greater sin, than a law which would be a reward of a good medicine who could afford to say anything to set up a better, a physician a year earlier, than a student of equal capacity and education to whom a substance was an unattainable luxury.

Whatever may be the ultimate character of the French army, it is plain that the Government has no present mind to employ it in defence of the Pope. M. THIERS declares that the interests of the Holy Father are dear to him, and that he will defend them as he has defended them before—that is, by an occasional speech. But the interests of France are no less dear to him, and they would be compromised by his making another speech of the same sort just now. The Bishop of Orléans proclaims his respect for the misfortunes of France, and his determination not to aggravate them by making her feel her own impotence. Upon this question, so says, he has no difficulty in reconciling his views as a bishop, and his views as a Frenchman. The policy which had been fatal to the Holy See had been fatal to France. Thus there is no substantial difference between M. THIERS and M<sup>r</sup>. DUNSTON as regards present policy. Both would like to give Italy a slup in the same, both would like to give the Pope a helping hand, and neither allows his desire to get the better of his discretion. By the time that France is strong enough to turn weaker into acts, Italians may fairly hope that she will have found employment for her troops nearer home.

THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN.

THE present SOLICITOR-GENERAL and the future law officers of the Crown will scarcely attract general comparison as victims of Mr. Lowe's relentless parsimony. For advising the various departments of Government, for controlling the issue of patents, and for other non-contentious business, the Attorney-General is to receive 7,000*l.* a year, and the Solicitor-General 6,000*l.* a year. For the conduct of Government cases in civil or criminal Courts they will be paid on the ordinary professional scale, and they will retain their private practice, which in some cases will produce an income equal to their official emoluments. With the exception of the Viceroy of India, of the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and perhaps of one or two other representatives of the English Crown, the Attorney and Solicitor-General will still be more highly paid than any other functionaries in the world; and, although their offices are precarious, they have the resource of falling back on their professional practice. An Equity lawyer loses nothing and risks nothing by becoming a law officer, while he increases his chances of advancement to the Bench. A Common Law Solicitor-General is required by custom to abandon his circuit, but, with few exceptions, provincial practice is a secondary consideration with the leaders of the Bar. Many of them at a certain point in their career voluntarily leave the circuit; and a Solicitor-General would seldom regret the necessity of relinquishing an arduous and laborious part of his practice. BROUGHAM indeed many years ago declared that he could not afford to surrender his position on the Northern Circuit for the precarious rank of Attorney-General; but at the time his ambition was directed to other objects, and many changes have occurred in the profession, as elsewhere, during forty or fifty years. Some law officers have owed their promotion to political interest, or to the possession of a safe seat in Parliament, but the DUBLETTS, the FOLLITTs, the BARNESs, and the PALMERs must have contemplated with much equanimity the possibility of being relegated by political vicissitudes to the ordinary practice of their profession. There is no reason to fear that future Governments will find a difficulty in securing the services of competent Attorney and Solicitor-Generals.

It is not surprising that Mr. FAWCETT and others should have considered that the law officers ought to devote undivided attention to public business. When an Attorney-General makes a speech a month long on behalf of a private client, it may be plausibly suggested that he has comparatively little time or energy to attend to his official duties, and if there had been no TICHBORNE case to occupy his time, Sir JOHN COLERIDGE would perhaps have made thirty speeches instead of one. The only objection to an exclusive retainer is that it would not be accepted by an advocate in great practice. To a layman without a trade or profession official salary for a longer or shorter time produces a clear profit; but it is not worth while to exchange a safe or increasing income for a post which depends for its continuance on the stability of the Government. In former times it was thought improper that a Minister should be engaged in trade; but as soon as manufacturers became candidates for political office it was found necessary to relax the rule. The profits of a very moderate commercial undertaking are larger than ordinary salaries, and they are much more secure. No leader of the Bar could afford to give up his private practice to rivals whom it might be impossible afterwards to displace for a law office which might perhaps be held for two or three years. It would be perfectly easy to secure for moderate remuneration the services of sound lawyers as permanent advisers of the Government; but it would be inconvenient for a Minister to have no legal colleagues in the House of Commons either to represent or to advise him. Even when the Attorney and Solicitor-General for the time being take little part in debate they are almost incessantly consulted; and some of their number have been powerful auxiliaries of their party. Sir RICHARD BETHELL, Sir HUGH CAIRNS, and Sir ROUNDELL PALMER were among the most formidable debaters on the Treasury Bench; nor could the authority which they possessed have been exercised by any permanent functionaries. As long as Parliament concentrates all power in itself, the heads of all departments must have a political and responsible character. A permanent Under-Secretary often understands the business of his office better than his chief; but he has no independent power or claim to obedience. For the same reason the Attorney and Solicitor-General must be practising lawyers with seats in the House of Commons.

Under existing arrangements, neither the Government as a whole nor the several public offices are unduly stinted of legal advice. The Lord Chancellor, whose judicial duties allow him considerable leisure, is an important member of the Cabinet; and there seems to be no reason why, in accordance with a recent suggestion, he should be reinforced by the presence of the Attorney-General in the Cabinet. The questions of international law arising in the course of diplomatic transactions are necessarily brought under the cognizance of the Chancellor before or after the opinions of the law officers have been required and received; and it might, but for recent experience, have been supposed that the Government would derive advantage from the counsels of a colleague who ought to be at the same time a lawyer and a statesman. The Queen's Advocate, who formerly took precedence of the Attorney and Solicitor-General, still acts as their colleague, and there is no reason why, if the office is to be continued, the ablest lawyer who may be willing to hold it should not be selected on the present vacancy. The Solicitor of the Treasury, a Queen's Counsel of great ability and experience, advises the Treasury and the Home Office from day to day on the numerous legal points which it is necessary to decide in the ordinary course of business, and he also superintends Government prosecutions. The Colonial Office and the Admiralty have each their own counsel; and the India Office will probably have reason to regret the late abolition, in a sudden fit of economy, of a corresponding post. The Judge-Advocate General, whose office is at present suspended, and the Deputy Judge-Advocate, can at pleasure be consulted by the Secretary for War, and two Parliamentary draughtsmen are employed in the preparation and supervision of Government Bills. The permanent Under-Secretary of the Home Department is always a lawyer, and the important office of legal assistant to the Attorney-General, popularly called the Attorney-General's devil, is always held by an incumbent who, after a certain length of tenure, is supposed to be qualified for promotion to the Bench. It may be doubted whether there is any necessity for the appointment of additional permanent functionaries; and if the Government of the day were deprived of the aid of law officers sitting in the House of Commons, it would often find itself helpless in the presence of formidable adversaries. It will probably appear hereafter that such miscarriages as the composition of the Washington Treaty are attributable, not to the incompetence of the law officers who may have been consulted on the wording, but to the timidity of the Government, and to its eagerness for any attainable settlement of the dispute.

Among the consolations reserved for Attorneys and Solicitors-General in their reduced condition, the prospect of judicial appointments must be included. According to the best opinions, the only place on the Bench which can be claimed as of right by the Attorney-General is that of Chief Justice of the Common Pleas; but it has been customary to give the Attorney-General the choice of appointments in his own branch of the profession, and the Lord Chancellor, who has the exclusive patronage of puisne judges, would seldom refuse an application from the Solicitor-General. At present it happens that the only place on the Equity Bench which has been filled by direct promotion of a law officer is that of the MASTER of the Rolls, who has held his post since 1851, though the LORD CHANCELLOR was many years ago Solicitor-General under Lord JOHN RUSSELL. The two CHIEF JUSTICES were Attorneys-General at the time of their respective promotions, and the LORD CHIEF BARON had formerly held the same rank. Two of the Puisne Judges have been appointed from the post of Solicitor-General. All the other Judges in both branches of the law have risen from the non-official Bar. There is no reason to fear that Mr. LOWE's economical reforms will deprive future Governments of the services of the best lawyers of their respective parties; and it is even possible that members of other professions, as well as laymen, may regard with envy the not inconsiderable emoluments which are still attached to the law offices. Among the felicities of the profession which were long since recorded as proofs of the special favour with which it was regarded by Providence, may be reckoned its exceptional security from disendowment, or even from excessive curtailment of its profits. It has every reason to be satisfied with the existing state of society, and experience shows that when the taller poppy-heads are cut off in democratic revolutions, lawyers have a tendency to survive, and even to occupy the places which are left vacant by fallen competitors. In the English colonies, and still more in the United States, lawyers fill the local and central Legislatures, and occupy more than their proportionate share of the principal offices of State. Professional fees are as high in New York as in London, and though official salaries in America are unreasonably small, lawyers have exceptional opportunities of gratifying political ambition. Those who have occasion in England to retain the services of so fortunate a class for public or private purposes must be prepared to adopt the scale of remuneration which has been established by custom or competition. An underpaid Judge or Attorney-General would in the great majority of cases prove to be a disadvantageous bargain.

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE DELEGATES.

MR. GLADSTONE is certainly very much to be pitied. He has had the influenza, a nasty touch of his old complaint, Irish Education, and a first, or rather a last, warning from "the delegates forming the Committee for conducting the opposition to the Government Parks Bill"; and all this in a single week, and while he was still sore and tender from his COLLIER and Ewelme bruises. It is impossible not to sympathize with him profoundly; however we may differ from him as a statesman, we must always feel for him as a man, and we sincerely hope he may be the better for his too brief Easter holiday. It is a break in the Session, and perhaps it may be a break in the series of personal difficulties of which he has for some time been the hapless victim. This last attack, the warning from the Friends of the People, is certainly the unkindest cut of all. It can hardly be doubted that Mr. GLADSTONE will feel it most acutely, not so much because it strikes at himself, as because it strikes at his faith in what he imagines to be human nature. If there was one quarter to which in the hour of trouble he might have supposed that he could confidently turn for loving sympathy and brotherly help, it was surely to the howling demagogues of the streets. He can honestly say that he has given up a good deal for them—a good deal which, in his moments of disenchantment, he can hardly look back upon without some twinges of remorse. Wholesome traditions of public order and decorum, the sanctity of law, the rights and interests of loyal and peaceful citizens, the confidence of his friends, and not a little of his own self-respect, have all been tossed aside for the sake of ingratiating himself with a set of blustering agitators who now turn round and threaten to depose him because he will not get out of bed when he is ill and do the honour of Downing Street to his masters. There is an old proverb, but it is somewhat musty, which might have prepared him for this fate; he was liberal of his pearls to certain folk, and their gratitude in the gratitude of their kind. It is really difficult to see what more Mr. GLADSTONE could have been expected to do. He took sedition and democracy to his heart and hinged it; he received the brawlers of the hotel in his own parlour, "like a father receiving his children," as one of them said; he pensioned BATES more liberally than he did any other; he puffed BAXTER's blackguardism; and he presented himself before the Jacobins of the "Hole-in-the-Wall" when he happened to leave one of their meetings minutes unattended for a day or two, under a pressure of important public business to which he had inadvertently given precedence. Only the other day he persuaded the Lord Chamberlain to give the same set of people official recognition at a great State ceremonial by the side of the other—we suppose we must say other—Estates of the Realm. It is true that Mr. GLADSTONE might go a step further and sit down and write to Mr. ODORÉ's dictation, or let Mr. BRADLAUGH make his speeches for him; but, short of this, it would seem as if he had done pretty well all that a Minister could do—and certainly more than any other Minister would dream of doing—to please and pacify these men.

And now he has his reward. It appears that on Saturday Mr. GLADSTONE wrote, by the hand of his private secretary, to Mr. JOSEPH GUEDALLA, one of the leading members of some self-elected Committee of so-called working-men, for opposing the Parks Bill, to say that he "was confined to his bed by indisposition," and could not therefore receive a deputation from the Committee. In point of fact, Mr. GLADSTONE had been too unwell to be present in the House of Commons on the previous night; but an excuse which was good enough for that body was not enough for Mr. GUEDALLA and his friends. Mr. GUEDALLA seems to have at once come to the conclusion that Mr. GLADSTONE's indisposition was nothing more than an indisposition to get up and receive the deputation; so he called on Mr. GLADSTONE's private secretary and told him plainly that this sort of thing would not do, and that, "if Mr. GLADSTONE declined to see a deputation" "as asked, it would be the last time the working-men of London would trouble him with a similar request." This awful threat staggered the private secretary, who did his best to make peace; but Mr. GUEDALLA was not to be smoothed over by pretty talk, and he intimated before he left that, "if the working-men were to be treated to a Conservative policy, they would prefer having it from a Conservative Government." It is not stated whether Mr. GUEDALLA then called at Grosvenor Gate to arrange terms with Mr. DISRAELI; but we suppose it must be assumed that he and his followers are now off with Mr. GLADSTONE, or at least that Mr. GLADSTONE is off with them. It is incredible that after this even Mr. GLADSTONE should knock under and apologize for having been grossly insulted. Mr. GUEDALLA reported what had happened to his companions, and "a vote of thanks was accorded to him for his services." It is worth while to observe the kind of services which excite the admiration and gratitude of the working-men whom Mr. GLADSTONE has so long fawned upon and flattered. What can be more noble and heroic than blustering before an unfortunate private secretary who is afraid to open his mouth lest he should commit his master, or than sending insolent messages to a sick statesman, intimating that his sickness is all a sham? There have been of late some symptoms that Mr. GLADSTONE's eyes were at last being opened as to the sort of people with whom he has been dallying to the mingled amusement and disgust of the rest of the world. He must surely have got over his illusions now. It is perhaps not difficult to understand how a man of Mr. GLADSTONE's peculiar temperament should have fallen into this curious phase of mind. It is sometimes said by Mr. GLADSTONE's friends that the criticisms on his conduct must be false, because they are so contradictory; at one moment he is accused of arrogance, and at another of cringing and servile humility. But in fact both charges may be true—a man may be at once arrogant and humble to a fault, keeping his arrogance for one set of people and his meekness for another. The haughtiest Popes have usually been most eager and demonstrative in their observance of the ceremony of washing the feet of the lazzaroni selected for the purpose at the prescribed festivals. Mr. GLADSTONE atones for his despotism in the House of Commons by his almost menial attentions to a knot of obscure and contemptible agitators whom, by a fiction of the imagination, he dignifies by the name of representatives of the people. The most singular circumstance about these so-called working-men is, as we have often said, that most of them are not working-men at all, and that the working classes, whenever the question is put to them at an election, invariably repudiate them in the most emphatic and decisive manner.

It is impossible to see how the Ministry, after having introduced the Parks Bill, and carried it so far through the House of Commons, can now abandon their ground at the dictation of the Chouans and BRADLAUGH, without dishonour to themselves and danger to the authority of Government. Mr. ODORÉ is said to have declared that, if the Bill is passed, it will be passed at water-pipe level. Mr. BRADLAUGH has intimated that he will give an early opportunity of testing the Government in such a case. The latter holds a meeting last year in Trafalgar Square, merely to show, as he said, that the House of Commons dared not interfere with him; and on the House of Commons instantly withdrew the interdict which he had placed upon the assembly, and ordered the police to protect instead of preventing the meeting, Mr. BRADLAUGH has no doubt received strong encouragement to repeat the experiment. It is obvious that if Mr. RYLANDS's amendment is accepted, the Parks Bill might as well not be passed. The object of the Bill is merely to place the Royal Parks under the same kind of regulations as municipal pleasure-grounds; but the effect of this amendment would be to perpetuate the anarchy which has hitherto prevailed; it would, in fact, be as much as to say that, whatever the Bill may provide, things shall remain exactly as before. For the Government to yield now would be simply to encourage fresh menaces and intimidation; and the mischief of weak concessions in the face of threats has already been more than sufficiently demonstrated. It has been discovered that Mr. AYRTON once claimed St. James's Palace for the people, and served the Crown with a rhetorical notice to quit at six months; and the agitators who are afraid that their privilege of annoying and disturbing the rest of the community is now in danger have had a meeting at the East-End to denounce Mr. AYRTON for his treacherous apostasy, and to stir up his constituents against him. Mr. AYRTON may reply that he is not only older but wiser now than he was when he made that silly speech, and that his official experience has enabled him to understand that the public rights over what is called Crown property are adequately secured by Parliamentary control. Mr. GUEDALLA intimated, on his recent visit to Downing Street, that he and his associates would have nothing to say to Mr. AYRTON, and they have for some time declined to recognize Mr. LOWE as a member of the Government. We have some recollection of a letter which Mr. GUEDALLA was rash enough to address to Mr. LOWE a year or two since, and which provoked a reply that perhaps accounts for the disinclination of Mr. GUEDALLA and his friends to tackle Mr. LOWE again. It is usually understood that an Administration stands or falls together, and it is difficult to understand how the First Minister reconciles it with his own self-respect or with a due regard for his associates to enter into communication with people who repudiate the authority of particular Ministers or other officials who have been appointed by himself. It is necessary that the interests and wishes of all classes of the population should be fairly consulted; but it is not desirable that the head of the Government should discredit the representative authority of Parliament by treating with self-elected and irresponsible spokesmen outside of it, or that special favour should be shown to noisy traffickers in riot and sedition.

THE VALUE OF AN IDEAL.

IN her new novel of Middlemarch George Eliot has spent a good deal of pains, and clearly with a good deal of satisfaction, over the character of Mr. Lydgate. Mr. Lydgate is a man with an ideal of life, and an ideal of what his profession ought to be or to be made. To the mind that designed him, indeed, he is obviously a much more interesting personage than he would otherwise have been, owing to the fact that his ideal is not that of a scholar but of a naturalist; his thoughts and his researches run to tissue and febrile influences rather than to various readings and editions; and with him the two contemporaries, Porson and Bichat, would have held exactly opposite poles in the region of his esteem. Besides this, there is a latent vein of sarcasm—"sneer" is not the word to apply to sarcasm like George Eliot's—running all through the description of Mr. Lydgate's ideal. It is an ideal not yet exactly beginning to disappear; but it clearly will vanish, like the aroma of the best scents; it is destined to disappear, overborne by the elements of "commonness" in the man's character and surroundings, and its evanescence will be calmly, unflinchingly, and a trifle severely watched and described. Yet, notwithstanding this drawback, Lydgate is intended to be distinguished from his professional brethren and from most other people in the book by the very fact of his having an ideal, and he is pro tanto a superior man. Nor is this to overestimate the value of a conception of life rising above the common level, to which conception alone the word "ideal" is really appropriate; to apply it to notions, like the commonplace working-man's, of eight hours a day and unstinted beer, or like the commonplace girl's, of a handsome settlement and a box at the Opera, as is sometimes done, is only to play fast and loose with words. Such notions imply the negation of any attempt at having an ideal at all. Lydgate is represented as proving in his own person the advantage which, more or less, an ideal view of life or work brings with it in any case. It has given him unity of aim, persistency of purpose, intelligence in choice, and a comparative superiority to the influence of minor obstacles and vexations. And what is more, the suggestion is tolerably apparent that he is to be held a gainer, even though his original conception may fall through altogether. It will be better to have had an ideal and lost it than never to have had an ideal at all.

It will hardly be disputed that, as time moves on, the difficulty of gaining, or of maintaining, a worthy personal ideal of life grows greater. Men move and act increasingly in the mass; and every year a stronger will and keener eye seem to be required in any one who would take up and hold a position that shall answer to a high foregone conception, without drifting into useless, or worse than useless, isolation. And in exact proportion to this personal difficulty, it becomes increasingly desirable that some ideal forms of life and action, reaching beyond the individual, should be within the eye of society on its various levels and grades. In the great daily metropolitan inflow and outflow of nearly a million people, it is easy to see that a conception of life flat, tame, and vulgar rules the minds and manners of an overwhelming majority. The early-train people, in the lower sections of them, do not very often vary at all the routine of earning and sleeping, but when they do, it is in the received suburban manner. Astley's will furnish them with an occasional grand spectacle; to gaze on the "ladies and gentlemen" in the ring is felt to be an emotion, a real lift to the spirits; the pantomime is like a "little heaven below." Their only idea of art is gained from the lower illustrated journals; and in Lloyd's Weekly or the Family Herald they find their literature. The classes that begin from just above these, and that run up into really wealthy strata, containing the men who drive down to the later trains with high-stepping horses and in their own broughams, spend more and attempt to enjoy more in proportion to their rise, each above the class below. But they do not get many steps, even when they get any, beyond the flat and vulgar conceptions which are to be found quite on the lowest platform. To do as one's neighbours do, but to do it a little better and a little more in the style of the real world of rank and family—and also, if possible, with a secret consciousness of better bargaining and cleverer management—this is what meets the views of most of these classes, who, though suburban, are very largely representative of the middle classes throughout the country. Speaking generally, it is extremely hard for people like these to have anything at all to say to a theory of life which lies above the common level. Such a theory would be branded with the fatal note of being "unpractical"; it would weight them beyond all endurance in the race of respectability and fashion, and might even damage some of the untraceable springs of their credit. There is all the more reason, as ideal thoughts and views are pretty sure not to come from within, why this great main body of our countrymen should not be left without something external to themselves which may continue to suggest, however unconsciously to the receiver, thoughts and conceptions removed from the race and struggle of to-day, removed also from the influence of the precise political or social or religious creed which may happen to be most in vogue among the people who shape our conventional groove. Yet a good deal has been done within the last year or two to take away from us two institutions which almost alone now serve to connect the unreading, surface-thinking, conventional Englishman of the middle classes with the possibilities of a higher atmosphere. The attacks upon the Monarchy have been mostly made from the point which never fails to command something like attention from Englishmen—namely, the suggestion of its expensiveness. By a curious coincidence, the late illness of the Prince of Wales occurred just at a time when it was useful to point out that Monarchy among ourselves was securing a result for which no price but that of freedom could be held too dear; that it was connecting the everyday lives of common people with a higher world of thought and feeling, and keeping intact the links that associate our most advanced appliances of modern political science with the primitive and ineradicable instincts of humanity. It showed, in a word, that Monarchy is essentially maintaining among us an ideal of social order, preventing the nation from sinking to the level of a mercantile association, and preventing the individual (though he may become aware of the fact but once or twice in a life-time) from dropping to the level which citizenship in such a nation would imply.

But the hostile demonstrations against the monarchical principle took no bigger than mere criticisms on the surface, when compared with the violent and organized revolt now made by a considerable section of the middle class against a society which is probably doing as much as the Crown itself, to any no more, in keeping an ideal conception of the highest value within the eye of the community. The National Church has many other claims upon national regard, but none higher than this, that it alone, among religious associations of whatever sort in this country, is able in any degree to present the connexion between religion and life, the fellowship which ought to exist, and which in a country like this can with so much advantage be maintained, between the Church and the world. Some among the able leaders of the Nonconformists know quite well that perfection in the medium of suggestion is not necessary, that it is indeed scarcely ever to be looked for, in reference to an ideal order of things. They therefore title to their purpose, nor do they indeed much press the side of the question, to thrust into prominence the imperfections of a body which, however, like the Church of England, has been continually and rapidly throwing imperfections off during the last thirty years. The present revolt, in many respects more remarkable than any which has gone before, is the joint product of a belief in the existence of a great opportunity, and of exasperation at evidence of energy and resolution in the National Church far exceeding the expectations which had been formed in the earlier stages of the Education debates. It is the operation of these two causes, stimulated by the energetic lead of men like Mr. Mill and one or two others, that has induced the Dissenters, representing, as we before said, a considerable section of the middle class, to change their position with unexampled rapidity and completeness, and to make no secret of their intention to sink the interests of primary education, and any other interests that may require sinking, before the engrossing object of an attack upon the National Church along the whole line.

There are already indications that the circumstances of the mal and first point of hostilities lying in the question of education may do much more to frustrate than to advance the assault in general. But, supposing that in a few more Sessions this body of assailants may have attained their object, and that the Church of England may have been disestablished according to the programme, it is by no means an irrelevant or uninteresting process to reflect on this especial loss that would follow—namely, that the religious institution capable of fostering among us a lofty ideal of social and national life would have been cut away. For the Church of England not only lives to suggest the great conception of an associated communion between the Church and the world; it does something else, which, again, no other religious society in England can do, and which is yet more necessary to be done in England than perhaps in any other country in the world, excepting only the United States—it upholds the dignity of the idea of religion. To understand how low a view on that subject men even of great activity and ability may take when they find themselves in a position of complete independence, it is only necessary to glance at Mr. Spurgeon. In the famous description of the dance on the Homeric shield of Achilles it is recorded that a divine minstrel made melody on his lyre, but that, as if by contrast, a tumbler came in and played his antics in the midst. To those who recognize a heaven-inspired harmonious organ in the "dissonance of Dissent," their brother Spurgeon must often painfully remind them of the tumbler and his antics. Only lately he has been edifying and attempting to elevate a Young Men's Christian Association by forbidding them ever again to call him "Reverend," and by disclaiming absolutely a title in which "he does not know himself" and an idea with which he is clearly not familiar. To judge by the rest of his address, the description "no duffer" would seem to his mind a better guarantee for a Baptist minister than any implying a reverend gravity of character. His recent journey to Rome was entirely in harmony with this speech. It was described at his Tabernacle with his usual force, but with the hard-headed obtuseness, coarseness, and ignorance of a man who constantly seems to be slightly irritated at the Almighty for having neglected to make it possible to carry out conversion and regeneration on the strictest business principles.

Within the pale of the Church of England this outrageous tendency to burlesque religion finds its genius rebuked. She at any rate never fails to present an ideal, rising above the heats, the vulgarities, or the diversities of the present, pointing as no other society can point to the past, and tempering prognostications of the future by the historical lessons which alone can give them value. She stands, as Dean Stanley once excellently put it, conspicuous among religious bodies as Westminster Abbey is conspicuous among churches. And at an epoch when ideals for the personal character are harder than ever to gain, and when social and political and religious thoughts want many influences, and have but few, to clear and elevate them, the iconoclast's hammer could ill be tolerated in such a quarter.

THE UNIVERSITY BOAT-RACE.

THE year 1870 will long be memorable in the annals of Europe. Then at least a great power, proud of a long series of thrice glorious victories, was suddenly taught to know defeat, and taught by the very rival whom it had too confidently despised. The causes of this sudden reverse of fortune will long be discussed by philosophic historians, and it would perhaps be premature to dogmatize on the result. Thus much however may be said with confidence, that, as in many other cases, the school of adversity had been useful, and the despised rival had been quietly practising those arts of discipline and careful organization which must ultimately be crowned with success. We are of course speaking of the University boat-clubs, and the sudden revelation to the world of unexpected powers on the part of the Cambridge belligerents. Yet the defeat of the Oxford men, unlike some other contemporary defeats which perhaps attracted as much notice in France and Germany, did not destroy the prestige of the defeated. Cambridge was not immediately assumed to have chained victory to its standards. The British public maintained an unabated interest in the struggles by which succeeding years have been marked. Still, as of old, the day of the race is to large classes the culminating day of the year. It will be described by some persons, not by its ordinary historical title, but as the second Sunday after the Easter term. Youthful ambitions have been brought into the open, and the chance of an encounter in row at oars countless thousands of their countrymen; and though just now the annual paroxysm of excitement is succeeded by a temporary lull, there will soon be a sufficient supply of regattas to sustain the fire of enthusiasm until the serious work of the academical year begins once more in October next.

Last Saturday was worthy of so grand an occasion. Nature, to adopt the fashionable dialect of the moment, came up to the mark. It, if not precisely smiling, how, indeed, could that metaphysical power have rendered homage to our great national institution more suitably than by shrouding herself in a bitter snowstorm? As the spectators gazed through the laden air, through which the keenest vision could scarcely penetrate for a hundred yards, or shook off the soft chilling poultice which clung insinuatingly to the back of their necks, they must have tacitly admitted the propriety of the scenery. Perhaps they felt a little as if they were being taken at their word rather too sharply. Had we not all these years been hearing of the British pluck indistinguishable by the enemy on the elements, and welcoming the wild North-Easter as if we really liked it? It had come at last; and with a vengeance. If there had been an insurrection in London, and the mob had been proposing to hang the Prime Minister in Trafalgar Square, such a storm would have been a more effective ally than a regiment of Guards. Nay, if we may venture on such a hypothesis, if the snow had paid more attention to the proper order of the seasons and appeared on the 27th of February instead of the 23rd of March, we fear that a perceptible damp would have been cast upon British loyalty. Fortunately it came at the right moment to test the zeal of the true zealots of athleticism. If, as Lord Macaulay puts it, Pomona loves the orchard, and Liber loves the vine, the God of gymnasts, whoever he may be, must take a stern delight in the keen March weather, redolent of rheumatism, and almost suggestive of frost-bites, which ushered in the great hour of the contest. Nor was the enthusiasm so rudely tested deficient. If the crowd was thinned of certain lukewarm and dilatory admirers of manly prowess, it was numerous and imposing enough to testify the genuine zeal of the population. Hammersmith Bridge presented its usual festoon of screaming humanity; the last reach was thronged with dense crowds of spectators; and boatfuls of ladies might be observed gallantly ascending with the tide, where a hamper in the stern caked with half-thawed snow was a fitting symbol of the pursuit of conviviality under difficulties.

And now, what are we to say of the race itself? What Muse shall we invoke to give fitting eloquence to our pen? especially as most of those ladies have obviously been already engaged by our brethren of the daily press. Shall we "call up him who left half-told" a certain well-known story, or appeal to the more modern poet who described in fitting language the games held in honour, not indeed of athletics, but of their first cousin, Dulness, on the banks of a stream whose description is now, alas! as well fitted to the Thames himself as to his tributary:—

The king of dykes! than whom no sluice of mud
With deeper sable blots the soil or flood.

Personification is unluckily out of fashion, or we might manufacture an appropriate deity from the power which inspires the eloquence of the Daily Telegraph. Left as we are to our own unassisted powers, we must be content with rendering such justice as we can to an event which, as we are happy to observe, is already familiar in its minutest details to millions of readers. When the impatience was such that a subliminal telegraph was improvised to report progress during the race, we, who necessarily come a week behind, may be excused for languor in dealing with so stale a history.

Suffice it then to say that the race was worthy of the occasion, and more than worthy of our powers of celebration. It is true that it had the remarkable, but not quite unprecedented, feature that all its details had been minutely foreseen by innumerable prophets, who after the event referred with justifiable pride to the accuracy of their foresight. The fact is the more curious as before the event the predictions seemed to the unphilosophic eye to be irreconcilable. We cannot affect to compete with persons of such superhuman acuteness of perception; our vision being as limited as that of the lamented Weller, we could not see through a snow-storm and through the brassy bodies of half-a-dozen stalwart young men, and detect the fact that bow or two in one of the contending boats palpably interfered with the equilibrium of his crew by allowing his tongue to wander into one side of his mouth. We have no claims to equality with the gentleman who, after the Thanksgiving Procession, wrote a letter to the Times with the startling signature, "The eye above that sees all"; nor could we rival his penetration in detecting, not merely Her Majesty's gaiters, but the thoughts which were passing through her mind. We are, and we have no hesitation in avowing, the fact, human; and, as such our nature suffers from certain unavoidable imperfections. Yet, weak as we are, we would venture to add our feeble tribute to the chorus of praise which should encircle the name of Goldie. We remember many distinguished oarsmen whom to name is to excite a thrill of emotion in the bosom of every old frequenter of the Cam. Who is there of twenty years' standing, to go no farther back, whose name does not quiver with something of the old fervour at the mere mention of the name of Jones, whose energy won the British victory ever known on the Thames; of Hall, whose robust, unromantic, was as glorious; or of Griffiths, whose exertions, though late denied to them, an equal success? We confine ourselves to men who held the stroke-oar in their time, but there are many other old oarsmen whose fame is equally green, and amongst those who were present on the ever-rememberable 23rd of March, 1872, there is not one, we are sure, who would not willingly admit that Mr. Goldie's feat surpasses all previous performances. He who has brought back victory after an unparalleled period of depression, who has alone amongst all Cambridge heroes rowed stroke to three victorious crews in succession, and who has won his last struggle in spite of an accident which would have proved fatal to any crew less perfectly trained and depending upon a less cool-headed commander, deserves to be the hero of this and all coming generations of undergraduates at his own University. We cannot praise him, as we have seen him praised, for not immediately communicating his misfortune to his crew, inasmuch as we do not understand how he could possibly have done it; but certainly at the moment when the signal-gun fired and the victory was achieved, he had every right to feel proud of the discipline, due chiefly to his own exertions, and of the personal skill which had defied even so unexpected a turn of fortune. The fact alone is enough to show, in spite of certain special pleadings to the contrary, that there was a very marked difference in the merits of the two crews. Yet Oxford may fairly console themselves by referring to the misfortunes which had dogged their footsteps during training, and by the assertions of all competent observers that they made the most heroic exertions throughout the whole of the race. It is true that we never yet read of a beaten crew whose performance was not one series of magnificent, heroic, determined, and all but invincible spurts, and calculated to reflect upon them more credit than even a victory. That only proves that the race of heroes in this island is too numerous to be in danger of speedy extinction; and we are happy to reflect that we have only one serious criticism to offer, and that it tells only against the intellectual instead of the physical attainments of the crews. It is plain that although Cambridge, as a University, admits the fact that two sides of a triangle are greater than the third, that useful bit of knowledge has not extended itself to the coxswain. If, however, he will remember on a future occasion that zigzagging, though useful in ascending a mountain, is an undesirable motion for a boat, we trust that we may be able to express unqualified admiration of the crew whose course he directs. May Oxford be next year all that Cambridge was this, and Cambridge not decline! Then indeed our eyes will be gratified by a spectacle never yet rivalled, and we shall be able to declare in the fulness and pride of our hearts, We too have been at an English University.

It is possible that some cynics may disapprove of that gushing enthusiasm which we have vainly striven to suppress. They may urge—nay, we have seen it urged in print—that, after all, too much may be made of these athletic performances. Let them remember, however, that the welfare of England depends in no small degree upon the University which set the tone to our young men; and the welfare of the Universities notoriously depends upon the excellence of their rowing. No effort can be too great to maintain the standard of the art. The University race in particular interests a whole nation, from princes down to street boys, in Oxford and Cambridge. If the development of intellect suffers more or less from the importance attached to rowing, it is a generally recognized fact that we are in the habit of trusting to Providence for our supplies of that article. Our legislators, we know, are such as it pleases Heaven to send us; nobody thinks of demanding any intellectual qualification from the men who manage the affairs of the nation; and if we are not squeamish about them, why should we be over-particular in demanding it from our rising generation? Let us take care of our muscles, and our minds will take care of themselves. A good digestion and a cold heart is said to be the secret of happiness; and why should not a powerful biceps, and lungs trained to bear the severest strains on the turf or the river, be the best qualifications for a good citizen? Perhaps the thesis might be maintained; but we confess that we have just a remnant of antiquated scrupulosity which sometimes leads us to doubt whether the Universities are precisely the places which should take the lead in this modern movement for the improvement of the race. In the poem from which we have already quoted a grand prophecy is delivered after the conclusion of the sacred games. We venture to quote the concluding lines, which not unhappily express the forebodings of some people, and we will express our own hope that they may not meet with a too literal fulfilment. The uncaptured ghost of Sattle thus delivers himself:—

Proceed, great days, till learning fly the shore,
Till high shall dash with noble blood no more;
Till Thames and Eam's sons for ever play,
Till Westminster's whole year be holiday;
Till idle elders reel, their pupils' sport,
And Alma Mater lies dissolved in Port!

The last rhyme seems to be imperfect; and though we cannot suggest a perfect emendation, the words might perhaps be adapted, with some loss of poetry, but with a gain in accuracy, as thus:—

THE Cam and Isis cut their lectures short,
And Alma Mater lies absorbed in sport!

THE ENGLISH OF THE PRAYER-BOOK.

It is a little on our commonly received notions of human progress, as we ever and anon do hear, of this or that being lost from among men. Some process of human skill by which men could once produce some class of useful or ornamental objects, nay, perhaps some more dignified process of saving or destroying men's lives, has utterly perished and been forgotten. Now among these lost arts it is painful to have to reckon the art of making prayers. That art has been going down ever since the sixteenth century. In fact, as far as we Englishmen are concerned, it may be said to have existed only during a few years in the middle of the sixteenth century. There was one short moment in our ecclesiastical history when we were left wholly to ourselves, to the dictates of our own insular wisdom, when we had got rid of Rome and had not yet let in Geneva. It is a thing to be noticed that our first Prayer-Book, our most truly English Prayer-Book, did not contain the Daily Exhortation which is sometimes irreverently spoken of as "Dearly Beloved." At the other end, too, it did not contain that marvellous prayer for the Queen's Majesty which sounds as if its author, having raised Queen Elizabeth almost to the level of Deity, was puzzled to find words yet more exalted for the invocation of Deity itself. Nor did it contain that other prayer which seems to class among "great marvels" the possibility of clergy and people each doing their duty in that state of life to which it has pleased God to call them. Some people have ventured to think that, now that there is a talk of shortening the Services, the best way of shortening Morning and Evening Prayer would be to get rid of the later excrescences which have grown on to them at both ends. But these are matters which are too high for us, and we will not risk ourselves a step further in the way of discussing them. We wish to look at the Prayer-Book, not as a matter either of theology or of ecclesiastical law, but as a matter of the English tongue.

On the whole, there is for us no English like the English of the Prayer-Book, and, next to that, no English like that of our translation of the Bible. Both were made at a happy moment. They belong to that exact stage of our language which is archaic enough to be venerable, but not so archaic as to be generally hard to understand. Being the only writings of their own age which are thoroughly familiar to every one, they seem to have a character of their own, a sort of personal existence apart from other writings which does not belong to them in their own nature. We feel towards them in a way in which the men of the sixteenth century could not have felt towards them. But our feeling, if in some sort the result of accident, is none the less real and healthy. It is a great thing to have a monument of that fresh and vigorous stage of our language familiar to every ear and every tongue. But that is not all; the English of the Prayer-Book has something more than the incidental merit of representing a very happy stage of the language. The men who used it knew thoroughly well what they were about; they knew how to adapt their language to the particular purpose for which it was meant. The sixteenth century was an age of long-winded sentences; but we find no long-winded sentences in the original portions of the Prayer-Book; and the authors of the Prayer-Book understood in its perfection one art which we will not say is wholly lost, but which it is certain that a vast number of people do not understand or care for. We mean the art of prose rhythm. Many people seem to put together their sentences anyhow; they either do not think about the matter at all, or only think how they may drag in the longest words. But here and there you find a writer who weighs every syllable that he writes, to whom a syllable too much or too little is as painful in a prose sentence as in a stanza of verse, and to whom a thoughtless change of a rhythmically built sentence is as grating to the ear as a false quantity in a hexameter or iambic verse. There is some mysterious law in these matters which we are not philosophers enough to throw into the shape of any definite precepts, but about which a careful writer feels by instinct when it is obeyed and when it is broken. Now among men who thoroughly knew what rhythm was we must give a high place to the makers of our Prayer-Book, and, above all, to the authors of the older translation of the Book of Psalms. They knew what people nowadays seem to forget, that what they wrote was meant to be said or sung. They therefore by an unerring instinct threw it into a form in which it really could be said or sung. A modern Archbishop's occasional prayer may be a very devout and orthodox composition, it may be a first-rate example of the art of new writing, but it is about as fit to be said or sung as an article in the Daily Telegraph or the speech of a Duke at an agricultural meeting. In fact, when we read of some political magnate expressing "the enormous satisfaction" with which he sets forth the "magnificent demonstration of such a concourse of people," we get a dim feeling of a vastness and stateliness which is something more than ducal, almost archiepiscopal. We have no notion by what process either lordly speeches or archiepiscopal prayers are put together, but we have read somewhere of some part of Great Tartary where they have a praying-machine which pulls out prayers by the yard, or whatever may be the proper measure for reckoning the length of a prayer in an agglutinative language. We have seen in our own country a mill which turned out Latin verses, and we cannot help thinking that some machinery of the same kind is busily at work in turning out various specimens of language, spiritual and temporal. For our part we have no hope, unless we could see our way to conjuring up a man of the sixteenth century to make our prayers for us. Failing that, we would suggest that we should give up a task which has proved utterly hopeless, and should content ourselves with the undoubted truth that nothing ever yet happened for which it was not easy to find an appropriate psalm. This brings us back to our former point. How much rhythm tells in the matter is shown by the fact that we still keep in use the translation of the Psalms which was made in the time of Henry the Eighth. No one doubts that the translation of James the First's time is, as a matter of Hebrew scholarship, an incomparably better translation. No one doubts that in the older version many passages are quite wrongly rendered, and that some are quite unintelligible. Yet the reviewers of Charles the Second's time, when they ordered the Epistles and Gospels to be changed to the new translation, did not think of applying the same rule to the Psalms. And, as far as we know, no one wishes for any such change now. Indeed the later version is hardly ever used at all; no one ever quotes it except as a text for a sermon. And why? Because every one feels that, whatever may be its faults in other ways, the older version is a noble piece of English, and that it is specially suited for its special purpose, that of being said or sung. Every verse of the older version is rhythmical; the music is ready made. The more correct version of King James's translators it would be hopeless to try to sing; the thing could not be done; the clauses are not built for the purpose. As for any further attempts at improvement in our own day, we shudder to think of them. A closer approach to the exact meaning of the Hebrew would be dearly purchased if "the round world and all that therein is" should be changed into "the terraqueous globe and the entirety of its contents."

We have been led into this train of thought by a document purporting to be a scheme for the reform of the Athanasian Creed. We have by some chance stumbled on it in a report of the proceedings of the Convocation of York, but which we have no doubt has been laid before the Convocation of Canterbury also. The document is a report signed by five Bishops—those of London, Winchester, Gloucester and Bristol, Ely, and Chester. Now let us ask our readers to look for a moment at the Creed, or whatever it is to be called, which has just now once more become the subject of so much controversy, from an unusual point of view. We ask to be allowed to be for awhile neither theological, nor historical, nor critical. We will say not a word as to the dogmas which the Creed sets forth, or as to the wisdom of fencing them in with anathemas. We will be for the nonce wholly indifferent whether it is a work of the time of Constantius or a work of the time of Charles the Great. We will not hearken to any discussions as to the authority of this or that manuscript, or as to the critical value of this or that reading. We will look at the English version of the Creed, as it stands in our Prayer-Books, simply as a piece of English. As such it is beyond all praise; nothing was ever yet put together more thoroughly suited to be said or sung. It is hardly possible to read it without being irresistibly tempted to the act of saying or singing. The rhythm of every clause is perfect; there is not a syllable too much or too little; crowded necessarily as it is with technical terms of theology, it is wonderful to see how they have been caught and broken in and made to play their part in a piece of English which for its own purpose is altogether unsurpassed. When the Creed is properly sung by a well-trained choir, a heretic himself could almost submit to be cursed in a formula of such majestic harmony. And now let us see what our five Bishops propose to do. They may have, for aught we know, good reasons enough as concerns the Latin text, but they are going to destroy an altogether perfect piece of English. They begin in the very first verse; "whosoever will be saved," is to be "whosoever willeth to be saved." Now the five Bishops who laid their heads together had not any one of them ear enough to feel that their proposal gives two syllables too much, and utterly ruins the rhythm of the first clause. The next change is, if possible, worse. "Everlastingly" is to be changed into "eternally." The reason of this change is wholly beyond us; if any theological difference lurks between the two words, if "eternally" is supposed to be a milder formula than "everlastingly," we are too dense to follow so subtle a distinction. But we do see that a Latin word is needlessly put in the place of an English one, and that a wonderful piece of rhythm is utterly swept away. It shows how every rule has its exceptions—it shows the instinctive delicacy of ear of the English translators of the Creed—that, while in this verse it would be ruin to put the Latin word instead of the English, yet in that place of the Creed where the Latin word is found, to replace it by the English would be, to say the least, no improvement. Then we come to the clause which contains the word "incomprehensible," a long foreign word, and used in an unusual sense, but which yet, by some lucky chance, gives exactly the rhythm that is wanted. The five Bishops propose to substitute "infinite"; if a rubric be added to say that the accent is to be laid on the second syllable the change may be just borne, but even then the majestic roll of the longer word will be lost. And, if the word be sounded as it commonly is, the whole music of the clause will vanish utterly. And so the thing goes on; a number of small changes are proposed which may likely enough, as in the case of the Psalms, more correctly represent some more correct Latin text, but which are so many death-blows to the hymn Quicumque vult as a piece of English to be said or sung. Lastly, the last clause of all is to stand thus:—"This is the holy and Catholic Faith, which every man who desireth to attain to eternal life ought to know wholly and to guard faithfully." No doubt, as far as regards the matter, the new formula is a considerable softening down of the old one, but the one can be sung, and the other cannot; and, as all Psalms and Hymns should be sung as they are to be said or sung in churches, we should ask the five Bishops where we are to put the point in a sentence almost as long as a German sentence in the old-fashioned Kanzleystyl. We see that in the debates of the Northern Convocation the announcement of these proposed changes was immediately followed by a proposal by the Dean of Chester and the Bishop of Ripon to get rid of the Creed altogether in public worship. Perhaps, if it is to be mauled in this ruthless way, its friends as well as its enemies may be less keen to make a fight on its behalf.

But the question is only part of a more general one. There may be good reasons, theological or other, for changes either in the Prayer-Book or in the translation of the Bible; but those who are set on such a delicate task should at least remember that what they are handling is, whatever else it is, one of the most precious possessions of Englishmen, a monument of their native speech which forms no small part of their national heritage. No doubt our received translation of the Bible might in many places be improved. We do not say a word against any such improvement; but, with such examples as we have before us, we do feel very great dread lest an indiscreet and unsympathizing meddling with compositions of the very highest order may take away something which, by association at least, is certainly not less valuable than a more minutely correct reproduction of the original.

THE RIVAL PROGRAMMES.

THE Duke of Edinburgh, having come forward as spokesman of the projectors of Albert Hall, must submit to have his speech criticized as if it had been uttered by Mr. Cole C.B. and the other troublesome persons who instructed him. The net result of this manifesto is that the shareholders in the Albert Hall collectively represent the nation, but that individually they are entitled to make the best profit they can upon their shares. Slowly and reluctantly, but inevitably, the high-soaring benefactors of the human race are driven to admit that, like other commercial Companies, they seek a dividend. They are now advertising a series of eighteen concerts "of the highest class." Her Majesty the Queen "has intimated her hope" to be present at the first of the great Choral Concerts. The subscription is as follows, &c. If Sir Charles Dilke had "intimated his hope" that a fair proportion of the profits of this particular concert would be paid by the managers of the Albert Hall into the Treasury, the notion would not have been as absurd as some others which he has propounded. The great majority of the nation thinks that Royalty is worth its cost, and that the yearly bill ought to be paid without narrowly scrutinizing the items. But still it must be felt that Royalty belongs to the nation, and ought not to be lent like a theatrical property to private speculators. At rare intervals the Queen has made what are called State visits to the theatre or opera. These visits are necessarily announced some time beforehand, and probably the manager is able to dispose of tickets at an enhanced price. But still the immediate object of this arrangement is a State ceremony, whereas the advertisement which we have quoted is obviously intended merely to sell the tickets for the series of concerts "of the highest class." The tickets are to be transferable, and people who apply for them in good time will doubtless make a good thing by transferring tickets for the particular concert at which Her Majesty may be able to realize the hope which she now intimates. The managers of theatres and concert-halls may reasonably ask why this privilege should be granted to a new and formidable rival. The names of "Prince," "Princess," and "Victoria," have been for many years applied to places of public entertainment without attracting any great amount of Royal patronage; and it is difficult to understand how the name of "Albert" comes to be so much more efficacious. The mock procession comprising Britannia and the British Lion which appeared in Oxford Street on Thanksgiving Day was perhaps regarded as an impertinence. But the party of circus-riders and clowns who on that occasion competed with Royalty for popular favour would now be justified in alleging that Royalty competes with them.

The Duke of Edinburgh was of course instructed to handle discreetly this delicate subject of the Royal patronage of Albert Hall. He said that a proposal had been set on foot for establishing a hall for the encouragement of science and art facing the Albert Memorial, "forming an integral part of it, and intended to give, as it were, life to the whole." The Duke of Edinburgh is probably no more responsible for the language of his speech than the Queen is for that which Ministers put into her mouth when she opens Parliament. Indeed we think that the style of his address supports the idea which the managers of the Hall are anxious to encourage, that they have an intimate connexion with the Court. Surely no speaker who was not officially inspired would commit the absurdity of stating that the Albert Hall was intended to form "an integral part" of the Albert Memorial on the other side of the road. You might as well say that the National Gallery was intended to form "an integral part" of the Nelson monument, or the Houses of Parliament an integral part of the statue of King Richard I. Besides, we happen to remember that very soon after the death of the Prince Consort an attempt was made to turn the national sorrow for his loss into a profitable commodity, and much trouble was taken by ourselves and others to expose and defeat the scheme by which the speculators of South Kensington endeavoured to convert themselves into representatives of the British Empire. The result is that there is a monument which is national in the Park, and there is the Hall, which is private property, beyond. The intention was not that the one should be an integral part of the other, but that the two should be distinct, and this intention has been carried out; although Mr. Cole C.B. and his associates have been incessantly scheming to depart from it. The notion of the Hall "giving life" to the Memorial is even more surprising. We should have conjectured that the object of the clients of the Duke of Edinburgh was to make the Memorial, or rather the memory, of the Prince Consort, "give life" to the Hall. The Duke proceeds to say:—"This Hall can, therefore, to a certain extent, be considered as a national undertaking, and as far as it is concerned, the corporation may be considered to represent the nation." The word "therefore" indicates that the Duke supposes himself to have demonstrated the national character of the Hall. But, as we understand, his proof amounts to no more than this, that the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851 realized a surplus which they invested in land, on part of which stands the Albert Hall. It is notorious that these Commissioners attempted to take the nation into partnership, and the nation declined a connexion which, however advantageous, would have been very costly. Like Sir Peter Teazle and his wife, the country was to find the money, and Cole & Co. would spend it elegantly.

We must demur to the Duke's conclusion that the corporation of seatholders of the Albert Hall "may be considered to represent the nation," and it is to be lamented that he should have been made the unwitting mouthpiece of the impudent mendacity which dictated this statement. Parliament, which does represent the nation, has distinctly refused to allow it to be involved in the proceedings of the Commissioners, and a connexion with the corporation of the Albert Hall would be still more intolerable. The Duke, indeed, admits in the next sentence that this corporation is nothing but a commercial company. "Of course," he says, "the individual seatholder is entitled to consider his interest as a pecuniary one; but the corporation as a body should take a large and expansive view of the institution." Here, again, we find a resemblance to the style of a Queen's Speech, which is perhaps assumed in order to countenance the idea that the corporation and the nation are one concern. It must be confessed that the founders of the Hall take a sufficiently expansive view of that institution when they represent it as national. It is now to be placed, the Duke says, "on a sound basis." It is to be self-supporting, with a prospect of just sufficient gain to ensure maintenance and gradual improvement. There is to be an efficient manager well paid, and there are to be—incredible as it may appear—penny concerts. The inhabitants of Chelsea have closed Cremorne, and the inhabitants of Lambeth are trying to prevent the opening of the Surrey Gardens. It remains to be seen whether the inhabitants of Kensington will patiently endure the establishment in their neighbourhood of a gigantic penny gaff. The working-man is admirable in his proper place, but if he gets between the wind and nobility it is possible that nobility may object. The result of the Duke's statement is that the corporation desire to sell more sittings, or, in other words, to raise further capital; and it may not perhaps be irrelevant to remark, that a man in fustian or rags who pays one penny may contrive to occupy a seat or box for which the nominal proprietor has paid many guineas.

There's a difference between

or at least there used to be. But it appears that at the Albert Hall dukes and roughs are likely to come into nearer juxtaposition than they have done since the days of prizefighting.

The managers of the Crystal Palace are not so fortunate as to be assisted by a Royal Duke in taking "an expansive view" of that institution, and maintaining it "in a manner worthy of the magnitude of the undertaking and the importance of its objects." They might, indeed, make a merit of expecting only just sufficient gain to ensure maintenance and improvement, because they are very unlikely to get more. But at any rate they have not yet reached the point of contemplating penny concerts. Their programme for Good Friday is curiously constructed to propitiate, if possible, at once the religious and the secular elements of society. You could keep either holy day or holiday within their precincts. There was a grand sacred concert, and a hymn sung by as many visitors as choose to join in it; while other visitors were attracted by an artistic and scientific programme, in which we observe that compounds of "ology" occur with alarming frequency. It appears that for this day only the doxology was added to the usual series. It is rather hard upon the old establishment at Norwood that the new one at Kensington should quietly treat it as non-existent, and proceed upon the supposition that fine-art courts, and picture galleries, and technological collections have been invented by its founders for the intellectual improvement of the British public. The managers of the Crystal Palace bear up as well as they can against the formidable competition of the Albert Hall. We have compared their printed programme for the season with the speech of the Duke of Edinburgh, and we are unable to decide which is the more wonderful example of literary composition. There is to be at Norwood "a poetical allegory or masque," which we might unwisely have called a ballet, on Easter Monday. In this entertainment "the deliciousness of flowers will be combined with that of fountains and cascades of real water, as well as with other particular features." Surely the force of descriptive language can no further go. But there is commercially an enormous difference between a mere advertisement in the first page of the Times and an adnouncement in the form of a report of a speech by the Duke of Edinburgh. The Directors of the Crystal Palace have engaged "Wombwell's Royal Menagerie" for the season, but the Committee of the Albert Hall have engaged Royalty itself.

THE OLD CATHOLICS IN AUSTRIA AND GERMANY.

THE German bishops seem ready enough to take up the gauntlet thrown down by Prince Bismarck. Another episcopal meeting in Fulda is announced to be held in April; the fourth, we believe, in that ill-omened place during the last two years and a half. Meanwhile the Bishop of Ermland, who had been requested by the Government to withdraw his excommunications, as being contrary to the law of the land, has not only not complied with the request, but has already named a successor to the excommunicated parish priest (Grunet); while the military provost, Rasmankowski, who may be presumed to be acting under his direction, has forbidden Grunet to officiate any longer as chaplain of the forces, thereby contravening the instructions of the military authorities. At Bonn the four recalcitrant Professors of the Catholic Faculty have been solemnly excommunicated by the Archbishop of Cologne, and have replied to his sentence in a manifesto, to which we shall have occasion to refer presently. One of them has since preached in the Alt Katholik church at Bonn, and a Conference of some hundred Old Catholic deputies from various cities in Germany has been held there. A general Congress is summoned for next September at Cologne. The Austrian bishops, who were prominent in the Opposition at Rome, appear to be no less resolute in enforcing the Vatican dogmas, but they have hitherto been supported rather than restrained by their Government. As far as words go, we doubt indeed whether any of them has approached the new Archbishop of Paris, whose recent Lenten pastoral is truly a marvel of composition. We can only pause here in passing to call a few specimens of the flowers of sacred eloquence which adorn its pages. It traces throughout an elaborate parallel, which to a colder or more reverent faith might seem almost blasphemous, between "Pius IX. and Him whose Vicar he is." The former, we are told, like his Master, has nowhere to lay his head, his house has become a prison, and is continually threatened; his royal diadem is replaced by a crown of thorns, "and he appears in his desolation such as was the Divine Saviour in His Passion; he is really in the eyes of the universe the Jere Homo, the Man of Sorrows"; he is expiating in union with his Divine Master the crimes of the age, "and renews in the sight of men and angels the sublime spectacle of the death of the God-Man." There are certainly, by the way, no traces of this melancholy state of things in the telegram which records the reception of the Prince and Princess of Wales at the Vatican. It is of course only natural after this that such wondrous resemblances should be declared worthy of all admiration and respect, and that the faithful should be exhorted "to bear his cross for him like Simon of Cyrene, and wipe his face like the pious Veronica." We can understand now something of the "Pius-cult," or as others have styled it, Lamaism, said to be practised at Rome, which must in fairness be allowed to be a perfectly legitimate corollary of the infallibilist dogma. How far any other cult is likely to be benefited or encouraged by it is another question. Dr. Michaud will probably feel that his Archbishop has supplied a fresh justification for the step he has taken in renouncing allegiance to him. Our present concern, however, is rather with the course of proceedings in Germany than in France. And we will first turn to Austria, where the last move of the Government in refusing any civil recognition to the status or acts of the Old Catholic clergy is provoking strong remonstrance. Two important documents are before us which deserve some notice here—the one, a pamphlet by Massen, the learned Professor of Canon Law at Vienna, who has followed the example of his brother canonist, Sobhito of Prague, in stating his views on the decree of Stremayer, the Minister of Worship, the other, a Memorial addressed to the Chamber of Deputies by the Superior of the Old Catholic congregation at Vienna.

Professor Massen expounded his estimate of the situation in what reads very like the preamble of an Act of Parliament. We may thus summarize his leading points. The notion that the State in its dealings with a religious community has simply to consider who are its regular officers, and not what doctrine they teach, is false in principle, and leads to absurd consequences; while on the other hand even bishops assembled in Council may err in definitions of faith, as was indeed acknowledged by the Vatican Council when it declared the Pope to be the divinely constituted organ of infallibility. But the doctrine that a mere man possesses the infallibility of the Almighty Creator is in glaring contradiction with the Catholic faith, which has therefore been essentially altered by the Vatican decree; and this, moreover, was expressly affirmed in the memorandum of the Austrian Minister of Worship of July 25, 1870, where it is said to involve a "fundamental revolution," and one which must affect all the relations hitherto existing between Church and State. And even if the strict consequences deducible from this declaration are not to be pressed against the innovators, the State is at least bound to observe its obligations towards those who adhere to the unaltered faith of the Church. From these premises Dr. Massen draws five practical conclusions. In the first place, the State is bound to refuse civil recognition to ecclesiastical censures pronounced against those who reject the Vatican dogmas; secondly, in parishes where the regular pastor is an infallibilist, it is bound to secure to the Old Catholic members of the congregation the joint use of the parish church; and, thirdly, to guarantee, under such conditions as it may choose to fix, the rights of Old Catholic pastors in dioceses presided over by an infallibilist bishop. And further, the State is bound to take care, in applying the laws on education, that no violence is done to the conscience either of Old Catholics or infallibilists. Finally, there is urgent need for such legislation as may definitively secure the equal rights of both classes of believers. The tone and substance of this manifesto seem moderate enough, and the same may be said of the whole of the address of the Old Catholics to the Chamber of Deputies. The grievance chiefly dwelt on, which is no doubt one of constant recurrence, is the present legal invalidity of Old Catholic marriages. The petitioners state quite truly that, according to the invariably received Catholic doctrine, marriage is a sacrament by virtue of the consent of the parties themselves, and independently of any religious ceremony, and they deny that the State has any right to meddle with this purely doctrinal question. It follows that to refuse civil validity to the marriages of Old Catholics and treat them as concubinage is an oppression of conscience as well as an injustice, a mere stretch of "might over right." If civil marriage were compulsory in Austria, the difficulty would of course be solved; but at present the faithful generally shrink from it on conscientious grounds, and obviously it cannot with any show of justice be imposed on one part of the community and not on the other. The petitioners also insist on their equitable claim to the retention of Church property, as maintaining the ancient and unaltered faith of the Church. There was reported to be some disposition on the part of the Government to reconsider its attitude on this question, and the influential protests which it has elicited can hardly fail of producing some effect; but the latest news is that Stremayer's decree is confirmed. In Baden, on the other hand, as we gather from the recent reply of the Minister of State to a question in the Chamber, the Government is following the Bavarian precedent. At Munich the parish priest of St. Peter's, a furious intellilist, is being proceeded against for a violent political sermon.

The spirited letter addressed to the Archbishop of Cologne by the four excommunicated Professors at Bonn is, in a religious sense, a still more weighty document. It bears the date of March 16, four days after the sentence was pronounced, and is subscribed by Dr. Hilgers, Dr. Reusch, and Dr. Langen, Professors in the Catholic Faculty of Theology, and Dr. Knodt, Catholic Professor of Philosophy. They begin by citing the words of the episcopal misave which declare them "to have ex ipso facto incurred the greater excommunication for notorious heresy in refusing their ex animo assent to the decrees of the Ecumenical Council of the Vatican." To this they reply that, as the sin of heresy consists in the deliberate rejection of the doctrine of the Church, they have not incurred it by refusing to accept dogmas which they are convinced form no part of the deposit of faith handed down from the Apostles, while they still adhere to the doctrine of the Catholic Church as they were themselves taught it, and as they have for years past publicly taught it to others, with the full sanction of ecclesiastical authority, "in which faith, by God's grace, they desire to live and die." And then they proceed to recall to the Archbishop's memory one or two notorious facts. They remind his Grace of his own declaration, in March 1870, in the Synopsis Observationum, that for many reasons he could not assent to the proposed definition of infallibility, and that many learned and orthodox theologians considered such a definition impossible on account of the grave historical difficulties and the manifold adverse testimonies of the holy Fathers, while many, even of those who desired it, had no such firm conviction as is requisite for imposing an article of faith under anathema. Nor had it ever been the custom of the Church to suppose such definitions without at least the moral unanimity of the bishops assembled in Council, which could not in this case be looked for. He had added that in many countries the opinion was unknown to the faithful, and would be regarded as a fundamental change of their religion. And again, in the Protest of May 8 against introducing the Schema on the Primacy, which was also signed by Archbishop Malthus, in common with the other Opposition bishops, the promoters of the dogma are described as men qui non minus Ecclesiam et fides universales scholarumque optimis patrum videtur sustinere Ecclesiam aversum undam infrent. An opinion that cannot possibly, the Professors observe, be an article of faith. They add that till quite recently the contrary has been taught in Catholic schools and catechisms under ecclesiastical authority, and that the most illustrious champions of Catholicism, like Count Stolberg, described Papal infallibility as "one of those gross falsehoods invented and propagated by the enemies of the Catholic religion." Count Stolberg, we may remark, was a special hero with Dr. Robertson, the Disseminator; and Dr. Aspinwall, and Professor of History in "the Catholic University of Dublin," who declares that he "gave the first impulse to Catholic literature, and commenced that series of brilliant writers who have since adorned Catholic Germany." But the impediment to accepting the Vatican decree, the Professors proceed to state, lies in opinions and not in persons, "as a blind party loyalty is not the basis of a true religion, and those who teach it are not to be considered as the enemies of the Church."

where of the usual reply, which Archbishop Manning has emphatically propounded in this country, that historical facts must succumb to dogmatic decrees of a General Council? But not to limit on the circumstance that the Vatican Synod has simply "assented to" a Papal decree (exco[m]municatio), neither Pope nor Council is competent to add anything to the traditional deposit of faith, nor would any Council which observed the rules hitherto followed at such assemblies attempt it. And here again the Professors refer to the protest of the Bishops of May 8; on the method of procedure adopted at the Vatican Synod, which they solemnly condemned in apud homines, in in tremenda Dei iudicio, quantum ad nos attinet; and desired that their protest should remain as a perpetuo documentum of their mind on the subject. It is further notorious that no searching examination of the question, such as Cardinal Rönacher and many other bishops declared to be absolutely indispensable, ever took place at the Council, and that many of its members opposed not only the opportuneness, but the doctrinal truth, of the definition. A decision thus arrived at cannot become an article of faith through the subsequent "submission" of the bishops who opposed it, and those who are excommunicated for continuing to reject it must repudiate the sentence as invalid, according to the words of Pope Gelasius I. in his letter to the Eastern bishops, that "an unjust sentence can injure no one before God and His Church." And as for the scandal caused by the excommunication of priests who have long exercised their office of public teachers in a University without blame, the responsibility must rest on those who have pronounced it, not on them. They appeal with confidence to the judgment of those whose respect they value, and to the invisible Lord of the Church, against the iniquitous sentence designed to exclude them from its communion. The letter concludes, "It rests with God whether we shall live to see the end of the present confusion. But we had rather depart this life laden with unjust censures than become accomplices of those who have introduced this confusion, or who, in their mistaken zeal for upholding the external unity of the Church, have professed doctrines which they could not fail to perceive, as we did, on candid examination, to be nothing short of a fundamental perversion of the traditional faith of the Catholic Church." This is plain speaking of a kind which the Archbishop, who is reported to be something of a despot over his clergy, will hardly appreciate. And it follows close on the death of the excommunicated nun, Sister Augustine, in the same diocese, of whom we lately spoke, and who preferred, like these Professors, to die under ecclesiastical censure rather than purchase absolution by abjuring her hereditary faith.

THE TIEBORNE CLAIMANT'S APPEAL.

IT appears that the Tieborne Claimant has broken down as a commercial speculation, and that those who supplied him with funds to carry on his suit, on the chance of pocketing a large share of his winnings, are not prepared to provide for his defence now that the question has become only one of justice. The Claimant has, therefore, been obliged to appeal to the public for subscriptions; and of course he is very sanguine as to the result. He is evidently a man, if not, as Wordsworth says, of cheerful yesterdays, at least of confident to-morrows. Only a few thousands more and up he goes, and no mistake this time; first he must get rid of this charge of perjury, which with money he can easily do; then he will begin an action for the Doughty estates; and with the proceeds of these, of course he will get them—he will pay off the trifle of 80,000*l.* due as costs on the late suit, and have another sling at the Tieborne property. These are his projects, as confided to a friendly Reporter; but in his letter he confines himself to the question of the moment. We should not wonder if this appeal met with a liberal response. Confidence begets confidence; and Englishmen have not only a strong love of fair play, but a natural disposition to side with a man who is down, and who seems to be deserted by his friends, or by those who stuck to him as long as they thought they could make anything out of him. There is a general desire that the mystery of the case—as far as there is any mystery—should be probed to the bottom; and the Tieborne trial has been such good reading for a long time, and the new novels are all so stupid, that many people meet it very much, and would probably not object to pay handsomely for a continuation of it; with new effects and a change of scene. In a country like this there are always a considerable number of persons who do not know what to do with their money; and who are glad of any excuse for parting with it, especially if it supplies excitement and attacks of benevolence. "Some men," according to the profound aphorism in the Claimant's note-book, "has plenty money and no brains; and some men has plenty brains and no money; surely men with plenty money and no brains were made for men with plenty brains and no money." It would be absurd to find fault with the Claimant's method of appeal; and of course those who think that it is a bad one, and that without assistance he will not be able to secure a fair trial, will naturally give him the benefit of their contribution. A very nice question might indeed be raised as to the propriety of such money being procured to carry on the former suit, and the Tieborne householders will find some observations on this subject in a well-known chapter on "Offences against Public Decency," which may perhaps have a personal interest for them. Maintenance is defined by Blackstone to be "an offence in meddling in a suit that no way belongs to one, by maintaining or assisting either party, with money or otherwise, to prosecute or defend it." A man may, however, with impunity maintain the suit of a near kinsman, servant, or poor neighbour out of charity and compassion. Maintenance may also consist, as Bacon remarks, "in assisting another to his pretensions to lands, or holding them for him by force or subtlety, or stirring up quarrels in the country in relation to matters wherein one is no way concerned." Champerty (comp[ar]te) is a bargain with a plaintiff or defendant to divide the land or other matter sued for, as, for example, the revenues of lands, if they prevail at law; whereupon the champartor is to carry on the party's suit at his own expense. "These pests of civil society," Blackstone observes with some vehemence, "that are perpetually endeavouring to disturb the repose of their neighbours, and officiously interfering in other men's quarrels, even at the hazard of their own fortunes, were severely and unadverted upon by the Roman law; they were punished by the forfeiture of a third part of their goods, and by perpetual infamy." But these remarks need not deter people from subscribing to the Castro Defence Fund. To assist a man in endeavouring to obtain possession of estates by a suit at law, on condition of sharing the proceeds of the action if successful, is obviously a different thing from providing a prisoner with the means of defending himself from a criminal charge. Fraudulent or vexatious claims to property would certainly be encouraged if it became usual to carry on civil suits on joint-stock principles, with limited liability for the safety of the speculators.

Of course the Claimant is right to appeal to the public for subscriptions, if he thinks he can get any; but the public, on the other hand, will naturally consider whether there are any reasons why the Claimant is entitled to special sympathy and assistance as compared with his companions in Newgate and the inmates of other Houses of Detention throughout the country; and whether, considering how much money he has already had, and the use he has made of it, to give him more would not be sending good money after bad. In his letter the Claimant represents himself as a "cruelly persecuted" man, "a victim of might against right," and he suggests that all the power of the Government is now being employed to crush him in consequence of the Attorney-General having been leading counsel for the Tieborne family. In a conversation with an interviewing Reporter he is said to have further complained that he was very ill used by the Judge and jury in the Common Pleas, as well as by the defendants and their lawyers. Mr. Gorton, the Claimant's solicitor, has also written to the papers to insinuate that the Tieborne family do not believe in the truth of their own story that Roger was tattooed, and that it was only concocted as an afterthought to strengthen a weak case. It may be doubted whether the interests of the Claimant are likely to be advanced by newspaper controversy, and, above all, by narrowing the issue to be decided to a question whether there has been deliberate fraud and perjury on the part of the members of the Tieborne family or of the Claimant. We have no intention of going into the details of the evidence as to the tattoo marks; but we imagine that nobody except the Claimant and his solicitor has any difficulty in understanding why the Tieborne family may have thought it expedient not to make a premature disclosure of their information on this subject. Assuming the Claimant to be an impostor, it was natural to suppose that, if he had heard anything about the tattoo marks, he would at once make inquiries as to what sort of marks they were, and endeavour to imitate them on his own person. The evidence which was produced in the late trial, and especially the Dowager's own letters, showed that, whether or not the Claimant was Roger, the poor crazy old lady was determined to recognize him, even before she saw him or knew anything about him; and that in her childish folly she was not only willing, but eager, to provide the means of imposing on herself and others. It was evident that nothing would shake her foregone conclusion as to the Claimant's identity with Roger, and that everything she knew or that came to her ears was at once communicated to her supposed son. It was therefore the merest prudence for the Tieborne family to keep their secret to themselves until they saw that it would be safe to divulge it. There can be no doubt that the evidence as to these marks produced a strong impression on the jury, and if the Claimant can shake it he will make a good point for himself. At the same time it must also be remembered that when the jury were asked whether their intimation that the case had gone far enough was based exclusively on this part of it, they replied that it was not; and that they had taken the whole case into careful consideration. Nor would it altogether save the Claimant even if he could produce Arthur Orton in Court as distinct from himself; that would only show that he is not Orton, but he might still be Tom Castro, and an impostor. Of course if Roger Tieborne's relatives are leagued in a conspiracy to disown him, that is no doubt persecution; and the Claimant will have an opportunity of proving it, if he can. If he means, however, as we understand him to mean, that he is also being persecuted by the Government, it is necessary to point out that, after the collapse of the Claimant's suit, Chief Justice Bovill had no alternative but to order him into custody on a charge of perjury, and that it was demanded by the law officers of the Crown to undertake the prosecution. In every respect the Claimant has been treated in precisely the same way as any other person would be treated who was committed to prison on a similar charge. The question of hall is in the hands, not of the Government, but of the Judges; his papers have been seized by the police in the ordinary way; and if he is without funds to pay the costs of his defence, he is only in the same position in which many other accused persons unhappily find themselves. It must not be forgotten that the Claimant was, in one sense, on his trial in the Common Pleas; that all the evidence he could produce was listened to with the utmost patience for months together, and that he had provisionally had five or six years to get up his case. He must have been aware of the double-edge of the weapon he was fighting with, and of the penalty which awaited him if he failed to win.

The result of the Claimant's appeal to the public will help to complete the wonderful exhibition of human nature which has been presented by this case. The evidence of some of the witnesses reads like a page of Thackeray or Balzac; and the whole story illustrates in a striking and vivid manner the peculiarities of human nature, its strange workings, springs of action, subtleties, humours, and stupidities. Perhaps nothing has been more remarkable in this way than the sources of sympathy for the Claimant. His evident pluck and the romantic character of his story appealed strongly to the popular taste; but his chief attraction to the mob which used to cheer him seems to have been a kind of confused notion that somehow or other he was fighting their battle, and vindicating the right of a butcher, or, at any rate, of a man with a butcher's manners, to a place among the aristocracy. They would probably not have insisted so strongly on his being Roger if they had not half believed him to be Orton. Then of course there were the people who, having formed a theory in his favour, made it a personal matter that it should be sustained at all hazards, and who resented as an insult any doubts as to his identity. From this class of people the Claimant may surely expect a good haul of half-crowns, if not of five-pound notes. We hope that all the subscribers will state their reasons for subscribing, and we are glad to see that "Edward Jenkins," in a letter to the Daily News, has set the example. Mr. Jenkins explains that he places five pounds at the feet of the Claimant in order to express his contempt for the present composition of the House of Commons. To some people the connexion between the two things may seem rather remote. Members of Parliament are, it appears in Mr. Jenkins's opinion, "toadies," and "developments of modern sycophancy," and "as soon as a man has been kicked out of Court by a histionic Judge and weary jury," they applaud the Government for prosecuting him. "As a taxpayer," Mr. Jenkins objects to a prosecution for perjury, because he has some recollection of some other case of quite a different kind which he thinks the Government should have taken up, but which they left in the hands of a private person who had voluntarily undertaken it. If Mr. Jenkins feels bound to subscribe for the Claimant because he does not like the House of Commons, the Liberation Society ought to come down handsomely because it hates the Church. We should think that a great many equally good reasons might easily be discovered why everybody should send something to the Castro Fund; but it may perhaps strike an impartial mind as odd that so much sympathy should be shown for the Claimant and so little for the heir.

BRITISH MILITARY LAW.

AS our military system is now being recast, this would seem to be a fitting time for reforming that part of it which relates to what in the Estimates is termed martial law, but might more properly be styled military law. Indeed, a material alteration, not only in the military code itself, but in the manner of applying it, seems to be imperatively demanded. The student who wishes to make himself acquainted with this important part of his duty is compelled to wade through, not only the Mutiny Act, the Articles of War, the Regimental Doctrines Act, the Army Service Acts of 1847 and 1867, the Army Reserve Act, and the Army Reserve and Militia Reserve Acts, all of which are contained under one cover, but also the Enlistment Act of 1870, the Queen's Regulations, and a host of circulars and warrants. He is also referred to some standard work on military law, but though there are several books on the subject, they are all out of date and some of them out of print. Setting aside the variety of sources from which instruction and information are to be sought, and assuming that the student determined to master the subject sits down in his room surrounded by all the books and documents enumerated, we must further observe that his difficulties are not to be measured by the number of regulations to be learnt by heart. In addition to being absurdly verbose and unnecessarily encumbered with legal jargon, the regulations in question are frequently most obscure, and not seldom contradictory. As an instance of verbosity, we may mention that fully two pages of the Mutiny Act are taken up with a mere enumeration of the persons subject to military law; whereas the intention of the Legislature might easily be expressed in a twentieth part of that space. Again, in the Articles of War, fifty-eight words are used to state that the president of certain courts-martial must always, if possible, be not under the rank of captain. What is particularly discouraging to the student is that, owing to the constant changes in the Mutiny Act, the Articles of War, and the various warrants and regulations, the knowledge he may have acquired to-day may be almost useless to him three or four years later. Yet, in the face of all these difficulties, a young officer is expected within a few years after joining to have completely mastered this abstruse subject. His case is as bad as that of the Israelites who were compelled to make bricks without straw. We have no hesitation in saying that our military law is in a state which may justly be termed disgraceful to the Judge Advocate-General's department. No collection of precedents is published, and new interpretations are continually being given; yet precedents and interpretations only fall in the way of young officers rarely, and by the merest chance. Scarcely a warrant comes out that does not require subsequent revision or explanation, and the consequence is that the army is thoroughly bewildered. Two years ago it was announced that a handbook of military law would be published by authority, but it has not yet made its appearance; and yet, if he is to escape official rebukes, an officer must now be almost as much a lawyer as a soldier. It is neither the army nor its military chiefs who are responsible for this state of things, for there is a costly Judge Advocate-General's department, with a lawyer at its head, who annually draws up the Mutiny Act and the Articles of War, and whose services are available for framing each new warrant and regulation. Why some attempt should not be made to codify military law, to avoid the vain repetitions of the Mutiny Act which are to be found in the Articles of War, and to compress into one handy volume all the few and simple enactments required, we cannot guess. Military men are not generally fitted for the task of solving legal enigmas; they have little room in their baggage for a large library, and the less time spent on military law the more leisure will they have for the study of military science. Every officer ought to be perfectly acquainted with the laws to which he and his comrades of every rank are subject, and he ought also to be able to administer those laws in due conformity with the practice of the service; but to load his memory with a mass of precepts almost impossible to digest, and to divert his attention from his primary to his secondary duties, is clearly a mistake which cannot be too soon rectified.

We have hitherto dwelt entirely upon the necessity of codifying, condensing, and simplifying our military law; but there is also much to be urged in favour of a reform in its application. Under the new system, all ranks of officers will be carefully selected and trained. The existing limitations therefore to their powers of summary jurisdiction, formerly perhaps justifiable, are no longer expedient. In civil matters the practice of entrusting magistrates with powers of summary jurisdiction is being daily developed. Why should not all except grave and complicated military cases be similarly dealt with? On a former occasion we pointed out that the time of officers is so much taken up by desk-work that they are physically unable to perform their more active duties efficiently. A great deal of that desk-work is connected with courts-martial. Were summary punishments more frequent a great relief would therefore be experienced. Again, almost all cases summarily dealt with are now decided by the already overworked commanding officer. A remedy might easily be applied by adopting the principle of the Prussian system. In Prussia the regimental commander can award fourteen days' severe, twenty-one days' medium, or twenty-eight days' mild arrest. A battalion commander is empowered to inflict seven days' severe, ten days' medium, and fourteen days' mild arrest; while even a captain can give three days' severe, five days' medium, and eight days' mild arrest. The word arrest, as here used, does not possess the signification attached to it in our service, for in Prussia it means imprisonment of various degrees of severity; mild arrest being, however, simple deprivation of liberty, in solitary confinement, with permission to smoke. In the British army the extent of imprisonment which the commander of a battalion can award is seven days, while officers commanding companies can at the most, and only at the discretion of the commanding officer, sentence a man to three days' drill. In fact, as regards the enforcement of discipline by direct punishment, all officers save the colonel are mere ciphers. Looking to the Prussian practice and to the powers entrusted in our own country to magistrates, and considering the simple nature of military offences, it would seem advisable greatly to increase the disciplinary powers of British officers. Were the commanding officer allowed to give fourteen days' imprisonment, and a captain fourteen days' drill, the necessity for the frequent calling of courts-martial, and the office work of the commanding officer, would be much diminished. The desirableness of holding courts-martial for the trial of serious offences does not arise so much from any consideration connected with punishment as from the presumed greater likelihood that a correct verdict will be arrived at. But, as we have just remarked, military offences are generally very simple in their nature, and, we may add, there is generally very little room for doubt as to the prisoner's guilt. If, therefore, a simple military code were compiled, there could be no reasonable objection to materially increasing the powers of the carefully selected and trained officers who will henceforth hold commissions in the British army. An improvement might also be effected by restricting the classes of courts-martial to two. The commanding officer might be substituted for a regimental court-martial, and only district and general courts-martial retained. It is the worth considering whether the verdicts and sentences of courts-martial would not carry more equal weight with the army, if we adopted the practice which prevails in Prussia, and that of associating non-commissioned officers and warrant officers, now non-commissioned officers, with the trial of prisoners who do not hold commissions. In Prussia a sub-officer can on the court-martial of any one under the rank of field officer. In Prussia, for the trial of any one under the rank of sergeant, two corporals, two acting corporals, and two privates are appointed members of the court. If the prisoner is a sergeant, the acting corporals and privates do not sit. If he is a sergeant-major, the corporals also are excluded. In Austria the members of a minor court are composed of one representative of every rank from that of the prisoner up to that of the captain, who presides. Such a system cannot fail to increase the self-respect of non-commissioned officers and men, to render the investigation in difficult cases more searching, and to strengthen the effect of the award, by inducing a conviction in the ranks that the prisoner has been fairly tried and suitably punished. The change which we have suggested would certainly be an innovation on military customs, but it would be in accordance with the great principle of English law that a man should be tried by his peers.

We have yet another reform to mention, and here again we borrow a hint from the practice of Continental armies. At present there is theoretically no punishment for a non-commissioned officer short of reduction by sentence of a court-martial, or for an officer short of dismissal, loss of seniority, or reprimand. It is true that a non-commissioned officer can be summarily reduced by the Commander-in-Chief or the titular colonel of his regiment, but the power is scarcely ever exercised. A non-commissioned officer is also occasionally awarded extra orderly duty. This, however, is done in direct disobedience to the Queen's Regulations, which state that "Non-commissioned officers are not to be subjected to minor punishments." Officers also are often placed under arrest as a punishment, but theoretically such arrest is merely a preliminary to investigation with a view to trial, and is not a disciplinary punishment. In Prussia non-commissioned officers can be sentenced to three weeks' medium arrest, i.e. prison, or to four weeks of barrack quarter or mild arrest, by order of the commander of the regiment, and for a less time, as specified in the case of privates, by order of the battalion or company commanders. The plan is a wise one, for many a non-commissioned officer is guilty of military irregularities which require to be sternly checked, but do not deserve professional ruin. With us hundreds of men who have the making of good non-commissioned officers in them, but are led away by the exuberant spirits of youth or some sudden temptation, go on from bad to worse, because the commanding officer has no effectual disciplinary punishment to resort to, and is unwilling to have recourse to a court-martial. Often also has a good non-commissioned officer been tried and reduced by court-martial, and immediately reinstated. We may be sure that such an expedient is not conducive to discipline. Again, with regard to officers. In Prussia the commander of a battalion may punish an officer by placing him under arrest, but is unable himself to fix its duration; a regimental commander can award six days' room arrest; a general can increase the duration, and a court-martial can give as much as six weeks. An officer's disciplinary arrest is of two descriptions—simple or "sharpened." Under the former he remains in his own quarters on parole, it being understood that a violation of it will involve the loss of his commission. Under "sharpened" arrest an officer undergoes his punishment in a separate place of confinement. He is allowed books, but is not permitted to provide himself with comfortable furniture. In both cases he is forbidden to receive visitors. In France also the disciplinary punishment of officers is practised. It may be worth considering whether it might not be usefully introduced into our own service, for at present arrest is impliedly forbidden to be ordered as a punishment, and in consequence it is really scarcely any punishment at all. We have in fact no disciplinary punishment for officers which can be inflicted without having recourse to a court-martial. Now a court-martial means ruin, or at least serious professional injury, and lasting discredit. Commanding officers naturally shrink from the scandal created by the assembling of such a tribunal, and therefore an officer who is guilty of constant irregularities is quietly pushed out of the regiment, whereas a little timely real punishment might perhaps have brought him to his senses, without inflicting a permanent injury on him. In short, our practice is to get rid of troublesome officers, instead of trying to cure them, and either mischievous lenity or unnecessary severity is the result.

CLERICAL SQUATTERS.

ALTHOUGH man is not exactly a creature of circumstances in the sense in which the phrase is apt to be employed, it is certain that circumstances have often a good deal to do with making him what he is; and there is usually a close correspondence between his character and habits and the general conditions of his life. This is especially true in the case of a community or corporation. When a body of men are found to be remarkable for the possession of certain qualities, it is not unreasonable to infer that the conditions under which they have been brought together, and under which they discharge their duties, have had some effect in producing this result; and it naturally becomes a question how far you can touch these conditions without affecting, for good or evil, the qualities which have hitherto been identified with them. It would be well if the Church reformers, who see as unacceptably busy just now, would try to master this somewhat elementary proposition. By Church reformers we mean of course those who in intention are honestly desirous of improving and strengthening not of destroying, the Church of England. Perhaps their course would be simplified if they would begin by defining for their own enlightenment, as well as ours, what is implied when they speak of the Church. Do they mean the Church as we have hitherto known it, the Church as it is; or is it an ideal institution, something they have dreamt about, and which has yet to be built up brick by brick out of their moral consciences? Of course, if what they mean is an entirely new Church, they must be content to be classed for the moment with Mr. Miall and the Liberalists; each of the two parties is anxious for the destruction of the existing Church, only one party hopes to be able—with what degree of reason in its hope we need not say—to build up another Church out of the ruins. On the other hand, if what is meant is the Church of England which has hitherto gone by that name, the reformers had better consider, before it is too late, how much of it would be left standing if they could succeed in carrying out their plans. It is a very good thing to have a house nicely ventilated, and with a sufficient number of entrances; but there is a limit to the number of doors and windows which can be pierced in a house without making it all apertures and no walls. The tornado which we are assured on high official authority is always whirling through the Admiralty would be nothing to the terrific hurricanes which would probably blow preachers and people alike out of the Church, if the clever ventilation projects of some of our zealous reformers were applied to that unhappy institution. There is a legend that John o' Groat, being much troubled by feuds and questions of precedence among his friends, built a house in such a fashion that each of them had his own door leading straight to his own chair at a round table. This is apparently the design which some of the so-called friends of the Church have brought back from their visits to the North, and according to which they would reconstruct the Church of which they profess to be faithful and loyal supporters. If a Church means merely a kind of common hall where any sect that will pay for the gas can hold forth at its pleasure, something might perhaps be said for this ingenious project. We sometimes hear people talk of the British Constitution as if it were something kept in a box which could be turned out and referred to when necessary, like the standards of measurement which are built up in the walls of the Houses of Parliament. And in the same way the Church of England is spoken of as if it were a mere heap of lath and plaster, or at the most a bundle of papers; the people who compose the Church in its only real and vital sense being entirely left out of sight. The question is whether either clergy or laity will remain in the Church when it has been transmuted into something altogether different from what it has been until now, and converted from a temple into a discussion forum.

Mr. Salt's Bill for providing "facilities for the performance of Divine Worship, according to the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church of England," is a very good example of the well-meaning, but thoughtless and short-sighted, plans for reforming the Church which have lately been turned out in such wanton abundance. At first sight nothing could be more plausible and prepossessing than this innocent-looking measure, and we can hardly be surprised at the favour with which it has been received on a mere cursory inspection. "Whereas it is expedient to create further facilities for the performance of Divine Worship, according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England." Surely all friends of the Church will agree to that. The Church Building Acts, it is true, offer considerable facilities for this pious work, on the reasonable condition that new churches shall not be built without an adequate endowment for the incumbents. Still, if it can be shown that this is not enough, by all means let us have more facilities. Then the Bill goes on to provide that the bishop of the diocese should have power to license a clergyman of the Church of England to perform Divine Service "in any schoolroom or other suitable building or chapel, whether consecrated or unconsecrated," within any parish or district containing more than two thousand inhabitants, within any hamlet containing more than twenty inhabitants, and lying more than two miles from a parish church, or in a free chapel attached to a private residence where there are more than twenty inmates. Of course it is desirable that the Gospel should be preached in a decent church, but if for any reason a church cannot be obtained, no one who had the spread of the Gospel at heart would object to its being preached in a schoolroom, back parlour, or even a railway arch, rather than not at all. It may be doubted whether, in point of fact, any practical difficulties have been encountered by benevolent persons who wished to build new churches or to hold missionary services for the benefit of the poor in a neglected part of the country. But if it can be proved that there are any difficulties, there will be, we imagine, a disposition to remove them. We are afraid, however, that the House of Commons has been rash or careless enough to read this Bill a second time on the strength of these plausible propositions, without having seriously considered how far the difficulties which are alleged to exist really do exist, or what, if they do exist, would be the consequence of removing them in the manner proposed.

When we go on to examine the Bill in detail its mischievous character is at once apparent. We then discover that the effect, if not the object, of the Bill would be to overturn the parochial system on which the Church is established, and to throw open the services and representative authority of the Church to any squatters who could coax or bully the bishop into granting them a licence. At present the rector or vicar is held to be responsible for his parish, as the bishop is for the diocese at large, and he has a voice

In declaring who shall be allowed to conduct the services of the Church within the parochial limits. It may be admitted that there are incumbents who are not very wise; that it is possible an incumbent may be selfish or perverse; that he may prefer what he considers his own dignity or interest to the welfare of the parish. We are not surprised to hear that in the course of years a case has been known where an incumbent set himself against the introduction of another clergyman into the parish when it would have been well that he should have been introduced. We are quite prepared to hear that clergymen are liable to make mistakes in this as in other things. But it cannot be said that a refusal of this kind is a common occurrence. Episcopal authority, the influence of neighbouring clergymen, the force of public opinion, are usually irresistible. If there is really a case of spiritual destitution, it is very difficult, so difficult as to be almost impossible, for an incumbent to withhold his assent from any reasonable plan for additional services. Yet this rare and exceptional occurrence is the only excuse for a Bill which proposes to revolutionize the fundamental organization of the Church. It should never be forgotten that the value of a law depends not merely on the particular regulations which it is intended to enforce, but on the attitude of mind on the part of the public which it encourages or confirms with regard to the subject in question. The marriage law, for example, is framed on the principle that when two people are married it is desirable that they should regard themselves as bound irrevocably to each other, so that nothing but certain specified acts of criminality on the part of one of them shall entitle the other to a release. Everybody knows what marriage has come to mean in Indiana, where a divorce can be obtained for any trifling incompatibility of taste or temper, real or pretended. When people know that a thing must be, they are usually disposed to make the best of it. At present the parish and the parson are pretty much as man and wife—we are speaking, of course, of country parishes, for in towns the question can hardly be said to arise—they have taken each other for better or worse, and have a common interest in making it better instead of worse. The bent of mind on both sides is naturally towards a compromise; there may be a little tugging now and then, especially at first, just to see which is stronger or more pliable; but as a rule their differences are seldom carried very far. If the parson carries one point, he gives up another to the people, while on a third question they agree to meet each other half-way. If Mr. Salt's Bill were passed, we are afraid it would have a very unfortunate effect on this state of things. It would be a public incitement to dissension and schism. The people would have it constantly in their minds that, if they did not like the clergyman; if he was not as chatty and agreeable as they thought he should be when they met him; if his sermons were too long or too short, too high or too low; if his hair were not of the right colour, or if he married the wrong young lady, they could get another of their own choice, and set him up next door, or over the way, in legal opposition to him. The parish would be broken up into little knots and sects, each anxious to start a church of its own. The squire, if he did not split off with the parson, could establish a church in his own house. The local Bulstrodes, anxious to be bankers and bishops at once, would have a fine field for their malicious activity; and squatters would be constantly on the outlook for a chance of effecting a settlement. On the other hand, the incumbent, irritated by the threat of a secession constantly held over him, would be apt to become obstinate and jealously sensitive on the point of honour. It is provided by the Bill that a clergyman officiating under a bishop's licence is not to be liable to ecclesiastical penalties; and if the bishop and an incumbent were not of the same school of theology, there would be a strong temptation to the former to license a preacher of his own views. In any case, if it became a custom to grant licences the bishop would feel a difficulty in refusing an application, and even an incumbent might have some delicacy in pressing him to do so. The result of the Bill would be to destroy the position of authority and social dignity which an incumbent at present occupies, to provoke disorders and dissensions, to split congregations into isolated and hostile groups, and to weaken and disorganize the Church by scattering its forces, turning them against each other, and wasting their strength in scandalous civil war. If the Church is to be broken up in this manner, it does not seem to be of much consequence that the different sections should continue to call themselves the Church of England, instead of openly becoming Dissenters.

THE LATE FREAK OF THE SEASONS.

PRACTICAL jokes are always in questionable taste, and often very serious in their consequences, but they are never so objectionable or so dangerous as when the elements take to playing them. The recent change in the weather reminds us of the action of one of those appalling cyclones which sweep the Southern ocean. The Southern cyclone is as much of an institution as a Northern winter, and is not much more eccentric in the times of its visitation than our English winter has become of late years. You have unmistakable warnings of its approach; signs in the sky, sensations in the atmosphere, and a most portentous drop in the barometer. When it bursts in its violence, you are as well prepared for its fury as you are for its approach, and accept it more or less resignedly as an inevitable phenomenon of destiny. By and by the cyclone appears to have blown itself out; the sky clears, the wind falls, the ocean seems to be settling down again. You draw a breath of profound gratitude, and if you are a novice in the navigation of these seas you shake out your canvas to dry, counting on the proverbial calm that comes after the storm. But the fall is almost invariably treacherous. Before you know where you are, the hurricane is back upon you, swiftly retracing the line of its travels, and the chances are that it leaves you crippled and shattered; if you are fortunate enough to escape utter perdition. That is the story of our present winter. Many of its recent predecessors have been capricious enough, but this particular season has really gone very much too far. It started before Christmas as if it meant to be one of the hearty, bracing, old-fashioned seasons which so many people regret, or pretend to regret. It did not come with an early rush, preening to the weather-wise a premature expenditure of power. It gradually roughened its manners, and sharpened its bite, till at length it fairly laid fast hold of the earth and the water. We had some bright frost and some pleasant days' skating. Frost gradually melted into thaw, lingering on as if loth to go, and leaving us with every possible assurance of a speedy return. How we have all been beguiled, things animate and inanimate alike; we know too well. Weeks went on, and winter did not give us the faintest hint of being anywhere much nearer than the Pole. People at first could hardly believe their senses, but gradually yielded to conviction in spite of themselves. If those who could afford time still clung to them for the sake of association and from force of habit, they were obliged to regulate the temperature by open windows, while householders with straitened incomes for once could really reform their coal merchant's bill. You iced your champagne for dinner-parties, you left your wraps at home when you travelled abroad, you retrenched on your subscriptions to soup kitchens and relief societies. Gradually the most sceptical had yielded to the logic of facts; and, living in a muggy atmosphere ventilated by balmy breezes, we all became fairly persuaded that spring had come to England for the season. Horses turned loose in paddocks, where the grass was already turning green, began to cast their winter coats. Lapdogs and Angora cats followed suit, and laps and sofas were covered with showers of white hair, as much out of season as hail in August. Spring vegetation took its start, and committed itself to regular growing. First the walls, then the orchards, were wrapped in bloom; there was a luscious promise of early asparagus and peas, and a moral certainty of precocious chickens and ducklings.

Having thus, with elaborate treachery, prepared everything for the grand effect, the confederate seasons played off their malignant joke. A single night effected the exchange; and we woke one morning to find that spring had fled, and winter was back with us. If we needed collateral evidence of premeditation, we should discern it in the particular week selected. We were just on the eve of the first spring meetings, to say nothing of the University race. Now to outsiders who have not provided themselves with excitement in the shape of heavy speculative investments, one of these early meetings is generally preluded by considerable searchings of spirit. The most enthusiastic amateurs of sport for sport's sake shiver at the idea of the delays and of the torpid races that precede the great events. The course, as a rule, is somewhat bitterly bleak down, while the stand that dominates the course is a perfect palace of Aolus. Even an ordinary March gale inflicts an immensity of by no means silent suffering, while a grim grey sky is sure to reflect itself pretty faithfully in the looks and spirits of the assembly. All the world cannot possibly win, and the losers part freely with their tempers as well as their money, and get sullen or savage according to their nature. Conceivably the amount of envy, hatred, malice, and uncharitableness which the late outbreak of winter must have generated at Lincoln and Liverpool! The bearing of the jockeys on such occasions has always seemed to us to show the acme of nerve, the climax of impassible heroism. The cold has pierced to your own blood and marrow through your heavy over-coat and an infinity of under-garments. Your feet will chill, although you seek by perpetual stampings to keep your circulation on the move; and as for your fingers, you can scarcely feel them at all, although you have to use them continually in pulling out your pocket-handkerchief. And then you see those small alps of men, with no flesh to speak of between their bones and the blizzards, stripping off their warm wraps and seating themselves in silk and gossamer in a cold weighing-machine. Some of them at least must be scrupulously parsimonious in the article of flannel, for it was hard work at best training down to the weight, and every ounce is of consequence. The eyes of England are on them; they are the objects of the devouring interest which selfishness and avarice inspire in the most covetous class of living man. Each detail of their riding will be criticised; and should their equities or nerve yield or falter, they will be abused everywhere as having sold the race, if they are not lynched beyond the winning post. The men who can face that sort of thing even with an ordinary March wind after a lowering day, who cannot only face it, but mount pleasantly and ride creditably, deserve immortal credit. But last week at the Grand National their conduct raised positive heroism, for that joke of Winter's came very hard on them. It is true that he did slightly relent at the last moment, and held his hand when it threatened to strike them in snow-drift. But he sent everything aloft of a sudden, and searched with an extraordinary accuracy of what might be relaxed by training through weeks of cramped inactivity. He set them getting up in their saddles, the horses were and the men were, into saddles that had not been used for weeks. The horses, galloping and running, are showing themselves the best that have ever been through their silver canyons and now and again a horse will

them in an unusually tender place. And there are the riders with blue hands and numb fingers, dogging their beat at the shill-bellies, fretting mouths, and fiery tempers that scarcely stand the smother, till the bounding, bounding horses nearly drag the riders from their saddles. We decline to follow them round the course in these dismal circumstances, when the bravest man's heart mounts towards his mouth as he finds himself hurried along, a half-passive victim, where safety and honour demand alike the calmest resolution, the promptest decision, and the most delicate steering. We have not a doubt that the bulk of the shocking list of Liverpool casualties may be attributed to winter's ill-timed jocularity. Fortunately it was he did not push his fooling a little further, and make equally wild work with the men.

The snow which they escaped at Liverpool came down on the sad Saturday of the boat-race. It was at Mortlake, indeed, that the melancholy joke culminated. Of course we do not mean to touch on the details which have been so thoroughly narrated and exhausted. The passing disappointments, the temporary sufferings, were all doubtless severe enough. But we desire to call attention to subsequent and more serious results—to married marriages, and to deaths. A grand day like the boat-race, with its excitement, its distractions, and its thousand opportunities, may be trusted to hurry many a hesitating lover on to his happiness. It is one of those golden occasions when a man comes involuntarily forward to the very brink over which a glance may woe him, or an accident precipitate him. (On Saturday last winter blotted that great pairing day from the hymeneal calendar. If eligibles turned out at all, they were in the least yielding of moods; if they sought the river in the society of the ladies, seldom can they have felt less inclined to charge themselves through life with one of these clinging encumbrances. In the voluptuously warm atmosphere of a drawing-room, amid the illusions of mirrors and the flushes of rose-coloured curtains, you may think that life offers no brighter prospect than to accept the care and discharge the bills of the being who smiles on you in a mirage of lace, and flowers, and flounces. It is a different thing indeed when you see nature maliciously stripping away the hypocritical disguises or appliances of art; when you vividly realize the material aspects of a future that must have its rainy days; when the evanescence of beauty is borne in on you, as you see your intended wife as she probably would be when the mother of marriageable daughters; above all, when the latent temper comes out in the soft eye, as the blue does in the damask of the cheek, and the ruby in the tip of the Grecian nose. Many blighted hearts may be sadly sighing, we suspect, over the catastrophe that changed the young spring of their budding loves to a lasting winter of discontent. Many an astutely affectionate mother may have learned how much chance has to say to the most skillful strategy, and how easily accident may unmask an ambush. Many a marrying-man, tripped by appearances and victimized by his own effervescent passions, may have missed his happiness in his over-prudence. The married marriages must be matter of speculation, but a serious swelling of the bills of mortality will infallibly be demonstrated by coming statistics. Not that we so greatly pity those who may die of the boat-race. They went to Putney with fair warning, and with eyes opened as widely as the blinding drift would permit. They should have known that, with the heavy cold which returning winter had brought them as a present, it was the grossest imprudence to go tramping through the slush of the towing-path. They must have felt that, with that decided tendency to consumption in the family, it was tempting Providence to stand in muslin upon Barnes Bridge. Those whom we do pity are people who never dreamed of risking health on the river; venerable persons reasonably congratulating themselves on having passed in safety the rigour of another winter; invalids who had intended to take shelter on the Cornice from February frosts and March winds. Naturally these last lingered on, seduced by the persistent geniality of the extraordinary season; glad to escape the risks of foreign travel, and the discomforts of foreign rooms. Unquestionably reasonable prudence justified them in deciding as they did. Yet here of a sudden was winter back upon them, ordering them away on a longer journey; for what may be a joke to him is literally death to them. From a subject so solemn we can scarcely pass to poultry, or venture to lament the decease of those promising spring chickens we spoke of. We can only pay the tribute of a silent tear to lambs frozen and smothered in the snow drifts in sufficient numbers to justify the butchers in charging what they please. But we may speak of what we fear will prove a deplorable blight of the fruit blossoms, for it may make the difference of a good year or a bad one to many a family in the gardens of England. This freak of the weather is already matter of history, but we fear that its consequences will be general and lasting.

SHAM DEGREES.

WHEN Shakespeare wrote the line,
Degrees in schools, and brotherhoods in cities, he could not have referred to the degrees granted by the University of Philadelphia; because the city of such seats and brotherly love did not in his time exist. It may be, however, that when he wrote,
Take but degrees away, nations that adore;
And hark! what discord follows, he prophetically intimated that, unless a schoolmaster is able to write at least "Ph.D." after his name, his scholars and their parents will disbelieve in his qualifications, and his school will prove incapable of vigorous life. It is, in fact, lamentable to think how much the education of both sexes in England is still predominated by humbug. The bankrupt trader, who at least has gained some familiarity with arithmetic in preparing his own accounts for the Court, usually sets up what is called a Commercial school. In the last century, when flagellation entered so largely into the discipline of all schools, it was perhaps reasonable that any man possessing a strong arm should consider himself qualified for a schoolmaster. A memoir of Mr. Adolphus, a well-known barrister, has lately been published from which it appears that he was sent by his uncle to a school where almost the only furniture was a cane, and almost the only knowledge of the master was how to use it. The uncle was wealthy, and meant to provide properly for the education of his nephew, but, like many other parents and guardians before the University of Philadelphia came to their assistance, he was unable to distinguish between a bad schoolmaster and a good one. It is melancholy to reflect how much the education of English boys has been allowed to fall into the hands of quacks whose shallowness would in any other calling be ignominiously exposed. A headmaster, or principal, as he prefers to call himself, who possesses impudence and plausibility, obtains an assistant whose merit is hampered by his modesty, and a mutually advantageous, but not altogether creditable, partnership is formed. We have heard of an instance in which the head-master of a school published a book of exercises in classical composition with examples, of which he could not have written a single line to save his life. The inference was probable that the work was done by an accomplished classic who occupied the place of second master in the school. He in fact furnished the gold, and his chief put his stamp upon it and gave it currency. Perhaps if he had applied for the head-mastership himself, he would not have obtained it; or, if he had, he would not by real scholarship have attracted half as many pupils as his chief did by the pretence of it. There are, it is true, many parents who chiefly desire for their children good air, good living, and kind, or perhaps indulgent, treatment; and who are prepared to give their confidence to any man who will provide these things at sufficiently high terms. It is desirable that this sort of schoolmaster should be a clergyman, and a suave and slightly solemn manner is essential. The moderate amount of scholarship which is required in such an establishment may be supplied by an assistant, who is probably a young graduate of Oxford or Cambridge, high in the honour list, and rather deep in tradesmen's books. As regards girls' schools, it is nearly impossible to discriminate between real and sham education, and perhaps it is on this account that many parents do not send their daughters to school at all. A girl undeniably learns something at a fashionable "finishing" school which she would not learn at home; but perhaps ignorance, while it lasts, is preferable to knowledge. There used to be, and perhaps there still are, schools which enjoyed a reputation for the social successes of their pupils. Just as a schoolmaster delights to reckon the first-classes and wranglerships to which he has shown the way, so a schoolmistress would mention with pride that a young lady whom she had "finished" had become the wife of a peer or a wealthy commoner. But, unless these schools were judged by results, it was difficult to find any means of judging them at all. The so-called accomplishments were taught by persons who delighted to describe themselves by that much-abused term professor. Prodigious exercises in water-colour drawing were produced, and a superficial knowledge of music was acquired under these professors. If there was a French governess in the house, the pupils could not help learning something useful from her. Probably the only thing which was thoroughly learned at such schools was dancing; but if a girl's friends were "serious," they would not send her to a school where that accomplishment was taught; and as "musical callisthenics" had not then been invented, she grew up awkward or graceful as nature willed. The principal of the establishment had credit, and perhaps rightly, for imperceptibly instructing her pupils in general instruction. To borrow a line of Dryden, they had "learned the besutious arts of modern pride" under her tuition, and if we averted our eyes from the drawings, and closed our ears against the music, we might possibly think that the result was worth the money. Whether it was worth the time occupied in producing it depends upon what we might wish a girl's future life to be, and how far such a system of education helped to realize it.

We have been introduced in the pages of a recent novel to a young lady whose charms of manner and appearance would highly recommend the school of which she is stated to have been the favourite pupil. But, however many such young ladies this school turned out, the schoolmistress would continue to bear an undistinguished name, unless the University of Philadelphia could be persuaded to extend to women the advantages which it offers on such convenient terms to men. We learn from a recent pamphlet on Degrees that fancy already rules to a great extent in hoods, and when ladies assume this article of academic dress, it will doubtless be found susceptible of great variety of brilliant colouring. Even while it is confined to men, the taste of their admirers of the other sex will have much influence upon the colour and shape of the garment. Some readers may remember a popular minister of a West-end chapel who was admired almost equally for his fine voice and his beautiful hood of violet silk. Ill-natured critics of academic arrangements have observed that the most lovely hoods were formerly appropriated to the degrees which were easiest to obtain, as if the University recognized the fact that a particular man's success in clerical work would depend on his outside, and desired to help him to attract ladies' eyes and win their hearts. The violet hood is not only beautiful but rare. The above-mentioned pamphlet informs us that "the pretty scarlet and black of an Oxford M.A. has set the fashion, and all the hoods supposed to belong to Göttingen, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, approximate in every respect to the Oxford hood." An agent who disposes of degrees also gets the hood made, and has but one pattern for it, without regard to the University conferring the degree. A remarkable unanimity of taste seems to prevail in America and Germany in regard to hoods. The white hood which some M.A.'s of Cambridge wear is lost in the surplice, and the black hood of others forms a gloomy contrast to it, and therefore Cambridge men may rejoice that it is not worth while to imitate their sober vestments. But we are told that a well-known London house has supplied fifty "very rich red and black hoods" to customers within a short time. It has been truly said that in our time there is no good thing without a bad imitation, and the currency of the counterfeit proves the estimation in which the genuine coin of Oxford is still held by an age which has been advised by high authority to prefer the Times newspaper to Thucydides. It appears from the pamphleteer's researches that there is a sort of sham University at Philadelphia which ignorant Europeans have confounded with the real University of Pennsylvania. The University of Brooklyn is returned as absolutely non est; and we regret to find that the University of Göttingen, consecrated in song, has fallen so low as to grant degrees in absentia, accompanied by hoods, according to the wearer's fancy. He pays his money and he takes his choice, and usually it falls upon a neat thing in red and black, which looks well upon a surplice, and helps him to that social consideration which usually attends a graduate of Oxford. In fact, he is a sham gentleman, and is infinitely more objectionable than an unvarnished snob. Henceforward, instead of using "humbug" as synonymous with "counterfeit," we shall acknowledge the superiority of America in the art of humbug by substituting the term "Philadelphian." It is certainly remarkable that the metropolis of Transatlantic Quakerdom should have become a manufactory of clerical trappings for Europe. If it be true that cleanliness is next to godliness, we should conceive that honesty is, or ought to be, somewhere near it; and therefore it seems reasonable that churches should not be made the scene of an imposture which would not be tolerated anywhere else. Remembering recent proceedings in the Oxford Theatre, we should be curious to see what sort of reception would be given to a Philadelphian graduate who appeared there in his red and black hood. The medical profession had become so infested with sham degrees that a remedy was imperatively called for, and the Medical Registration Act applied it. Perhaps it would not be going too far to prohibit clergymen from designating themselves officially as "Ph.D." or "M.A." when they have simply bought the title without either residence or examination at or by the University which confers it. The only thing in civil life which resembles these clerical impostures is the scarlet uniform like that of a lieutenant-colonel, which can be worn, we believe, by any deputy-lieutenant of a county, who may happen also to be a wealthy London tradesman. King Louis Philippe is reported to have inquired what was the corps to which all these deputy-lieutenants belonged, and to have been answered, "the horse marines." We are not great admirers of Lord Shaftesbury or his projects of ecclesiastical legislation, but if he would introduce into his Bill for Church Discipline a clause providing that any layman or laywoman might prosecute a clergyman for using an unlawful hood, we should be disposed to give him our support. There might be a decent hood devised by a joint committee of bishops and ladies for literates and graduates of foreign Universities, and this, in addition to the hoods of Universities of the United Kingdom, might suffice in the way of variety of ornamentation of the surplice.

FRESCO PAINTING IN THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

IT seems possible that Mr. Ayrton's feud with Mr. Layard may result in the revival of fresco painting. No man, not even the First Commissioner of Public Works, can afford to quarrel all round with everybody; accordingly, the favour of the House and of the public was propitiated by the appointment of a Committee, consisting of the artists employed in the decoration of the Palace of Westminster, to report once more on the problems and perplexities attendant on the practice of fresco painting. The device was ingenious and well timed. Mr. Ayrton had determined, and we think wisely, to revoke the wholesale commission given by his predecessor for mosaics. Certainly the specimen picture still allowed to remain on the walls of the Central Hall is sufficiently confused and disagreeable to serve as a warning. The First Commissioner, having resolved to throw overboard Mr. Edward Barry, together with Messrs. Salviati, shrewdly called to his aid the fresco painters who had received discouragement and discomfiture under the rule of Mr. Layard. From these men, at all events, he was in little danger of a hostile verdict. The jury impaneled were in fact parties to the suit. Messrs. Cope, Watts, Ward, Armitage, and Herbert, who have executed, at the cost to the nation of many thousand pounds, pictures which are now more or less in ruin, are in plain words asked to say whether or not they consider themselves incompetent. The Report now issued is altogether so mild and impartial as to leave this question of competency in doubt. "The Committee of Artists" were, however, strong enough even at their first meeting to resolve "that the use of fresco painting, notwithstanding the want of success which has generally accompanied it of late years, ought not to be abandoned." This return to calm and rational counsels is cause for congratulation. The abuse which for eight or ten years has been levelled against fresco naturally provokes reaction.

The Report now before us, though just in its main conclusion, is meagre, hesitating, and confused. A certain Mr. Wright, who occupies six out of a total of nine pages, does not seem quite a man to add materially to the chemical data already furnished by Professor Faraday, Dr. Reid, Mr. Dyce, R.A., Dr. Hofmann, and Professor Pettenkofer. Neither is Mr. Ayrton, who presided at the opening meeting, precisely the successor we might choose to represent the late Prince Consort. We miss, too, in the framing of the Report, the accomplished hand of Sir Charles Eastlake. The document, we fancy, will be most admired for what it leaves out; silence is adroitly preserved on points upon which possibly not even two members could agree. No mention is made of mosaics, nor of water-glass, nor of "spirit fresco," nor of Mr. MacIise, nor of Director Kaulbach, nor of the destructive products of gas, nor of the practice of painting on portable slate slabs, nor of the expedient of placing plate glass before the disorganized frescoes of Mr. Ward, nor of the "melancholy fact" which we have only on the authority of Lord Elcho, "that Mr. Dyce's and Mr. Herbert's plasterers had each died mad—one raving, and the other melancholy, mad"; nor of that "most interesting conversation with Mr. Herbert," when "that gentleman told Lord Elcho that he too had nearly been driven mad by the trouble and annoyance which the old system of fresco caused him." These strange statements, which ought to be either substantiated or disavowed, will be found in the Journal of the Society of Arts of February 12, 1864. The Report now given to the world wisely ignores what it might be inconvenient to remember. Yet we are glad to find that seven Academicians and Associates express their regret that "fresco painting was abandoned just at the time when considerable experience had been gained, and the greatest difficulties surmounted." The Committee further state, in extenuation of admitted failures,

That considering the absolute want of experience among English artists of the methods of using fresco, when the works in the Westminster Palace were first executed, it is not to be wondered at that there should have been many partial and some complete failures.

Some six or eight works out of a total of about forty prove that our English artists are fairly competent to engage in the arduous task of mural decoration. Dyce's frescoes generally, MacIise's "Spirit of Chivalry" and "Waterloo," Armitage's "Rivers of England personified," Teniel's "St. Cecilia," Herbert's "Lear" and "Moses," compare not unfavourably with the noble mural paintings executed within the last fifty years on the Continent of Europe. Our artists, however, want the knowledge and training of Cornelius, Hess, Kaulbach, Piloty, Delaroche, and Flandrin. Or, in other words, English painters have not quite risen to the greatness of the occasion or the import of the argument; instead of the noble style befitting historic themes, the manner tends to commonplace naturalism, to costume painting, and mere picturesque incident. In short, these mural decorations lack the symmetry, simplicity, and geometric proportion imposed on pictorial art when she makes herself a helpmate of her elder and sterner sister, architecture. Our English artists are more accustomed to paint up to a bright gilt frame than to a sombre architectural moulding. Still, among the pictures already mentioned, "Chivalry," by Mr. MacIise; "Rivers of England," by Mr. Armitage; "Lear," by Mr. Herbert, and "Religion," by Mr. Dyce, conform sufficiently closely to the conditions of monumental decoration. Moreover our English school has of late years been tending to classicism, mediævalism, and other historic phases which comport well with mural decoration. Mr. Watts has always under hand compositions which embody noble thought in noble form. Mr. Leighton strives after the pure type and symmetric line of Greek art. Mr. Poynter, Mr. Albert Moore, and others are imbued with the spirit of the great old masters. Thus fresco and other cognate arts need not perish or fall into disuse for lack of men trained to the ambitious calling. Never was there a time when commissions given by the State could be more worthily carried out.

The cause of fresco painting has in this country suffered chiefly from its want of permanence, from its excessive cost, also from the supposed difficulty of manipulation; in other words, the process has fallen under condemnation in consequence of the inability and attendant failure of its practitioners. We need not speak at length on the want of permanence, especially as little that is new comes to light under the recent inquiry. We may just mention, however, that the Report fails to lay sufficient stress on the destructive agency of the products of combustion of coal and gas, and on the deteriorating influence of a city atmosphere generally. As a rule, whatever destroys a rose or other flower will destroy a mural painting; plants perish when gas is burnt in a greenhouse; in like manner frescoes decay in the Houses of Parliament. But we have found in a state almost intact the frescoes painted by Mr. Watts in Carlton House Terrace, and no better reason for their immunity could be assigned than that gas was never used in the room. Indeed, experience teaches us that bad climate is less detrimental to mural paintings than impure air. Thus we have seen frescoes braving the severity of winters on the northern shores of the Channel.

and again at Ammergan and other stations in the Tyrol we have examined and found in a fresh sound state pictures painted about a century ago on the external walls of the houses. Keen mountain air, though laden with snow and sharp with frost, does not necessarily kill frescoes, though in the decoration of St. Isaac's in St. Petersburg frescoes were deemed too frail for the inclemency of the climate. But throughout the Tyrol, in sight of snow-capped mountains, houses are lavishly adorned with external pictures; the fact being that Italian painters crossed the Alps and brought with them the art which has been practised without cessation from the time of Giotto, in the thirteenth century, down to the humble artists who in the present day decorate wayside chapels. And this wayside art, this art of the common people—this art which, clambering up Alpine valleys, braves wind and weather, and subsists on pay and pittance which barely serves to keep body and soul together—may serve as a lesson to proud and rich painters. The artists of Italy and the Tyrol, little above the class of peasants or mechanics, have faith in their art as in a second nature; for wall surfaces they gather sand ground by torrents from granite mountains; the water in which they dip their brush is the crystal stream wherein the trout leaps. And thus somehow this rude fresco painting, which is to the people native as their speech and traditional as their religion, lives and lasts, while the forced and pampered art made to order of Act of Parliament and sustained by State subsidy perishes. In the Palace of Westminster there are frescoes as rotten as the most tattered tapestries which ever crumbled from old walls, and yet some of the works at Westminster have cost the country 10*l.* the square foot; nevertheless the painters grumbled that the pay was inadequate. The essential cause of this excessive cost seems to be the expense of London living. Nothing tends so much to deteriorate our modern art as the self-imposed necessity of earning a large income to meet the extravagant expenditure which seems to be imposed by society. Only in England has fresco painting been a costly art; the Caracci and others are known to have been miserably paid, and yet when we last saw the ceiling of the Farnese palace, three hundred years had failed to fade the pigments. But our English artists have found fresco not only costly, but difficult. Mr. Dyce, who succeeded better than his fellow-labourers, complained of "those preliminary failures and hindrances to progress which oppress every one who attempts the practice of this most disheartening and patience-exhausting art." Mr. Macclise equally rebelled against a process which the Italians found easy. Again, then, we have to repeat that the fault is not in the art, but in its practitioners. To meet the reiterated objection that fresco presents insuperable difficulties, we inquired among the painters of Munich, and were by no means surprised to find that the process is there looked upon as the very A B C of painting; even tinos are without fear when they stand up before a wall ten feet high. Within the last year or two we have watched in Munich and Innsbruck German and Tyrolese fresco painters fearlessly working in churches and cemeteries without any incipient symptoms of the madness which, according to Lord Elcho, threatened Mr. Herbert and his plasterer. We may further state that in Munich, within the Bavarian National Museum, are a series of 143 historic compositions, covering a total wall area which we estimate at 19,840 square feet. These works, mostly in fresco, have been executed at an inconsiderable cost, by men many of whom have but just emerged from academic studies. We do not extol these pictures as triumphant efforts of genius, but at all events they show, not only enthusiasm in the dramatic rendering of a people's history, but a well-defined system of constructive composition, with mastery over the technique of mural painting. In thus speaking somewhat severely of the shortcomings of English painters entrusted by the State with momentous commissions, it is but right to mention that Mr. Watts and others see their way to making fresco easy, rapid, and economical, through a treatment broad, generalized, and simple. There can be no doubt that our artists accustomed to easel painting have fallen into the error of treating fresco with a detail and elaboration better suited to oil.

Mural painting may be considered as a large genus which includes many species, whereof fresco buono or secco happens to be only the most familiar form. And it seems likely in this scientific and inventive age that the number of processes may be from time to time so multiplied and perfected that fresco will be used only when suited to the capacity and taste of the individual artist, or to the exigencies of some specific place or composition. We find, in fact, that our painters have in the course of years practised two or more methods. Each new process has in turn become identified with some important and successful work. Thus water glass, which has lost a little of its former popularity, was chosen by Professor Kaulbach for his grand wall pictures in Berlin, and by Mr. Herbert for his "Moses" in the Palace of Westminster. Again, the so-called "spirit fresco" has been employed with signal success by Mr. Leighton in Lyndhurst Church, and by Mr. Gambier Parry in his church at Highnam; likewise a certain wax vehicle, known as "Parr's Marble Medium," has, in the hands of Mr. Armitage, given good results in a memorial picture to the late Crabb Robinson painted for London University Hall. We may further add that we have received from Professor Piloty an account of experiments conducted over a period of many years in Munich, the results of which promise a more perfect silica medium than the water-glass. This intimation may be of interest to Mr. Herbert, who withholds his full assent from the Report because of his conviction "that a proper system of siliceous painting is far superior to fresco, and admits of as luminous effects." Mr.

Herbert has a right to speak, because his "Moses" executed in water-glass, is unexampled for luminosity. On the whole, the prospects of mural decoration grow more hopeful; at any rate, each artist seems to have some pet plan of his own by which he expects to evade previous perplexities.

REVIEWS.

LYELL'S PRINCIPLES OF GEOLOGY.*

THE great work of Sir Charles Lyell has too long and too authoritatively held its place as a classic in the literature of science to call for, or even to admit, the expression of any estimate of its value. The number of editions it has gone through may be taken as sufficiently attesting the concurrence of public taste and conviction with the appreciative opinion of the more critical class of readers at home and abroad. It may be hoped that the wide and increasing circulation of so valuable a work has had, and is long destined to have, the effect of leavening the mass of educated thought with its sound, careful, and conscientious views of physical truth. While congratulating both the writer and reader upon the issue of the eleventh edition of the Principles of Geology, we feel that our notice of its contents is almost of necessity restricted to those portions of the work in which the author has seen reason to amplify, to remodel, or to correct what he had advanced in former impressions. Within the last five years special attention has been drawn to the geological proofs of strongly marked changes in the terrestrial climate during long periods of time. In face of the additional facts and corresponding theories which have thus divided the minds of geological inquirers, Sir Charles Lyell has seen fit to recast those chapters of his work which treated of the meteorology and climatic history of the earth's surface, with a view especially to insist upon the paramount influence exerted in this direction by the relative distribution and height of the land at successive periods. The balance of argument and research has been such in the meanwhile as to confirm him more and more in his conviction of the agreement and continuity of the forces at work through all the vicissitudes of the earth's surface, from the earliest to the most recent geological ages. It is hardly necessary, perhaps, to go further back for the pedigree of the organic forms which for the most part chronicle and attest the laws of succession than to that miocene period in whose organic deposits the flora and fauna of all subsequent ages seem to have their ground and root. A superficial view of the local changes of climate which are proved to have taken place might have, and indeed has, induced the belief that causes no longer operative had been at work in remoter times. The existence of a sub-tropical miocene flora near, and probably up to, the North Pole, with remains of the mastodon, elephant, rhinoceros, and cognate mammals as far north as the icy circle, might be taken to point to a revolution of a terrestrial, if not of a cosmical, kind from higher conditions of temperature. On the other hand, the dispersion in a southern direction of erratic blocks, evidently carried by ice action, and striated or polished by glacial friction, was a proof of a cold climate extending much further south than that of the present time, invading even the sub-tropical latitudes. Now there can be absolutely no room for the hypothesis of any appreciable change, within miocene times at least, in the total temperature of the earth, either from the sudden outburst of subterranean fires on the one hand, or from general cooling of the earth's mass on the other. At the same time, a large body of both organic and inorganic evidence supports the view that the climate of earlier geological periods, from whatever cause, had over wide regions been in excess of what it now is. Not only in the greater part of the miocene and eocene epochs did a vegetation like that of Central Europe in our day extend into the Arctic Regions as far as they have been explored, and probably to the Pole itself, but in the Secondary or Mesozoic ages the prevalent types of vertebrate life indicate a warm climate and an absence of frost between 40° N. and the Pole, a large ichthyosaurus having been found in lat. 77° 10' N. Carrying our retrospect back to the Primary or Palaeozoic ages, we find an assemblage of plants which implies that a warm, humid, and equable climate extended from the 30th parallel of North latitude to within a few degrees of the Pole, while a still older flora, the Devonian, leads to a similar inference. Such, moreover, is the general resemblance between the whole invertebrate fauna of the Devonian, Silurian, and Cambrian rocks and that of the Carboniferous, Permian, and Triassic series, as to make it clear that a similarity of conditions as regards temperature prevailed throughout the whole of these six periods.

The idea of possible variations in the temperature of space traversed by our globe, started by Poulson, is promptly set aside by considerations long ago advanced by Mr. Hopkins. Nor is there much greater force, as Sir Charles Lyell amply shows, in the effect attributed by others to variation in the obliquity of the ecliptic. The latest calculations of Sir John Herschel, conveyed in a letter to our author in October 1866, admit the possibility of a deviation of the earth's axis to the extent of three, or even four, degrees on either side of the mean. The sun's rays would thus be disseminated at intervals over a far broader zone than at present, around the Arctic and Antarctic Poles, with a correspondent shortening of the Polar night, and a diffusion of more genial warmth. Yet, on the other hand, a large deduction must be made, as Mr. Meacham has shown, for the increased length of path; and the greater amount of atmosphere through which the calorific rays must pass in very high latitudes, not to speak of the greater prevalence of cloud in regions round the Pole. A truer cause of climatic change is to be sought in the effect of precession of the equinoxes, the revolution of the apsidæ, and, above all, the eccentricity of the earth's orbit. The great cycle of change due to precession would cause the different seasons of the Northern and Southern hemispheres to coincide in turn, within 25,868 years, with all the points through which the earth passes in its orbit round the sun. Combining with this movement, that of the revolution of the apsidæ or "motion of the aphelion," as Herschel named it, reduces this term of years to about twenty-one thousand. Sir C. Lyell's explanation, aided by a new diagram, renders sufficiently clear the effects which would be produced upon climate by the successive phases of precession, especially when combined with increased eccentricity or distance from the sun. The difference between winter in aphelion and perihelion—the range of eccentricity extending, as he has shown, to 14,000,000 miles at some periods, instead of 3,000,000, as now—is set down by Mr. Croll as not less than one-fifth of the entire heat received from the sun. Some slight change in this direction since the year 1248 A.D. has been thought capable of actual proof by M. d'Arlesmar, and of being verified by the observations of M. Venetz upon the decrease of Swiss glaciers prior to the tenth century, and their subsequent increase. An admirable table compiled by Mr. Steno shows the variations in eccentricity for a million years before 1800 A.D., with the number of days which would be added to winter by its occurrence in aphelion, which has been followed up for a million years more by Mr. Croll and Mr. Garriek Moore. From these figures there might appear to be a possibility of approximating to a date for the Glacial epoch; and Sir C. Lyell holds it "far from startling" that 200,000 years back might be fixed upon as about the period of greatest cold, when the excess of winter days amounted to 27·7. He had in his tenth edition speculated upon 800,000 or 1,000,000 years as nearer the Glacial epoch, but he feels compelled to narrow the time within the limit at which the principal geographical features of the continents and oceanic basins were approximately assuming their present form. Were the astronomical theory, however, to be relied upon as the basis for the solution of the problem, we ought to meet in the course of palæontological research with a series of Glacial periods perpetually recurring in the Northern Temperate Zone; supposing a large eccentricity by itself sufficient, apart from the co-operation of terrestrial causes, to intensify the cold of high latitudes. But no such evidence of violent revolutions is to be found in the flora and fauna of earlier periods. The continuity of forms, particularly in the class of reptiles, from the Carboniferous to the Cretaceous period, is an obvious fact opposed to the intercalation of intense glacial epochs. Another fact is that many great cycles of eccentricity must have been gone through in the long centuries of the Carboniferous period, in which no break in the order of life is manifested.

The exhaustion of all other means of solution, joined to the mass of positive evidence accumulated by recent science, throws us more and more conclusively upon the idea to which Sir Charles Lyell has firmly held from the first, and which may be taken as the culminating point of his latest achievements in geology, that the predominant cause of the great changes in climate is to be found in the distribution and elevation of the land. The Glacial period may be traced to an excessive and abnormal accumulation of land around the Pole. There is absolutely no limit to the alternations which the surface of our globe may have, or indeed has, gone through. There is hardly a spot of what is now land which has not been covered by the sea, probably not a space now covered by the ocean which has not been at some time, if not many times, dry land. In one epoch the land may have been chiefly equatorial, at another polar or circumpolar. At present we may readily divide the globe into two equal parts, the land hemisphere and the water hemisphere; the former of which exhibits almost as much land as water, or as 1 to 1·106; while in the latter the proportion of land to water, as made out by Mr. Trelawny Saunders, is only as 1 to 7·988. The general proportion of land to sea may be taken throughout the globe as 1 to 2½. Were the land, by the action of subterranean forces, its total amount being unchanged, now gathered together in masses along the equator and around the Poles alternately, such geographical changes would amply suffice, as Sir C. Lyell makes it his task to show, to explain the utmost vicissitudes which the climate of the earth has undergone. This course of reasoning by no means precludes such aid as may be brought in by independent versæ causæ, by the concurrence of the cold period induced by excessive piling of land around the Pole with wintering in aphelion, or at a period when the earth's axis was abnormally inclined. These causes, especially in combination, would greatly intensify what after all must remain the ruling and inherent principle of climatic revolutions. We have only to look at the present aspect of Greenland to satisfy ourselves what might become the state of the British Isles by a mere substitution of other local conditions under the same parallel of latitude. Were the Gulf Stream done away with, the equatorial continents which now form vast reservoirs of heat transferred to the Northern regions, and their snow-clad frozen surface swept by Polar currents, how far south would the ice-sheet cover the submerged tracts of land, and the glaciers come down to the level of the sea? The chain of facts and reasonings by which Sir Charles Lyell binds together the phenomena which science and discovery contribute to this intricate problem forms one of the most characteristic features of his book. Every new link and every additional degree of tenacity given to his argument enhances the value of this standard work as a steadfast, clear-sighted, and consistent witness to the great law of uniformity and continuity in nature.

The latest information acquired by deep-sea dredging has been incorporated by Sir C. Lyell into his remarks upon the temperature and shape of the bed of the ocean and its living inhabitants. In his chapter on ocean currents he has also considered the latest known results of experiments and observations made by Dr. Carpenter, Professor Wyville Thompson, and Captain Spratt and Nares upon the currents of the Straits of Gibraltar. The space allotted to this survey is not adequate to a full or critical discussion of the arguments for and against the existence of a permanent incurrent. The balance of proof, however, is felt by Sir Charles to support his previously expressed conviction, that the inflowing movement is no permanent undercurrent caused by evaporation, but the result of the Mediterranean tide, which, slight as it is, runs alternately to east and west for several hours, its action being found more regular in the depths of the Straits, where it is less affected either by winds or by the surface inflow. The difference of no less than twenty degrees between the temperature of the Mediterranean and the Atlantic, as well as the difference of four degrees between the deep-sea soundings of the western and central basins of the Mediterranean and of the Greek Archipelago, is explained by the existence of high submarine crests or barriers of rock bounding the sea to the west, and again dividing it into sections, as shown by the diagram in the present edition. According to the wider problem of ocean circulation arising out of the extreme cold found at great depths both in temperate and tropical regions, Sir Charles disputes the notion of these low temperatures being due to mere depth, the Mediterranean soundings of 13,800 feet having failed to reach a degree of cold below 55° F. Yet the soundings taken at Aden, whither the cold water can only come from the Southern hemisphere, lead to the belief that the whole of the equatorial abysses of the ocean are traversed, in some parts at least, by a continuous mass of water not much above 32° F. That solar heat is in some way or other the primary cause of this great displacement, through the change in specific gravity from the cooling of water towards the polar zones, counterbalanced by a return, however slowly, of water from the equator to the Poles, may well take the place of more remote theories, such as that expounded by Herschel, that the expansion of water by heat in the equatorial zone raises the level of the sea, and causes a flow down a gently inclined plane towards the Poles. In the absence, however, of more extensive and accurate knowledge of the state of the ocean at great depths, or of its local direction and quantity of motion, in relation to the utter stillness found generally by the sounding line to prevail in its great abysses, Sir Charles Lyell is too cautious and patient a reasoner to think the time ripe for a positive solution.

LETTERS OF MISS MITFORD.

IT is no disparagement whatever to Miss Mitford to say that the two new volumes of her letters do not add very much to our knowledge of herself, her opinions, or her experience of life. A woman whose time was spent in reading and writing and receiving visits; who rarely left home; whose correspondents were all literary; who was concerned in no public matters of interest; who had no private history of the affections (as far as we have yet been told); who was almost ostentatiously frank and unreserved about herself; who had only one secret, which she hid from all her friends, and tried to hide from herself—the very vulgar clay of that probate old idol, her father, and the miseries he caused her—who finally wrote often ten letters a day, and sometimes thirty, must necessarily repeat herself. Her correspondents change, but her topics must remain the same; and not only the topics, but, with such a character, and under such circumstances, the mode of treating them; and yet it seems to be the design of the many holders of her letters to print them all. Mr. Chorley betrays a sense of ill-usage because there are stores of Miss Mitford's letters, "letters of indisputable interest," which their possessors declined to place in his hands, with an intimation of their being reserved for separate publication. These letters in reserve have no doubt an intrinsic interest—that is, the same interest as to matter and style as those already before the world; but we take leave to doubt the propriety, either in the interests of their writer or of literature, of publishing another series of them. The present collection consists mainly of four series: Miss Mitford's letters to Mrs. Holland, lasting from 1817 to 1837; to Miss Anderson, afterwards Mrs. Barbridge, from 1837 to 1854; to Miss Martineau, afterwards Mrs. Aston Lindall, from 1836 to 1854; and to Miss Guppy, from 1847 to 1855—that is, within a few days of her death. Such constancy of friendship as is implied by more frequency and length of correspondence is no doubt a rare and valuable character, though it must be admitted that Miss Mitford could not afford to lose her friends, and very likely used their names.

It was not, however, within her nature of domesticity to be content with a narrow circle of friends. Her letters to Mr. Chorley, London, 1854, are a fine example of her style.

tone or matter with each correspondent. The difference between one correspondence and another lies in the allusions to, and comments on, each friend's sayings and doings; matters of extreme interest to recipients and readers, but in most cases of little curiosity or value to the reader. The letters to Mrs. Holland, for example, with much amusing literary gossip, contain an amount of history, a profusion of allusions to Mr. Holland's landscapes and Miss Holland's novels, which it is not fair to publish at full length. The writer's style certainly tumbled down with years—a fact so much to the credit of her real sincerity that when we read such sentences as “You, my dear Miss Holland, are the mistress of our tears, as Miss Anson is of our smiles, and I think you have the advantage; people are prouder of crying than of laughing; you hear more praise of Less than of the School for Scandal,” we feel how hard it is to flout such criticisms in the face of a well-earned reputation after fifty years.

Still the ruling feeling of Miss Mitford's life was against a severe sincerity. It was her will to ignore her father's evil practices towards the world and herself. Every letter has some pretences about him which she knew was not true, and which she must also have known that her correspondent would take for what it was worth; but she chose it to be so, and would willingly establish, while secretly conscious of the bargain, a tacit understanding with her friends that, if they would fall in with her tone about him, and accept her version of his character, they should not be the losers. But deception, even self-deception, of this sort, however filial and Spartan, cannot be kept up with impunity. Wherever it is particularly flagrant it seems to diffuse itself through the letter, imparting, to our thinking, a sort of illusory unreality to the furthest corners and crossings. She wrote with a swing, because too often, if she paused in her charming spirits and rose-coloured views of life, the paternal cravings, scrapes, and selfish exactions might force themselves on her harassed brain; and so the style in this one respect suffers, though likely enough the excessive rapidity of her pen deceived her into a sense of almost random candour and unreserve. Nobody who knew Miss Mitford can hold his hand from this evil genius of her life and happiness. Though Mr. Chorley says, “the man lies fallen into the kennel of oblivion,” yet he assists in keeping him in the world's memory, where indeed he must hold a place so long as his daughter's wonderful love and extravagant devotion live in it.

In one point, however, Miss Mitford was exceptionally true. She took a just view of her own powers, which is a virtue of a high order; intellectual as well as moral, in a flattered authoress. She might compliment others, but she could speak modestly about herself. She was no fisher for fine speeches, and was alive to her own shortcomings, when publishers were urging her to write, and pecuniary success rewarded all her efforts, along with a degree of fame which her readers now can scarcely account for, and which must make some moderns envious. She was a real celebrity, but correspondents wherever English was spoken, and found her acquaintance sought, not only by rising genius, but by men of the highest literary reputation. There was in her a warmth of sympathy, an appreciation of intellectual intercourse, a pleasure in reciprocal admiration, which would seem to have rendered her society extremely attractive. We gather that people all felt themselves their cleverest and brightest in her company, and if they knew that they would be sketched off to her friends in glowing colours, it would add an historical interest to an hour's conversation. She had the faculty of being charmed; probably people really showed their best to her, and, enjoying themselves, contributed in an especial degree to the common enjoyment. Her social instinct was so strong that she could only exercise her critical powers on subjects quite removed from and out of reach of personal intercourse. This she does not get on with American literary ladies or their books; Uncle Tom's Cabin seems to her utterly disagreeable; indeed she presently sticks fast, and is very unlikely to take up the volume again. In fact, she suspects Mrs. Stowe to be one of the strong-minded women of whom Margaret Fuller is another; and “the very nicest American lady she has known, like a well-borne young Englishwoman,” has told her that Margaret is the most odious creature that ever lived, the most conceited and presuming. She cannot even believe in the cleverness or much-vaunted superiority of a woman whose writings do so little to prove it. But Margaret comes to Europe, is seen in society, has a tragical end; and Miss Mitford's enthusiasm is aroused. She hears of her from Mrs. Browning, with whom “the Ossie” spent their last evening at Florence, and there the Marquis recalled the faint prophesy against himself—“Because of the Sea!” She subsequently reads Marion's Life, and is enraptured at the interest of the book, and the power of the woman. But if she is somewhat cold towards the genuine character of successful authoresses who were known neither to herself nor her friends—Miss Fanny, Mrs. Norton, and others—all her heart goes out to her intimates, if fellow-workers. The friendship between her and Mrs. Browning was beautiful to both, and was carried on, Miss Mitford went to the extreme point of allowing her friend some insight into her own inmost estimate of her literary character; and she could repay affection and devotion with an effusion which it was worth while to have exchanged. It was something for a young poetess to be permitted to confide in a reader, and to be permitted if they read Miss Mitford's letters to be proceeded from courtesy—a slight, girlish figure, very delicate, with exquisite hands and feet; a round face, with a most noble forehead; a mouth, beautifully formed, and full of expression; lips like parted pearls; teeth large, regular, and glittering with healthy whiteness; large dark eyes, with such expression, smiling on the cheek when cast down, when turned upward, touching the flexible and expressive eyebrows; a dark complexion, with cheeks literally as bright as the dark China rose; a profusion of silky dark curls; and a look of youth and modesty hardly to be expressed. This added to the very simple, but graceful and costly, dress, by which all the family are distinguished, is an exact portrait of her some years ago.

Then follows the change that ill-health, which secluded Miss Barrett for years from general society, had made—paling the rosy cheek and altering expression:—

The expression too is completely changed; the sweetness remains, but it is accompanied by more shrewdness, more gaiety; the look, not merely of the woman of genius—that she always had—but of the superlatively clever woman. An old effect of absence from general society, that the talent for conversation should have ripened, and the shyness have disappeared—but so it is. When I first saw her, her talk, delightful as it was, had something too much of the lamp—she spoke too well—and her letters were rather too like the very best books. Now all this is gone; the free thoughts come gushing and sparkling like water from a spring, but flow as naturally as water down a hill-side—clear, bright, and sparkling in the sunshine. All this, besides its delightfulness, looks like life, does it not?

This is good writing, and raises an image in the reader's mind. The personification of the muse is generally a divided work. One woman fulfils our ideal of form, another acts out the inspiration; here we see form and spirit in accord. Miss Mitford is indeed an enthusiast for her lovely young friend's genius and powers. Yet we observe one feeling even towards her illusions—a decided preference for the short over the long. With such an appetite for books, such a prodigious literary digestion as Miss Mitford was gifted with from infancy—so that she could say, “Reading is that for which I live”—we should have thought that a long poem would offer no difficulties; but it is not so. Great readers are great skippers; one never quite knows what reading twelve octavo volumes of solid matter means, enumerated perhaps among a dozen other works of reputation need through in a fortnight; but it rarely means reading them through. Prose admits of such illusions. But poetry does not; reading poetry is real work. Nobody can persuade himself that he has read Paradise Lost by dipping. Therefore Miss Mitford votes decidedly for short poems. They are the poems, she argues, that live—that go home to other hearts; “Only look at the difference between those sort of poems in Elizabeth Barrett's and Victor Hugo's volumes, compared with their dramas, and you will understand what I mean.” Even short poems test her patience, as in her clever tribute to Rogers's poetry, “which must be admired by everybody but by me with that sort of calm, sober, chastened admiration which one is in the habit of bestowing on those sort of poems which are very short and seem very long.” As for Mr. Browning, the effort of reading him is clearly too much for her. “I confess, quite between ourselves, that I can't make out his poetry”; though she is so anxious to think the best of him of whom his wife writes so magnificently, that she subsequently allows “more in it” than she thought at first. Of both she reports in one of her latest letters (1854), that Mr. and Mrs. Browning's books “are advancing towards completion. They have been in hand these three years. His are lyrics of which she has only seen some; hers a fictitious biography in blank verse, of which he has not seen one word, though four thousand lines have been written—a strange reserve.”

Mr. Ruskin becomes known to her as soon as he is the famous Oxford Graduate. In every point he was calculated to excite her enthusiasm, and as years went on the sentiment gathered force. Of his youthful excellence, set off by youthful grace, she writes to her friend Mrs. Patridge:—

Mr. Ruskin was here last week, and is certainly the most charming person I have ever known. The books are very beautiful, although I do not agree in all the opinions; but the young man himself is just what, if one had a son, one should have dreamt of his turning out, in mind, manner, conversation, everything. I quite longed for you to hear and admire him.

There was nothing in Miss Mitford which quarrelled with the world's favourable estimate and verdict; none of that provoking resistance to a general opinion, because it is general, which belongs to some quick wits. Hence rising genius met with no snubs in her presence. She had a taste for success in others; as well as that more common form of the liking, a taste for success in herself. This has no doubt much to do with the extraordinary enthusiasm with which she followed the career of the Emperor of the French, as the successor of her hero Napoleon I. Her letters are interspersed with every variety of commendation, some of it in the most unexpected form; as, for example, that the Prince Louis Napoleon “in the very impersonation of calm, simple honesty”; and that the circumstances of his marriage show him “almost as great a poet as his uncle.” She congratulates her friend on conversion to his cause. “Ah, my well-beloved President, I knew you would come round to him! he is much too good for his nation, and, as you say, has little in common with it; too honest, too calm, too modest, too truthful!” The Coventry is no shock to her, wrote Mrs. Browning, who, she writes, outvies her in enthusiasm. In 1855 she pronounced him the only man who has made any reputation in the four years just passed; and exclaims, “Give us a mild despotism—one clear head—where, instead of talking over affairs for twenty years and writing about them in a hundred newspapers, what is wanted is accomplished.” Mr. Disraeli, her somewhat, does not like Napoleon; but she pins her faith on those spontaneous acts of benevolence for which her hero is so remarkable. “You do not like my beloved Emperor; but was not that visit to the hospitals the very thing to do? And is he not full of those graceful and gracious movements? too full to be mere calculation." Miss Mitford was a Whig by birth and training, and habit of sharing in the universal sentiment around her; but there is something in the idea of power boldly exercised which takes the imagination of woman.

Some of the latest letters in this series have a peculiar interest, as expressing with more strength and amplification than we meet in the first, the clearer faith and hope which cheered the painful period of peculiar helplessness preceding her death—a prostration so complete that she was justified in writing that nothing was left sound but head and heart. Her health had been broken by an unremitting attendance upon her father through a long illness. Always selfish, old age and suffering were not likely to rouse him to considerations which through life had had no weight. He was exacting to an incredible extent. All her days had to be devoted to his service, though the only sign he gave of liking her company was in being more miserable without it; and at night she had to devote hours to the literary labour which was to earn money for his wants. She survived him six or seven years, but never recovered from the strain. It is scarcely fair to Miss Mitford to repeat so many times, sometimes in all but identical words, the details of her last illness which she wrote to different friends; but they represent a state of helpless suffering borne with real patience and exemplary cheerfulness. To her friend Mrs. Bennock she writes:—

I wish you had seen Hugh Pearson. He is exactly a younger Dr. Arnold, and has been to me spiritually a comfort such as none can conceive—such as none can be who is not full of tenderness and charity. I went to him for advice and consolation, and I found it. I have always felt that this visitation was the great mercy of a most gracious God to draw me to Himself. May He give me grace not to neglect the opportunity! Pray for me, my dear friends! We are of different forms, but surely of one religion—that which is found between the two covers of the Gospel. I have read the whole twice through during the last few weeks, and it seems to me, speaking merely intellectually, more easy to believe than to disbelieve. But I am still subject to wandering thoughts—fluttering thoughts. I cannot realize even that which I believe. Pray for me that my faith may be quickened and made more steadfast. You will understand how entire is my friendship for you, and my reliance upon yours, when you read these last lines. Mr. Pearson stayed over Monday that he might administer the Sacrament to me.

The number of names which are not merely names, but with some additional light thrown upon them, are a distinguishing feature of Miss Mitford's letters; such, for example, as Crabb Robinson, Charles Bonar, Kingsley, Landor, Hawthorne, Tom Moore, Tennyson—but the list does not admit of enumeration. This being the case, we cannot appreciate the delicacy of precaution on which Mr. Chorley values himself in a note. Where the initial letters which he substitutes for the name in full occur in large numbers we could have wished for a bolder excision. If we must read of a fit of the gout tormenting somebody fifty years ago, let us at least not be put off with a blank; let us know who was tormented, that we may have the chance of fitting it upon some uncle or grandfather of an existing bearer of the name. Such an abstraction as a fit of the gout unattached is not worth perpetuating in print. Then there is a tantalizing Miss J—constantly recurring in the earlier correspondence, to whom the epithet "charming" is uniformly appended. If the impersonation of so many graces is to go down to posterity at all, has she not a right to so much body as the syllables of her name carry with them? What ideas can we form of any woman out of an initial letter and a blank? We say this as a hint to all editors of letters and in the interests of their readers, rather than in any spirit of discontent with Mr. Chorley, who has put together two very attractive volumes, in which, wherever we open, we find matter to lead us on page after page well amused.

VINOY'S SIEGE OF PARIS.

THOSE who watched last summer with critical eye the first peace parade of the army of Republican France, when the Chief of the Executive Power sat in state in the place of the fallen Emperor, and celebrated the recovery of Paris to the country by reviewing the troops that had won it, have said that among all the military names which were whispered from ear to ear, two only won the plaudits of the crowd. Soldier and civilian on that day did spontaneous honour to the brave old Marshal whose reputation had survived the wreck of Woerth and the surrender of Sedan, and who, scarce healed of the wounds suffered on the day when Frenchmen sustained a defeat more terrible than they had ever inflicted, had come back to lead the mixed forces which it was well known would obey no other leader. And joined with MacMahon's name amid the plaudits was that of the stout old soldier who had led his reserve; for Vinoy's name had endured the shocks of disaster and the more fiery trials of political turmoil, without ever being subjected to a charge of meanness, dishonesty, or personal self-seeking. The spontaneous homage accorded to these two leaders on that day when Frenchmen for the first time for many a dreary month could contemplate their soldiery with pride, proved that at heart the same sound qualities find approval with their nation as with our colder selves; and that, amid the wrecks left by the storms that have swept over their unhappy country, an undimmed personal character still finds its reward.

Marshal MacMahon loves his pen too little to let us hope that he will do himself justice in a narrative of his own. He leaves to minor actors in the great drama of the Second Empire the task of showing how his honesty of character and singlemindedness kept him apart from, and out of the favour of, the despotic ruler whom he served. Others also will probably have to explain (indeed some of them unconsciously, like the unhappy De Failly, are doing it already) how far his share may be excused in the great defeats connected with his name. General Vinoy is not so reticent nor so absorbed in the more active duties of his profession, or we could not have received the narrative which he now gives to the world of his share in the strange events of the last eighteen months. Not that the present volume completes the tale. It carries it on only so far as the 22nd of January of last year, when Vinoy received the chief command of all the garrison of Paris from Trochu's failing hands in the last days of the German siege. We are promised a later work from his pen, which will tell the story of the Commune. The book before us is itself made up of two essentially distinct parts; for the operations of the original XIIIth Corps in the field before the siege began, and during the first days of the investment, are naturally a separate subject from those of the larger force which Vinoy commanded during the later stages of the leaguer of the once brilliant capital of modern Cæsarism. We purpose, therefore, treating these two portions of the volume separately.

Though somewhat fatiguing to the general reader in the precision of its details, Vinoy's work will for that very reason be of untold value to the future historian of the war. Moreover, the General writes with facility, if not with real brilliancy, and understands the full value of the professional phraseology which, added to the natural resources of their language, has created a school of French military historians second only to the renowned writers of Greece. So that his work will serve those chance readers who know how to skip judiciously, as well as the more industrious band who dig closely into the materials before them. And the drier portion of the narrative is here and there relieved with such touches of sentiment or description as remind the reader usefully that it treats not of mere inanimate pawns upon a chess-board, but of the living sentient beings whom a fine night, a clear moon, and, above all, a well-filled stomach may change from disordered fugitives into obedient and disciplined troops.

What the original reason may have been that the French Government never formed the corps which should have numbered from VIII. to XI. we are not informed. They could hardly have hoped to impose upon so well-informed an enemy as that with whom they had to do by the stale device of pretending the existence of the corps which the missing numbers should represent. It is certain that these commands were, for some unexplained reason, never created. The first reinforcements of MacMahon became a XIIth Corps under Ducrot, when it was known that the defeated Marshal was retreating on Châlons, and the XIIIth Corps, with which we are now concerned, was formed soon afterwards at Paris on the 16th August. The Staff were all appointed in the usual way from among the officers—many, like Vinoy himself, en retraite before the war—gathered at the capital; but the bulk of the troops were of the new formation, régiments de marche, composed each of three of the fourth or dépôt battalions of the infantry of the line. One single brigade alone, Guilhem's, consisted of two line regiments which had just arrived from Rome, and were in excellent order. Vinoy's ten new régiments de marche were very far from being in so satisfactory a condition. The battalions that formed these arrived just as they were hurried up from all parts of France, insufficiently officered by inferior men—for the dépôt service had naturally been unpopular—and varying in numbers from twelve hundred down to three hundred rank and file. The breakdown of the War Ministry had affected the French dépôt system, like the rest of the military machine; and the commanders, accustomed to refer all things to the Bureau at Paris, must have been left without defined instructions till the last, for General Vinoy tells us that some brought with them all the men there had been time to clothe, whereas others left all recruits behind who had not passed the first drills. Hardly any of the soldiers were thoroughly taught, and very few had ever fired a shot with the chassépôts they bore, whilst none had ever seen any real service or any training that might prepare for it. Of his artillery, which numbered ninety guns—a fair proportion to his thirty thousand men—Vinoy gives a better account. The division of cavalry which he was promised was sent on to Châlons in advance, and was lost to the corps. The Intendance, it will surprise no one to learn, was quite unequal to its work; and, owing to the confusion in the War Office, no medical staff at all was appointed for some time after the corps was formed, although the necessary officers were in Paris awaiting orders.

On the very day that Vinoy received his command, Bazaine was intercepted at Mars-la-Tour, and all communication with him soon afterwards ceased. The next scene of the drama turned on the possibility of his release, and Vinoy's work shows beyond dispute that the new War Minister, Palikao, must bear the full responsibility of the loss of a second great army in the rash design of extricating that already cut off, which we long since in these pages fixed upon him. An elaborate plan accompanying Vinoy's work is copied exactly from a sketch received from the War Ministry on the 28th of August, as a guide to the first operations of the armies and the movements by which MacMahon's flank march was to be carried out. This sketch—a summary of military literature in its way—is marvellously correct in its view of the positions. The Prussians are shown investing Metz and Verdun, and even descending the Meuse towards Sedan. But the Crown Prince is supposed to have been drawn on to Châlons before discovering the flank march, and to be only turning northward too late to reach even the tail of the columns of MacMahon, whose junction-point with Bazaine is indicated about forty miles west of Metz, near Étain. If it is true that to effect this he would evidently have to force the passage of the Meuse in face of resistance from the Prussians (the Prince of Saxony's Fourth Army really), heard of near Verdun; and Bazaine, aided perhaps by his brother Marshal's approach, had to break through the cordon that kept him on the Moselle. But for these obstacles Palikao was evidently prepared when indicating on his pretty sketch (what a piece of irony the words read to day!) the "plateau où la jonction doit se faire," the meeting point which MacMahon's troops did indeed reach not many days later—but reached as prisoners of war.

Whilst MacMahon with four corps began his unhappy march from Châlons, the XIIIth was directed by Palikao to his support. Its first orders were to advance cautiously towards the Aisne, about Craonne, not joining MacMahon, but subject to his orders, and prepared to threaten the flank of the Crown Prince on his expected movement northwards. The days were, however, days of indecision no less than of rashness, and that evening the intended movement on Craonne was suspended, and changed early on the 29th for a direct movement by railroad on Mézières under similar general instructions as regarded the armies in the field. But ere the rear of Vinoy's Corps had begun the march, De Failly's Corps had been surprised at Beaumont by the Bavarians under circumstances of discredit which time only darkens, and the series of combats in the Argonne was fairly begun, which "hardly ceased until the Third and Fourth German Armies had shaken hands" along the Belgian frontier round their ill-fated prey.

The movement on Mézières was conducted entirely by the railroad which runs through Soissons and Laon. The details were arranged by Palikao himself, whose taste for meddling with the duties of his subordinates appears to be surpassed by no official that any central War Office in France or elsewhere has ever known; so that it was only Vinoy's remonstrance which enabled the corps to keep its two old regiments at its head. The resources of the Soissons line, knowing nothing of any military requirements in time of peace, were found to be quite unequal to the duties suddenly imposed on them by war, and an additional delay was caused by the railroad being crossed at its Hirson junction by the line to Avesnes, which was kept constantly open until the Prince Imperial had been conveyed to a place of safety.

It was nearly 1 A.M. of the 31st when Vinoy's headquarters reached Charleville, the large commercial suburb of Mézières, on the south side of the Meuse. We know that the Germans were then commencing their preparations for following up the success of Beaumont, and hemming in MacMahon. But though the action of the day before had been fought in the same department, and within an easy ride of Mézières, Vinoy could learn nothing of its particulars or result. To send an aide-de-camp on by the railroad still open to Sedan, to dispose the troops in hand to cover that by which the rest of the corps was arriving, and to reconnoitre along the other line to Rheims, which was reported to be cut, were obvious precautions, and Vinoy adopted them at dawn. The train that carried the aide-de-camp was fired on by the Prussian advanced guard, moving on the Donchéry passage of the Meuse; but Captain Semailson escaped unhurt, and arriving in Sedan, delivered his report to the Emperor. Napoleon, apologizing for his own action in the absence of MacMahon, whose approval as Commander-in-Chief he declared "to be necessary, handed him the brief order for Vinoy, "The Prussians are advancing in force; concentrate all your troops at Mézières," a direction which MacMahon, coming up soon afterwards, confirmed. The Marshal spoke freely of the misconduct of De Failly's troops the day before, and of his own intention of soon retreating on Mézières. Though the morning was passing on, he regarded the movement by the north bank of the Meuse on that place as easy and very unlikely to be interfered with. It was 1 P.M., and the Bavarians had been feeling the position on its Bazailles side, when Captain Semailson got clear of the streets of Sedan on his way back, and had a sorrowful proof of the reality of the disaster of the day before. More than five hundred men of the 3rd regiment of the line were drawn up under the command of a subaltern, the senior officer left with the wreck; he could get no orders from any one, and his men were clamouring from the ranks to be led away to Mézières for safety. Stranger sight still upon the road beyond, the aide-de-camp saw inhabitants of that place flying to Sedan for refuge, and meeting others going from Sedan to their town on a similar errand. At half-past two Vinoy received the Emperor's order, but his corps was still delayed on the railroad behind, whilst his reconnoissances told him that the Prussians were in serious force close at hand.

The fatal 1st of September found Vinoy without fresh news, and with but one complete division of his infantry arrived. MacMahon, not being heard of, could evidently not be retreating on Mézières; and Vinoy hoped he might have found his way past the enemy, and be marching eastward from Sedan. His own instructions in such case from the first had been to endeavour to interfere with any pursuit, and he moved forward therefore a few miles with the troops he had, until his leading brigade found developing before it the Württemberg Division, the left of the German army, and at the same time the General learnt that at dawn 40,000 of the enemy had crossed the Meuse that morning, and lay between himself and MacMahon on the northern bank. Escaped guns of the Vth Corps now came in, and soon afterwards a staff-officer, sent from Sedan at 9:30 A.M. with the news of MacMahon's wound, and of the certainty of the coming defeat. Palikao's reply from Paris when the telegraph carried him this ill news was to leave Vinoy free to act for himself.

To remain at Mézières without provisions and ammunition was to risk certain destruction; so before dark Vinoy had given his orders for a retreat on Laon. To turn back the trains on the way was simple enough; but to remove the division and the reserve artillery now collected at Mézières by the exhausted resources of the railroad was hopeless, and Vinoy formed his two brigades and mass of guns into a column to march at daybreak of the 2nd. But the VIth Prussian Corps, the only one of his vast masses which Von Moltke had failed to bring up into line at Sedan, was already on the way to intercept escape from Mézières, and prepared to contest the direct passage of the Aisne at Château Porcien. Delay would have been fatal to Vinoy; so leaving his camp fires burning, he broke up soon after darkness fell, and by a night march, made under great difficulties with his raw troops, turned the position of the Prussians, and got beyond them. The 4th September found him once more upon the railroad line to Paris without fear of being intercepted. An order from Palikao received that morning enjoined him to make a stand if possible. But events had marched far quicker than the XIIIth Corps, and the same evening a despatch from the new Government, just formed under Trochu, desired him to direct the whole of his troops on Paris. So Laon and Soissons, which Vinoy had just occupied, were left to chance garrisons, and the XIIIth Corps, sole survivor of the ten that had marched to meet the Germans, was drawn in to the capital. The first seven weeks of the war had ruined the reputation of the Third Napoleon, dashed the Imperial crown from his head, and left his capital a prey to revolutionary passions within, and stripped of all defenders without who could avert the coming storm of war.

A NOVEL OF AMERICAN LIFE.*

MISS NICHOLS, the author of this little story, informs us that she lived from childhood in New York, and having come to England, she has apparently resolved to give us a picture of life and manners in America. She thinks it necessary, under these circumstances, to explain that certain peculiarities of language of which English readers may complain are faithful reproductions of American phraseology. The conventional Yankee of the English stage talks a language which is partly compounded of pure English slang and partly of a mixture of the idioms of different States. For, in spite of the general uniformity of language, an experienced observer can easily distinguish the natives of New England, of the middle States, of the West, and of the South from each other, both by idiom and accent. We confess that we are not sufficiently at home in the subject to be able to say with any confidence how far the language in Jerry accurately represents the dialect of New York. Like other American dialects, it appears to be derived from two different sources. The genuine old Americanisms, as the best of all authorities, Mr. Lowell, has shown in his preface to the last series of Biglow Papers, are simply old English phrases which have either dropped out of use or which were always confined to special provinces. It is rash indeed to affirm of any given expression that it is of American growth, and that no precedent can be produced for it in some of the old English seventeenth-century authors. Few people, for example, remember that the common expression, a party "platform," was constantly used by the Puritans before the Mayflower left our shores. It is perhaps rather more singular to observe that the Republicanism of nearly a century has been unable entirely to suppress such expressions as the "King's English"; and Miss Nichols tells us that she remembers an old lady who always substituted "George a' mercy" for "Lord a' mercy"—a relic, as it appears, of the days when the Georges were treated with more respect than they habitually receive amongst the descendants of their subjects. Still more oddly, we find that the convenience of a decimal coinage has not quite destroyed all recollections of the old monetary system. The characters in Jerry talk occasionally about shillings and pence, and a shopkeeper in New York will occasionally give the price of an article as seven-and-sixpence, instead of stating the corresponding number of cents. But besides these survivals of old words, the Americans most certainly have the credit, such as it is, of inventing additions to our common language which we cannot admit to be invariably improvements. We cannot yet reconcile ourselves to talking about a "scientist" or a "walkist" in place of a man of science and a pedestrian; and we have still stronger objections to such a queer corruption as "conjugal," which appears once or twice in these pages. It is true that it may be intended as simply comic, inasmuch as the gentleman who exclaims, "My spirit bride! my beautiful one! my eternal conjugal partner!" is represented as a contemptible quack, and proceeds to swear "eternal conjugal love" to another young lady at a distance of only two pages. America, however, is a free country, and we cannot object to its setting up a language of its own when the humour takes it. Leaving, however, these philological speculations, we will proced to the merits of the story itself. We are bound to say that Miss Nichols is not in our opinion the coming novelist. In fact, she has very little notion of telling a story, and has shaken a number of characters together without much regard to coherence or unity of purpose. Yet, in spite of obvious inexperience, she gives proofs of decided talent, and there is some real freshness in many of her descriptions of character. We only regret that the rather confused series of scenes was not put together with a more artistic sense of fitness. It is often said that it is next to impossible to make a really effective novel out of American materials. The people are too homogeneous; there is an unpleasant monotony about the aspect of society; there is little opportunity for those contrasts of manners and those descriptions of the picturesque growths of an old-established order of things which are generally turned to account by our best novelists. To say the truth, we do not consider the excuse to be sufficient. We have a suspicion that America has not as yet produced first-rate novels, unless Hawthorne's works are an exception, for the same reason that it has not produced first-rate poets, or scholars, or men of science. What that reason may be we leave to the reflections of the De Tocqueville of the future. But certainly we do not admit that poverty of materials can be a sufficient excuse. New York, it is very true, is not so picturesque a town as London or as Paris; and yet we fancy that a Thackeray or a Balzac could manage to discover in its passions as intense and incidents as exciting as any in the Old World. Indeed, New York would in some respects have the advantage. The incessant movement of society, the ardent pursuit of wealth, the rapidity with which the scene is perpetually shifting out that strange theatre of life, and the variety of the elements which are constantly brought together in the most miscellaneous of populations, should surely be able to tax the powers even of the most imaginative writer. The cleverest sketch, for example, in the present volume is a certain Mrs. Mayo, who is a fine lady of the American type. She is more versatile, extravagant, and clever than her European sisters; she is always endeavouring to dazzle her husband and her friends by taking up magnetism, or ritualism, or high art, or music, or poetry; she is the centre of all manner of intrigues invented by the social ambition of her fellow-citizens; she is as healthless as Becky Sharp, and as clever at disguising her heartlessness from the surrounding world. Her ambition must surely have a wide career in a country where the rights of women are so extensive, and where the career of the late Mr. Fisk shows how much may be accomplished by shrewdness, impudence, and an utter want of principle. The execution is not equal to the conception, or Mrs. Mayo would outlive her inventor to a high degree of praise. As it is, she rather suggests to us what might be done with such materials by a competent writer than satisfies our expectations. During the first part of her history she is the victim of the clever quack, Mr. Fitznoodle, whose eloquence upon "eternal conjugal love" we have already quoted. Dr. Fitznoodle himself is described with some cleverness, and is to our sharp ladies' doctors what Mr. Fisk was to our keenest speculators in the money market. We could fancy that he is an incarnation of Thackeray's Dr. Brandon, who, as we remember, took refuge from his English creditors in New York. The second of the two ladies to whom he vows "conjugal" affection is a Miss Greene, who inhabits an "aristocratic home in the Fifth Avenue." The manners of this lady are scarcely as aristocratic as her home, as may be inferred from the following scrap of her conversation:—"I want to go to Mrs. Mayo's party," she says to the doctor; "can't you get me invited? You are always as thick as hops with them Mayos. I don't like to live in Fifth Avenue, and never get invited nowhere. I hate that stuck-up Miss Deane [the other object of conjugal attachment], and I want to go with you and make her jealous. I love to make a nuisance with some folks." The doctor obtains the coveted invitation; and whilst Miss Greene is carrying out her amiable scheme, Nemesis descends upon him in the shape of his real wife, who ruins his promising flirtations, and carries him off to pick up a precarious living by lecturing on popular science in remote regions. The remarkable good-nature, not to give it a harsher name, of American society, which always shrinks from crushing a rogue, is favourable to this breed of adventurers, who must certainly diversify the face of society in a manner highly agreeable to novelists. We must notice, too, the freedom of manners which allows Dr. Fitznoodle and the other male characters to be always walking about with young ladies, taking them to call upon Bohemian artists at all kinds of hours, and in all sorts of remote corners of the town; and to hold long private conversations without interruption from troublesome chaperons; and we think it must be admitted that Mrs. Mayo's drawing-room, when filled with persons of such varying degrees of culture, though we must not say of rank, mixing so freely and changing so rapidly from the heights of fortune to the depths of ruin, ought to afford an excellent hunting-ground for the creator of fiction.

We are far indeed from being at an end of the characters. There is the distinguished poet who becomes a lion of New York society, the Bohemian poet and author who takes a place in the Golden Age, and is at the same time editor of a newspaper, in which society he writes paragraphs headed "personal" about a "poet" and a "poetess" and a "woolly bore" and the lady of his choice, and at the same time composes the most exquisite poems that have ever graced the enthusiastic young millionaire's library, and then suddenly bursts out as an exquisite the fast and herry young man who marries one of the heroines, and then proceeds to drink himself to death, assuming himself in the meantime by chewing tobacco in a peculiarly ostentatious manner in order to amuse the delicate sensibilities of his wife; and the rather conventional idiot, Jerry, who gives his name to the story, and, like other fictitious idiots, has a habit of talking the most admirably pious sentiments, which convert his wiser but more worldly-minded superiors. And, besides all these, there are a number of minor characters, all of them more or less original, and gifted with that true American versatility which is the most surprising part of the national character to Englishmen. We cannot honestly say that Miss Nichols has made an amusing story out of these materials; but the reason is not that there is a want of the natural elements of interest, but that she has obviously more characters on her hands than she knows how to manage. The story, too, is mismanaged and absurdly protracted by some unnecessary misunderstandings, which are as provoking as is generally the case with misunderstandings in novels. If she would limit herself on another occasion to a smaller selection from her portrait-gallery, and set her characters to work on some intelligible plot, instead of jostling them together at random like the figures in a kaleidoscope, she might write a really interesting story. But, however this may be, Miss Nichols has done enough to convince us that, if American society has not yet supplied us with much really good fiction, it presents new materials enough which may be turned to account when a sufficiently qualified observer presents himself. Cooper gave popularity to the old types of Indians and backwoodsmen, and Hawthorne applied the most admirable powers to investing with a poetical atmosphere the characteristic figures of New England. We can see no reason why some genius of the future should not hold up the mirror to the strangely shifting scenes of New York society, which, if not precisely picturesque, is at least animated and exciting in no common degree.

WALCOTT'S TRADITIONS AND CUSTOMS OF CATHEDRALS.

WE have had something to do with Mr. Walcott once before, when he put forth a book on nearly the same subject as the present, but with somewhat higher pretensions. We have an indistinct remembrance of certain heretics who were charged with putting forth their errors, whatever they were, in "books, little books, and tracts." These are three well-marked stages of composition. It is not without satisfaction that we see that Mr. Walcott has come down from the "book" to the "little book," as the change holds out some hope that he may some day evaporate in a tract. He is a writer whom it is hard to describe. Within a certain range he has read a great deal; but we could not call him a well-read man even within that range, because to call a man well read implies, not only that he has read a great deal, but that he has read it well. Still less can we call him a learned man, because that would imply that he has not only read, but has learned something from his reading. Still the number of books which Mr. Walcott must have read must be very great, and the number of isolated facts which he has carried off from his reading is very great also. The unlucky thing is that he does not know in the least what to do with a fact when he has got hold of it. He shovels out his odd scraps of knowledge broadcast, with the loosest connexion, or no connexion at all, between each particular fact and the facts which happen to be set on each side of it. In Mr. Walcott's former and larger work, Cathedrals, utterly confused as was the way in which his materials were thrown together, still there was a good deal of real information scattered about here and there. Though a person who knew nothing of the subject could have learned nothing from Mr. Walcott's book, yet a person who already knew a good deal could easily pick up a good deal more. The present book, the little book, is altogether of a lower type; it seems like the sweepings after the larger book, the gleanings after the vintage; but when the vintage itself hardly reaches to the measure of Abiezer, we cannot speak of the gleanings as exactly the gleanings of Ephraim. A mass of stories, old and new, relevant and irrelevant, having more or less to do with cathedral churches, are thrown together without any principle of arrangement which we can make out. Thus we light by chance on p. 72. We there find a number of headings which seem to have nothing to do with one another, except that in most of them the church doors in one way or another comes in. We find the statement that "in 1395, the Lollards fixed their heretical conclusions on the doors of St. Paul's and Westminster, with various insolent verses." Presently we are told how Bishop Ralph of Chichester "discovered the doors of the Cathedral to be barred with thorns," and how this was done "when Henry the Second levied a tax upon clergies." If we turn to Mr. Walcott's reference, "W. Malin, 206," that is to say, p. 206 of the new Great Dictionary, we find not only an entry to be expected in the case of a paragon of St. Andrew, that the King concerned was not Henry the Second, but Henry the First, but that it was not the Cathedral only, but all the churches in the diocese whose doors were thus oddly barred. Mr. Walcott, though himself preceptor in a secular school, seems to have on many a business wholly alienating to himself, for the matter of his original, "monarchical cathedrals, new cathedrals, and cathedrals laid out as arcades," because in his version "cathedrals" means of Divine Service, with exception of shutting the choir." But the funny thing is, that between these two periods of the fourteenth and fifteenth century severally, we are told that "the first lottery drawn in England was held at St. Paul's door in 1369; and others were drawn there in 1386 and 1612." And so we go on with a number of things having a more or less close connexion with church doors; how some people were reconciled at the doors, and others whipped there, and how "in 1250 the Dean of St. Paul's closed the doors against Archbishop Boniface, under whose robes a breastplate eminently glittered." Very possibly the door was shut, very possibly it was the Dean who shut it; very possibly the Archbishop wore a breastplate; but not one of these things is recorded; all that Matthew Paris says is, "restituerunt canonici," which may imply shutting the door, but does not assert it. The Winchester Annals speak of a "gravis dissensio inter Bonifacium Cantuariensem archiepiscopum et inter Fulconem Londoniensem et canonicos sancti Pauli." This is still less distinct. In the Annals of Thomas Wykes we do find the doors; but it is not said whether the doors were shut or open, and the effect would be more picturesque if we conceive them open than shut. The Canon of Coney tells us, what we should not have learned from any other source, that things came to a stand-up fight before the church doors ("habito conflictu inter partes ante foras ecclesie"), in which several of the Archbishop's people were killed. A prudent Dean might indeed have shut the door at such a moment; but the fact is not recorded, and the scene would certainly be much grander if we conceive the door open. And then about the breastplate. Mr. Walcott tells us that the Archbishop wore a breastplate when he went to St. Paul's. Matthew Paris arms him with a breastplate, or rather a coat of mail ("loricatus"), the next day when he went to St. Bartholomew's; the natural inference is that, after the treatment which his people met at St. Paul's, he took to his fleshly armour to defend himself at St. Bartholomew's. Also, in the special prominence which Mr. Walcott gives to the Dean, he misses the point of the story and the way of speaking at the time. There is no mention of the Dean especially resisting the Archbishop; the resistance is attributed to the Canons generally, the Dean being, in the notions of the thirteenth century, only one, though the chief, among their number. Mr. Walcott no doubt got his Dean from the words of Matthew Paris, when he says that Boniface excommunicated the Dean and some others ("decanum et alios excommunicavit"); but it is somewhat hazardous to leap back from this to the conclusion that the Dean shut the doors, or that the doors were shut at all.

Mr. Walcott has by no means worked out the fertile subject of doors. For instance, he tells us that "the great doors of a Cathedral are only opened for the reception of a Sovereign or a Bishop." Our own experience hardly bears out the Precentor of Chichester on this head, as we have often gone in by the great—at least the greatest—doors of a Cathedral when there has been no Sovereign anywhere near, and when the Bishop has come in another way. Then Mr. Walcott gives us the sad story of the "gross exercises" which took place at York on Shrove Tuesday, when "all the apprentices, servants, and journeymen streamed in to ring the Pancake bell," and how Mr. Lale nearly lost his life in an attempt to stop the scandal. The connexion of this story with doors is not very clear, and it is only the general subject of the book which leads us to the guess that it was the manner into which the apprentices and others streamed to ring the pancake bell. The story is introduced with the somewhat obscure description, "At York, on Shrove Tuesday, the doors of York were thrown open all day." It is not very clear where the "doors of York" were likely to be opened except at York. Nor is it clear whether by the doors of York we are to understand the doors of the minster or the gates of the city. We can only say that, even without the help of a pancake bell, we have ourselves always found both open whenever we have wished to go through them. Recently we read how "Bishop Hackett, on the doors of Lambeth, wrote up a Latin veto forbidding candidates for Holy Orders wearing long hair." From this Mr. Walcott might, if he had been so minded, have easily taken a leap to more modern announcements about hair powder and such like matters of taxation which have so odd an effect on the doors of places of worship, both Established and Nonconformist. But we cannot think that the study of church doors is at all thoroughly worked out, when Mr. Walcott tells us nothing either about marriage "ad ostium ecclesie," nor yet about the more exciting practice of covering the doors themselves with the skins of Danish or other robbers.

It was quite by chance in opening Mr. Walcott's book at random that we lighted on these speculations about doors. Turning over a page or two, we light on the statement "that old names still cling about the Climes of Monastic Cathedrals," among which we find with the names of colleges, which strikes us as being the opposite to monastic, and as marking the change to secular under the light. The passage which follows is a good specimen of Mr. Walcott's manner.

Walled at Wells, Cathedral Green; at Bath, the Green; at Exeter, Cathedral Green; and at Lincoln and York, Cathedral Green, preserve the old names, as Deanery and Chapter, the Deanery of Lincoln and the Chapter and Deanery of Chichester denote the old position of the Dean. The Deanery House remains at Lincoln. In the case of St. Paul's, an old festival of the patron saint, Henry II. did himself the people. Exhibitions also took place at Durham a rope-dancer performed on a cord stretched between the towers, but fell and broke his neck.

When this last and accident happened we are not told; but we do not see exactly what it has to do with the present volume of old names of places. Nor does it strike us as so remarkably as it seems to do Mr. Walcott that a house where a Dean once dwelt should still live as should be known as a Deanery or a Precentory. And we once knew a very distinguished Dean, now deceased, who lived, not in any official dwelling, there being none, but in an apostolically in a hired house, but who nevertheless always dated his letters from the Deanery, on the avowed ground that where pigs lived was a piggery, and where a Dean lived was a Deanery.

We turn a page or two the other way and we find that Mr. Walcott's ill luck has there led him to tell a story which had been already told by a stronger hand. Every one who has read Professor Stubbs's preface to Roger of Howden will remember the vivid description of the reception or non-reception of Archbishop Geoffrey by his divided Chapter of York; how the choir stopped singing at the bidding of the Treasurer, and how the candles were put out at the bidding of the Treasurer. That the tale which Mr. Stubbs tells clearly and vigorously, and with a dramatic conception of the parts of the several actors, is told by Mr. Walcott in a dull and lifeless way, is no more than we should expect. But we were puzzled when we read that all this took place when the Archbishop—more strictly Archbishop-elect—"had come to inquire about the persecution of the Jews." No such motive was mentioned in Roger's story, and it seemed odd that, as the scene in the minster took place on the vigil of the Epiphany, Geoffrey should have come to inquire into the massacre of the Jews, which did not happen till March 1066. A little light came when Mr. Walcott went on to say that "the Archbishop retorted by having the bells removed and laid into the earth, and putting the church under an interdict." For this there was a reference to Benedict, which we verified, and thus found that Mr. Walcott had actually confounded the coming of the Archbishop-elect to York in January with the coming of William Longchamp, Bishop of Ely, Chancellor and Legate, in April. He did come "to inquire about the persecution of the Jews," and, as the Chapter refused to receive him as Legate with a procession and the ringing of bells, he ordered the bells to be put, "not into the earth," but on the ground ("in terram deponere fecit"), and put the Canons and Vicars of the minster under an interdict.

After this we need not trouble ourselves any further with Mr. Walcott. A man who cannot distinguish between two such famous men as Archbishop Geoffrey and Bishop William Longchamp has mistaken his calling when he meddles with mediæval or ecclesiastical matters. We cannot think that Mr. Walcott's greatest effort would be likely to bring out anything of any great value. Here we have his sweepings, sweepings designed, as he tells us, to be "popular, reliable [sic], and instructive," but for which the common fate of sweepings seems to us to be thoroughly deserved.

THE BOOK OF THE FARM.*

FROM its first appearance a quarter of a century ago until now the Book of the Farm has held the very highest rank as a book of reference on matters connected with the theory and practice of agriculture. Its author and editor, Mr. Henry Stephens, has indeed, by its helpful character and acknowledged trustworthiness, achieved for his name a connexion with the literature of the farm as inseparable as that of his French namesake with the annals of mediæval printing and publishing. And the secret of this fame consists in the remarkable tact he has displayed in tempering the curiosity and research of the enthusiast with the caution of the Scotch farmer and the cool judgment of the practical man. The Book of the Farm does not detail merely the results of a limited experience, but examines also, at a length which gives the well-known tomes their portly and substantial appearance, the likeliest suggestions and discoveries of men of authority upon agricultural topics; bringing personal opinion and knowledge to bear in cases where it would not do for the trumpet to have an uncertain sound, and where inquirers might expect trustworthy assistance in making up their minds upon debatable questions. Obviously a scope like this presupposes a more than passable acquaintance with the sciences auxiliary to agriculture. Chemistry, geology, meteorology, diverse branches of natural history and of physical science, must have been mastered, and were mastered, by Mr. Stephens before he could invoke the confidence and support of the more enlightened farmer for his original Book of the Farm. As the range of his work was encyclopædic, so likewise must have been the information and the learning digested as preliminary to the undertaking. Most agriculturists who have got beyond the boorish stage of ignorance which sets no store whatever by "book learning" are aware how fully the first and second editions satisfied expectation, and how authoritative were accounted the lessons of practical husbandry, and the discoveries of modes of improving and expediting agricultural operations, set forth in them. But two decades have passed since Mr. Stephens wrote the preface to his second edition; and a score of years is no small addition to the told tale of any man's days, least of all in the case of one who, even when he first appeared as an author, claimed a hearing for the results of an already considerable experience. In the new edition before us he has not been contented to rest upon his oars, or trust the results of half-forgotten labours; but, from the mass of notes and criticisms with which he has in the interval kept his knowledge en rapport with the age, he has rewritten page upon page and chapter after chapter, so that really the Book of the Farm now before us is almost a new work. In the new, as in the older, editions, the same handy and excellent plan is adhered to, of printing in large text the details of the author's own experience in mixed husbandry upon crops and stock, under the head of "Practice in the Four Seasons of the Year"; the small print indicating that the matter it conveys has to do with other modes of farming than mixed husbandry, with external opinion on special points, or with explanations of particular operations on scientific principles. In short, the original plan and arrangement is wisely uninterfered with, whilst, to keep pace with the advances of agricultural science, the matter digested into pages and sections is oftentimes essentially as well as apparently new. To judge by the portrait of Mr. Stephens which in the edition of 1871 occupies the same place—opposite the title-page—that one of his own short-horn bulls occupied in that of 1851, he has lost little of the natural force which carried him through his original task, and we recommend the contemplation of such veteran vigour of head and body to those who have doubts as to the combination of the bucolic with the literary life. It has enabled him to carry through a third issue of a work which, even apart from its practical authority and experience, would still bear witness to a very uncommon grasp of mind, and no inconsiderable gifts of style and composition.

The only omission we regret in the new edition is that of the short and simple autobiography which in the edition of 1851 Mr. Stephens gave of himself, for the encouragement of "pupil farmers." From it young men proposing to adopt farming as a profession would learn that, after receiving a liberal education at Dundee and the University of Edinburgh, he acquired a thorough knowledge of farming by placing himself for three years under one of the best farmers in Berwickshire, and working with his own hands at the same labours as the hired servants of the farm. Having enlarged his range of observation by a year of foreign travel (it was just after peace was restored at the end of the Peninsular War) he took a farm of three hundred acres in Forfarshire; and in the improvement and reclamation of this—its soil was indifferent, and its buildings dilapidated—he acquired all the agricultural wisdom and experience which have stood him in such stead as a writer on kindred matters. It was there that he introduced several improvements—e.g., feeding cattle in small numbers in hammels, instead of in large numbers in large courts, and confining sheep upon turnips in winter with nets instead of hurdles—which have been generally accepted, and which still hold their ground. But, as years have come and gone, the march of improvement and invention has broken new ground, and the changes, if few, have been important. To quote from the new preface:—

The Tweeddale plough, by its easy mode of reaching a deep furrow, has put it in the power of farmers to extend the range of the food of plants, by greatly increasing the friable soil of this insular kingdom. The reaping-machine sweeps down the corn, in regard to time, in the ratio of ten to one, with the ground prepared for it, the steam-plough superadds a large amount of animal power. The locomotive of the portable thrashing-machine, in conjunction with its collaborator, the steam-plough, sensibly economizes steam-power by being alternately employed in important operations. Guano, with its chemical competer, dissolved bones, enhances materially all the green crops. Linseed-cake, with its congeners, accumulates flesh and fat on the live stock in a given time in an increased ratio. These new things have displaced many more in number that were in use.

But time and change have not led Mr. Stephens to alter his original programme—the threefold division into Initiation, Practice, and Realization. Indeed, for the student who lays himself out to master the first part it is but fair that the third should remain as a bona bouche of encouragement, after the copious detail of the second part. The secret of initiation is, in brief, to add to the best liberal education lessons of experience got by putting oneself in the place of the hind, the cowman, the plough-boy, the labourer in every phase, and by observing closely and diligently the modus operandi of the shrewdest and most practical farmers. Not a little, too, depends on a study of nature's face and ways. Weather prognostics, botanical physiology, and similar departments of science are shown in the first part of the Book of the Farm to conduce to the making of a successful farmer.

Our author's ideal farm consists of some five hundred imperial acres, cultivated upon the system of mixed husbandry as the safest, most instructive, and on the whole most certainly remunerative method of farming. On the principle that you should not carry all your eggs in one basket, there is an advantage in having stock to fall back upon if grain is low; and it must be hard times indeed if there is a concurrent failure in grain, live stock, and wool. Set down on such a farm, we are launched on the great field of practice, and are introduced to the plough at work, the carts hauling manure, the thrashing-machine filling the air with its whirling noise, the cattle in the steadings, the sheep on the turnips. As to this last process, we would give little for the prospects of any farming novice who, with the plain directions for hurdling or netting "breaks" or compartments of increasing length at each shifting, for regulating the amount of dry fodder to sheep so confined, for ploughing up each stretch of break as soon as mowed (with an eye to preserving the manure, and so forth) given in sections §§ 13-154, &c., could fail to go through the operation so as to ensure success. As regards ploughs, there is none in our author's estimation to approach the Tweeddale plough in its aptness to make a wide furrow, for pulverizing the soil quickly with its deep and loosened furrow-slices, and for its easy draught in proportion to the weight of soil turned over. What our English ploughs gain in lightness to the ploughman's hand, they lose in depth; and their wheels also compress the furrows overmuch. From the coincidence of authorities we should be afraid it is a true bill that our ploughmanship is on the whole very mediocre (§ 549), but that is no reason why we should not make sure of the best implement. Now the Tweeddale plough would seem to combine effective work with small expenditure of power, and to be invaluable in stubble-ploughing and going deep into the subsoil. Its use is calculated to revolutionize winter ploughing, and to expedite the work of spring, by its depth of furrow cradicking, or else for ever burying the root-weeds, and by superseding almost all cross ploughing, harrowing, and rolling processes. What Mr. Mechi will say to Mr. Stephens we cannot pretend to divine, but the following quotation will show that, whilst possessed of the Tweeddale, the latter does not envy the most modern and scientific of farmers the utmost successes of steam cultivation:—

Until the introduction of the steam-plough not a word was heard in Scotland of the advantages of deep ploughing, though Lord Tweeddale had been practising it successfully for several years. The steam-plough was to ensure deep culture. As yet it has given no instance of deep ploughing beyond what could be executed by horses. As it seems to me, even the best steam-plough, which Fowler's is acknowledged to be, is not capable of reaching deeper than what is attained by a pair of good horses. Lord Tweeddale tried steam-ploughing many years ago, and his experience brought conviction to many minds, that whenever a really substantially deep furrow was attempted to be reached, the cost and trouble of steam greatly exceeds the cost of horse-labour, and he gave up the steam and betook himself entirely to horses. No steam-plough apparatus has yet been constructed to go to the depth of the combined action of the Tweeddale and trench ploughs with seven horses—twenty or twenty-two inches. Ploughing twenty inches deep with both ploughs and seven horses, along with six men—two to turn out the boulders encountered by the plough—incurs the cost of 2*l.* 13*s.* per imperial acre. The previous thorough-draught cost 5*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.* the acre; both processes costing 8*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* per acre.—1. 103.

On such a vast question we can only say, "non nostrum inter vos," &c.; though it is just conceivable that the march of improvement may be making its way past the earnest and practical veteran who has seen and noted so much. Just so it may be doubted whether, with all the store he sets on liquid manure, and his experience of what the sewage of Edinburgh has done to increase the value of land in its environs, he has quite risen to the "high argument" of the Warwick and Leamington scheme now in progress, but this is only to say that knowledge is progressive, and that there is no such thing as finality in science.

We cannot attempt to give the faintest sketch or abstract of the farming operations through which the author conducts us, even under the head of winter. An idea of his research and resource may be gained by two or three jottings. Thus, to meet the question which is the most profitable breed of sheep, he brings the conflicting testimony of two very eminent breeders; one in favour of crossing Lincoln ewes with gigantic Hampshire rams, the other, to which the name of Bakewell of Dishley adds weight, of pure and small breeds, as realizing the greatest quantity of meat from the smallest quantity of food. As to "concentrated cattle-food," Mr. Stephens's witness, Dr. Anderson, adduces testimony of a damaging character. It seems that food cannot be concentrated but by expelling water, nor altered from its usual state without the addition of some stimulant, which the farmer may far more cheaply purchase and add for himself than get in a manufacturer's mixture, in which the aromatic or bitter ingredient is the excuse for running up a bill to thrice the cost in which the ingredients would stand the farmer. As to the cooking of food for cattle-fattening, Mr. Stephens's reading and experience lead him to conclude that on ordinary farms it is not worth the trouble and expense. Upon the most economical use of straw—another moot point in these later years—Mr. Stephens holds a media via. Some advise not to use it for litter, but to let the beasts lie on deal boards, and chop the straw for food. Others advocate littered straw as the means of ensuring to ensuing crops the completest advantage of the dung. Our author's opinion is that a part of the straw should be cut for ease of consumption; part given uncut for promoting secretion of saliva through chewing, and part also—we have no patience with the hard-bed advocates—as comfortable bedding for the animals.

On rinderpest, pleuro-pneumonia, and foot and mouth disease, on animal pests, and on the commoner diseases of live stock of various kinds, these volumes will be found a sufficient book of reference. Wheresoever we have tested it, the oracle has been commendably explicit and unambiguous. And it is no little recommendation to a book of such dimensions that it is well written, without fine writing, and sensibly written, without running into the didactic vein. A thorough master of the science he elucidates, its author is as much at home on the track of Dr. Daubeny on "Ancient Husbandry" as in the freshest footprints of modern investigation. We can unreservedly commend his new edition, and we should sugar-well for the agricultural future of this country if it could find a place on every farmer's bookshelf. It is in its favour that it contains within four covers all the book learning a farmer ought to know.

STEPHENS'S LIFE OF ST. CHRYSOSTOM.*

MR. STEPHENS writes smoothly, temperately, intelligently, and like an Anglican of Anglicans. He cannot himself forget, and he does not allow his readers to remain in ignorance, that he is a nephew of Lord Hatherley and a son-in-law of Dr. Hook. He is therefore inclined by association, as he probably is by education and natural temperament, to that practical type of religious thought and sentiment which is one element in the lasting friendship between the present Lord Chancellor and the present Dean of Chichester. Mr. Stephens further informs us that he undertook his Life of Chrysostom in consequence of a suggestion of his father-in-law; and we can easily see that not only a subject of this class, but a biography of this special saint of the Eastern Church, would occur to Dr. Hook as a congenial and desirable work. Chrysostom would be acceptable to the Dean as he is to Mr. Stephens, as being in many respects an anti-Romanist divine, as eminently a practical man and not a dreamer, as not a mere monk, but, in the words of the English Homily, "a great clerk and godly preacher."

Though Chrysostom recommends himself to our English instincts, there is no close parallel to him among Anglican divines. Jeremy Taylor will occur to us at once, as he did to Dr. Newman in his Anglican days, when he told us that we could claim Chrysostom in that clear eloquent flame which shone bright round a martyr's throne. Yet the features of honourable resemblance which, from Dr. Newman's old standpoint, are visible between the two bishops, are not numerous; and, on comparison, the advantage rests almost always with the Greek prelate. As Mr. Stephens justly observes, Taylor's style is artificial, and is overlaid with multifarious learning; while the florid rhetoric of Chrysostom seldom, if ever, interferred with his directness of purpose, so that he was not only an eloquent writer, but an effective preacher, who made himself felt as a force in a great capital. Chrysostom and Taylor had both some experience of imprisonment; but Taylor survived a comparatively slight persecution to die an Irish bishop in honour and affluence, while Chrysostom, when once dragged from his patriarchal throne, had to endure the miseries of exile among the mountains of Cappadocia, the heat of summer, the cold of winter, and the visits of Saracen robbers, as certain though not as regular as the seasons, till he was dragged from Cucusus to perish on his way to a still more inhospitable and inaccessible place of banishment. As appearance goes for something, it may be said on behalf of Taylor that he was a remarkably handsome man, while Chrysostom was short in stature, with a bald head, a wrinkled forehead, sunken eyes, hollow cheeks, and a complexion that showed marks at once of abstinence and indigestion. Yet in some of these respects Chrysostom was like St. Paul, and if Taylor was handsome, there is also reason to suspect that he was vain. Bishop Heber has remarked that few authors have so frequently introduced their own portraits, in different characters and attitudes, as ornaments to their printed works; and the well-known All Souls' portrait makes it probable that he rather liked attention to be drawn to his beautifully formed hand. In both the men there was a vein of tolerance—a rarer phenomenon in the fourth century than in the seventeenth, though far from common at the later date. Taylor seems to have learned in the school of adversity "the unreasonableness of prescribing to other men's faith and the iniquity of persecuting differing opinions." His Liberty of Prophecy was published in 1647, when, to use his own words, a great storm had dashed the vessel of the Church all in pieces, and he had himself been one of the sufferers in the shipwreck. But it is not easy to discover any further reason than an instinctive love of justice and fairness for the systematic resistance offered by Chrysostom to the attempt of Epiphanius to condemn the opinions and stigmatize the memory of Origen. The mind of Chrysostom had not been moulded by Origen. He had little natural turn for speculation, and neither his indirect obligations to the father of textual criticism, nor his close relations with Theodore of Mopsuestia, had made him a critical scholar. His verbal explanations are those of common sense, not of learning; he spoke a somewhat altered form of the language in which the New Testament was written, and had generally a definite view of the meaning of the writers, though not always a right one. In this respect he has the advantage of Jeremy Taylor, who is far more at home at expansion than at exposition, and, instead of bringing out the force of a text, is apt to bury it under flowers. Chrysostom and Taylor alike express in only too emphatic a form their dissent from one distinctive opinion of Origen. They not only accept the doctrine of eternal punishment in the obvious and literal sense, but think it one that is adapted for copious rhetorical amplification. Chrysostom is sometimes positively awful when he gets on this subject in his letters. Ordinary people, when they read the impassioned sentences in which, as if he himself were the Great Judge, he distributes final rewards and punishments with all the confidence of omniscience, will be inclined to think either that he did not really believe what he said, or that his words were the overflowing of unrestrained and unjustifiable anger, or that his heart was hard as the nether millstone. Mr. Stephens, while granting that to modern ears the language Chrysostom employs is "extraordinarily shocking," warns us against judging the Greek Fathers by the standard of our own times. Chrysostom, he reminds us, had exercised, as well as taught, meekness, forbearance, and charity towards all men, enemies as well as friends; but he lived at a time when the minds of Christians had been for ages inured to persecution, and were hardened in feeling by the operation of a barbarous criminal law, by the contest of party with party, and by violence and bloodshed which, if overcome at all, were exposed writhing in the agony of death under the stern hand of the force that put them down. Mr. Stephens does not make Chrysostom's rhetorical transgressions a reason for considering him at bottom a good-natured man; yet Coleridge, as we know, in the Apologetic Preface to Fire, Famine, and Slaughter, pleads most strongly that similar offences on the part of Jeremy Taylor establish no presumption against his humanity and goodness of heart. The "Tartarean drench" of horrors which Taylor inflicts upon his readers displays, according to Coleridge, the imagination rather than the discretion of its compounder; but the violent words are more bubbles, flashes, and electrical apparitions from the magic caldron of a fervent and ebullient fancy, constantly fuelled by an unexampled opulence of language. It is not for a moment to be thought that a spirit like Bishop Taylor's, burning with Christian love; that a man constitutionally overflowing with pleasurable kindness, who scarcely even in a casual illustration introduces the image of woman, child, or bird, but he embalms the thought with so rich a tenderness as makes the very words seem beauties and fragments of poetry from Euripides or Simonides—it is not to be thought that a man so natured and disciplined did, at the time of composing a horrible picture of everlasting torment, attach a sober feeling of reality to the phrases he employed. It is thus that Coleridge argues directly on behalf of Taylor, and indirectly in defence of Milton and himself. We should be glad to think that the same line of argument might be fairly urged, mutatis mutandis, in favour of Chrysostom, though indeed his nature does not seem to have been peculiarly charged with delicate kindness, and a stern unsparring asceticism interfered in his case with the spontaneous development of the softer kinds of emotion.

Oddly enough, it happens that, if we wish to put Chrysostom and Jeremy Taylor together, and defend them both from the charge of at least speculative inhumanity, we can do so most easily by calling attention to the fact that their orthodoxy is liable to impeachment. It is an old saying that Chrysostom pelagianises. Mr. Stephens is probably right in saying that, on the whole, Chrysostom seems to assign the initiatory movement in the work of human salvation to the will of man; in which case Chrysostom is technically a Pelagian. With regard to Jeremy Taylor, Bishop Heber is obliged to admit that he fluctuates between Augustine and Pelagius. Taylor paid in his own day some of the necessary penalties of this fluctuation: it brought his orthodoxy into suspicion, even with his friends, and involved him in a rather annoying controversy. We have thus two theologians of real and fervent piety, and of great, though not very profound, power of thought, agreeing with each other both in drawing, apparently with all sincerity, most terrific pictures of hell torments, and in shrinking from strong statements about that corruption of human nature in which, according to ordinary theological teaching, all our sins and sufferings have their rise. Perhaps they may teach us, though this is not a lesson on which they had any direct purpose of conveying, that it is of no use to paint this world, either in itself or in its spiritual relations, too black. There is much that is beautiful in life, and much that is hopeful in the heart, to prevent us from acquiescing in a thoroughly depressing view of the nature and destiny of man. The narrow Puritan, who maintains that our nature is totally corrupt now, and circumscribes the area of possible bliss hereafter, can only gain a hearing among people of imperfect intellectual development who are attracted by horrors and are incapable of genuine self-analysis. When even a Pascal takes the beauty away from this life without pouring a flood of imaginative glory on another, we admire and perhaps pity him, but we refuse, except on the compulsion of the strictest demonstration, to feel as he has felt. In proportion as we enclose a space of hopeless darkness beyond the grave, we find ourselves forced to believe that those whom we have known and loved, those whom we have taught and fed and cared for, those from whom we have diffused without bitterness, and with whom we have fought without hatred, will never be its tenants. By a reaction like that which is a matter of familiar experience with the eye, the mind, after contemplating a spot of distant and unutterable blackness, more of the light of heaven on things and persons close at hand. Ideal horrors incline us to contact with cheerful realities and a depressing view of the destiny of our fellow-creatures leads by force of contrast to a favourable view of their nature. In this respect it is much in our own days as it was in the fourth and seventeenth centuries. A really educated man who denounces Universalism as a heresy will seldom or never be sound on the article of Original Sin, as Augustine and the Reformers could soundness.

There is little room, and scarcely any occasion, for finding fault with the manner in which Mr. Stephens has written the life of Chrysostom. His book is not a great historical work, but, as he himself calls it, a Sketch of the Church and the Empire in the Fourth Century, which he has partially filled in by means of the material afforded by the life and writings of a single distinguished man. The extracts given from St. Chrysostom are, as a rule, well chosen and well translated. When Mr. Stephens fails, it is less for want of research than from a deficiency of independent judgment. He does not always know how to use advantageously the facts he has collected, or to adhere with confidence and steadiness to an hypothesis which he has good reason for adopting. Thus he draws a really vivid picture of the visit of Epiphanius to Constantinople. The learned, ill-tempered, muddle-headed, and utterly unreasonable old man makes an ungraceful appearance in the capital of the Empire, having torn a number of intellectual grievances out of the grave of Origen. He is bent on making Chrysostom join him in his denunciations, or, failing this, on treating him as a favourer of heresy and a personal enemy. Chrysostom, though not exactly a polite man, is careful in his behaviour. He offers Epiphanius the hospitality due to a brother bishop; when requested to sign the decree against Origen, he declines to anticipate the decision of a Council; he only interferes to check the proceedings of Epiphanius when it is likely that they will lead to a tumult in church and a disturbance in the city. Epiphanius at last begins to see that he has been induced to seek doubtful ends by undesirable means, and retires from Constantinople, leaving Chrysostom master of the situation. Here Mr. Stephens should have left off; but he proceeds to tell once more the old story that, on parting, Chrysostom and Epiphanius each predicted, in an ill-natured way, the misfortune that was soon to befall the other. Chrysostom says to Epiphanius, "I hope you will not return to your diocese," and Epiphanius says to Chrysostom, "I hope you will not die a bishop." This story is supported by the authority of Sozomen; but it is improbable in itself, its rise can be accounted for by subsequent events, and it is quite at variance with the consistent and charitable version of the conduct of Chrysostom which is adopted by Mr. Stephens. We are indebted to Mr. Stephens for a good book, which would have been still better if the author had exercised with a little more freedom his undoubted right of rejection.

THE OLD MAID'S SECRET.*

GERMAN novels and novelettes translated into English are beginning to occupy no unimportant place in the general literature of this country. Auerbach is pretty nearly as well known as Mr. Trollope, and he by no means stands alone. Hitherto, however, so far as we know, Madame Marlitt's novels have not succeeded in finding many English readers. Her Gold Elbe and her Gold Elbe have both been translated in America, and from that country have found their way to this; but they have not been read so widely as they deserve. The Old Maid's Secret, which was published in Germany so long ago as 1868, under the title of Das Geheimnis der alten Mamsell, was produced in America the following year. That translation did not take, and the book failed to have anything like the circulation in America or England that the original had in Germany. "H. J. C." has now given a new translation of it, and though we cannot entirely congratulate him, or more probably her, upon the reproduction, still it may be said that the book has been brought out at a convenient season; and, printed and got up as it is, there is more probability that it will have a run than there was in the case of the American translation. This novel is the earliest of Madame Marlitt's books. Gold Elbe and the Thuringian Tales were published in 1869, and Gold Elbe in 1870, and both of these books are written with more confidence and skill than the earlier one. But the plot of the present book is by no means inferior. The interest of the story is well sustained from the beginning, and is kept alive to within a few pages of the end, when the secret is revealed, and the true character of Old Mamsell, which to experienced readers of romances required no explanation, is brought out as clear as noonday.

The scene is laid in a remote country town in Thuringia; and it is interesting to see how in all her books the authoress clings to that, to ordinary people, unromantic district and gets so much romance out of it. The story opens with a lively description of a carriage accident, in which no bones are broken, but the dramatis personæ have to walk home along muddy lanes on a wet and stormy night, their horse having broken loose and joined a cavalcade which was conveying a wandering Polish conjuror, D'Orlowsky by name, and his wife and theatrical properties into the town. The next scene represents the performance of the conjuror in the town hall. The programme was attractive and the hall crowded. "Madame D'Orlowsky will appear as a maiden in armour. Six soldiers will discharge loaded guns at her, and she will cut the six bullets across in the air with a stroke of her sword." This exhibition came off in accordance with the programme. Madame D'Orlowsky, a beautiful, golden-haired, sad-looking woman, the wife of the Polish conjuror, with whom she, the daughter of a proud Thuringian family, had eloped, came on the stage dressed fantastically, and took her place before the guns of the six soldiers. They fired at the word of command, and she fell into her husband's arms mortally wounded. It was arranged that the soldiers were to bite the bullets off their cartridges, and retain them in their mouths; but one of them, a raw country lad, dismayed by the crowd of people, had lost his presence of mind, and failed to carry out his orders. He had loaded with the bullet, and in the discharge had killed the actress. Just before her death, which is touchingly described, she entrusts her little daughter to her husband, and with her last breath makes him promise to place her with some respectable family, and separate her from the stage. Herr Hellwig, a wealthy citizen, undertakes the charge, and takes the child to his home. Hellwig is a warm-hearted, weak man; but unfortunately for the heroine of the piece, he has a wife—a stony, cruel, Calvinistic woman. She will have nothing to do with "a play-actor's brat." She will not suffer her house, which she has kept as a temple of the Lord, to be polluted by "the child of a lost woman, who has been so visibly punished by the wrath of the Lord." Her two sons, grim little paragons of puritanical virtue, and a sour female servant called Fredrica, support her. But Hellwig is firm, and Felicitas D'Orlowsky—"little Fae," as she is called—a bright, guileless, sunny little soul, is duly installed in this, to her, hideously incongruous household. Her life is very miserable, but it is bearable till Hellwig dies. Then she is in despair; but the Old Maid here comes upon the scene, and throws from time to time a gleam of sunshine—of an afternoon or evening sunshine—upon her dismal little life. She is Hellwig's aunt, and for some time after his marriage she had lived in the family. But she had one failing; she was an enthusiastic lover of music, and as Fredrica expressed it, "she never could be prevented from playing on Sunday afternoons profane melodies and unholy music." The mistress had put heaven and hell before her eyes, but all was no use. . . . Mr. Hellwig had yielded to the will of his wife, and the old maid was banished up to the top rooms of the back house." She and little Fae became great friends. But all intercourse between them is prohibited, and has to be carried on in secret. Fae is kept as a menial in the house; but, in spite of much hardship and misery, she grows up a beautiful, high-spirited, noble-hearted girl, and through the secret interviews with Old Mamsell she becomes educated and highly cultivated. Such a life as this is of necessity monotonous. There is little or no incident to relate, but the interest is kept up by the occasional glimpses given into the life of the Old Maid, and the gradual working out of the central idea of the book. She is supposed to have formed something like a mésalliance with a shoemaker's son, and to have been the cause of the death of her father. Her secret, which has very little to do with the story, is the refutation of these calumnies. What that secret is we leave untold. The reader will be satisfied with the dénouement, and with the ultimate destiny of little Fae.

It is hardly fair to apply the same standard of criticism to a German that one may apply to a French or an English novel. The authors of the three countries seem to look on the object of fiction from widely different points of view. A German novelist, speaking generally, devotes himself to the development of ideas, and makes his characters subservient to his scheme. A French writer occupies himself in analysing passion, and an English writer in delineating character. To each therefore a different standard of criticism is applicable. You cannot compare Balzac with Thackeray, and say, for instance, that Beatrix Esmond is a more truthful creation than Julie d'Aiglemont. The one is a study of character from the objective side, the other a sort of hermetically sealed bottle in which the various shades of the passion of love are enclosed, and from which they are brought out one by one to be subjected to chemical tests and made the subject of a psycho-physiological lecture. So with the book before us. It does not do it justice to compare it with, for instance, a novel by Miss Yonge or Mrs. Craik. The object of the book is the exposure of the true character of a sour puritanical sanctimoniousness. The different actors are grouped round this idea, and made each in their own way to contribute to its development. Madame Hellwig is the embodiment of the idea, and Fredrica the cook, and Adèle the worldly widow, are each, as weaker vessels, the reflection of the idea in a subdued form. John commences life under the same influence, but being a stronger man than his father, who for the sake of peace yielded to his wife, he emancipates himself, and under Fae's bright guidance rises to a totally different level from that of his family. The opposing elements are the Old Maid and Felicitas. The lives of both are made wretched by the predominating cant; but while the one escapes from the influence of it by practical banishment for life, the other fights on with youth and strength on her side and comes out of the struggle victoriously. For, with a true sense of poetical justice, the author in the end turns the tables on the hard, stony-hearted Madame Hellwig, and shows how enlightenment and truthfulness of character gain the day over the sour hypocrisy of an austere Calvinism.

At the same time, looked at even as a channel for exhibiting studies of character, the book is by no means despicable. Felicitas D'Orlowsky is drawn from a higher platform than the ordinary young lady of English fiction. The author has put out her whole strength upon this character, and has succeeded. At first she recalls the charming heroine of a recently published English novel, My Little Lady. But the latter was well drawn only in her childish days, when she was wandering about the gambling-tables at Spa. As a young lady she became vapid and ultra-commonplace. "Little Fae" improves as she grows older, and the delineation of her character as child, girl, and woman is above the average. The other characters are less successful as characters, though good enough as media for the development of ideas. Hellwig, so far as he goes, and Henry, the man-servant, are both fairly done. But Madame Hellwig is over-drawn and unnatural; John, though a good specimen of a woman's conception of a hard, stern character, could not exist in real life, and Old Mamsell is too sketchy to leave any clear impression on the mind.

One word as to the merits of the translation. It might be better, and it might be worse. The translator has reproduced the spirit of the original, but the style of translation is more German than English. Expressions occur throughout the book which would not be used by a practised writer, particularly by a practised male writer. No one familiar with the modern theory of translation, in accordance with which foreign or classical ideas and scenes are transformed into English ideas and scenes, would have permitted the young ladies of the drama to make long abstract speeches at each other and at their lovers. This may be German idiomatic writing, but it is not English. Nor would they allow them to take in vain the name of the Deity in the free and easy way they do. A German lady may use the words "Mein Gott!" much as an English housemaid says "Lor!" or a Frenchwoman "Mon Dieu!" But an English lady would not make use of the equivalent given by the translator unless under very exceptional emotion. She certainly would not say "My God! how careless she is," when she complains, as Adèle does, of a stupid housemaid. The title again is misleading. It is "the secret of Old Mansell," not "the secret of an old maid." The word "old maid" suggests ideas inconsistent with the purpose of the author. They suggest the German counterpart of the French "vieille fille," which is not at all what is intended. The fact of Mansell being or not being an old maid has nothing to do with her secret. But, taking these slight blemishes into consideration, the public have reason to be grateful to "H. J. O." for giving them in an English dress, and in a convenient form, this interesting story, which possibly may call for almost as many editions in this country as it has already done in Germany.

MINOR POETS.

ON reading some of Mr. James Ballantyne's shorter poems, which are almost all in the Scottish dialect, it has occurred to us that some of our Southern bards would do well if they could each enter into a kind of poetical partnership with a Scotchman. Just as ivy disguises a plain building, and moss a rotten stump, so does the Scottish dialect, to the eyes and ears of all at least who are born on this side the Tweed, disguise prose. When "so" is written "sae," and "from" "frae," when "down" is "doun," and "must" is "maun"; when the "mavis" sings and the "cushat" is cooing, it requires all the sagacity of a practised critic to detect the imposture, and to find out how commonplace are the thoughts that are hidden under one of the finest of all dialects. Would even Mr. Ballantyne, for instance, have ventured to publish such a verse as the following, unless he had first carefully concealed the absence of thought by the Scotch words?—

Oh, you aye mak' the night
Sparkle, jew'led in glory,
Shining aye sae bright,
Wha but maun adore ye?

It may be objected that the Scotch, for whom no doubt he chiefly writes, will not be deceived by their own dialect. But we must remember that the Scotch are above all others a patriotic people, and are ready to swallow, and at the same time swear they like, not only Scotch oatmeal, but also Scotch poetry. Then, too, though they talk Scotch, they read for the most part only English, and so even their eyes may derive some pleasure from their dialect when printed, and may beal so somewhat deceived by it. Such being the case, why should not some of our own minor poets hire a Scotchman to put their poems into a Scottish dress, just as cockney sportsmen when going to shoot in the Highlands employ a Scotch tailor to convert them into Highlanders? The disguise would be found to be as complete and as advantageous in the one case as the other.

Mr. Ballantyne, besides his shorter poems, has written an historical play in three acts. It may be looked upon as a kind of continuation of Macbeth, representing as it does an incident in the life of Malcolm Canmore, the son of Duncan King of Scotland. The reader is kept in the best of companies; for, with the exception of a Saxon clown and a Scottish peasant, the only characters who are not of royal birth are the Steward of Scotland, a Saxon Commander, a Norman Commander, a Highland Chieftain, and a Caledonian Druid. We have Edgar Atheling, who is described as "the Saxon heir to the English throne," but who, for all we can see, might just as well be described as "the English heir to the Saxon throne." His sister Margaret, if she were not a Saxon heiress, we should have mistaken for an English Quakeress, so closely do her sentiments correspond with those of the Peace Society. When her mother urges Edgar to fight against Harold, Margaret makes such a peaceful speech that Edgar in admiration thus breaks in upon her:—

Such sentiments become a sex, dear sister,
Whose gentle patience triumphs o'er misfortune,
And teaches men the virtue of endurance.
Yet would I fain enforce my mother's claims,
And thus, dear sister, for the love you bear me,
But may not raise a lance against King Harold.

Meanwhile there enters "a messenger from a journey," together with "numbers of poetry in the background shouting, 'Hail, King Edgar!' The messenger comes from William, who, as he says, 'desires to hail thee, Edgar, King of England.' Happily at the same moment there enters a Saxon clown, who, though the messenger at once calls him a 'muzzling knave,' and Edgar's mother bids him 'hold thy impious tongue in presence of a prince's messenger,' yet, by singing obscenely about wolf's shaps, lambkins, and the carrion crow, raises a certain amount of suspicion in the mind of 'the Saxon heir.' While matters are still in suspense, and it is yet doubtful whether Duke William's plan may not succeed, there happily 'enter as from a journey Gospatrick and followers; they make obeisance to Edgar,' and then Gospatrick, catching sight of the messenger, thus falls foul of him:—

Vile knave, thy subtle slippery tongue hath lepped
The crimson blood of twice ten thousand Saxons, Whose spirits cry aloud to Heaven for vengeance.

The messenger apparently, unlike the reader, seems to understand what "this Saxon Commander" means, and wisely enough "begins to turn away." He is too late however, for Gospatrick cries out to an attendant:—

Secure this smooth-faced villain
Within the castle's deepest dungeon keep.

After a brief historical conversation Edgar, announcing his intention of going to Scotland, thus urges haste upon his mother and sister:—

Then haste, dear mother
And sister; get thy travelling-gear prepared
With all despatch.

Of course, if Edgar had not been anxious to show that he knew his was talking poetry, he would, as he was addressing his mother and sister, have said "your travelling-gear." But, just as in conversation we never use "thy," even when addressing one person, so in dramatic poetry the characters never use "you," even when addressing many. Want of space keeps us from describing the grand plot in the Grampian Mountains of the Highland chieftains. It is interesting, as showing that at this early period "the chieftains of free Caledonia" were so far civilized as to talk very much like the characters in a melodrama at an English, or we ought perhaps to say, a Saxon, country fair. One of them, addressing a Lowland peasant, thus cries out:—

Avant, hae lowland aeri! The mountain Gael
Holds no communion with thy servile race;
Nor dar'st thou look upon the sunward flights
Of the proud eagles of the stormy North,
Where Freedom's star shines with resplendent light.

Even if the Highland gentleman had talked sense, and had left the sun, and the storm, and the star alone, the baso Lowland aeri would scarcely have understood him, as there does not seem to have been any interpreter present. Ancient Pistol, of whom Mr. Ballantyne's chieftains would seem to have formed their style, on a somewhat similar occasion took a boy with him to "expound." But even the boy was not a good enough French scholar "to discuss in French" all that was said, and we doubt if the first of Gaelic scholars would have been able to "discuss" all this "mountain Gael's" speech.

Mr. Smith, the author of Village Life and Sketches, finding, we suppose, like many another writer, that his versification meets with no attention, complains of "this prosaic age of politics and business," though happily he himself can boast of friends "who are known to possess some poetical taste." If he is not appreciated here on this our planet, which, as he tells us, "is dimly visible in the firmament of Heaven," we trust that in his "Helicon" he may be welcomed among "the immortal souls of the poets." We would remark by the way that the immortal souls seem to choose their associates rather to suit the convenience of Mr. Smith's lines than from any similarity of tastes. We should have scarcely expected to find Dr. Watts next to Prior, nor "Scotland's Mary" separated only by Mrs. Opie from the spot where

Thou, Taylor, Howe, and Hannah More,
With myriads who had gone before.

Surely Mr. Smith, when it is time for him to enter "the sacred seat of the Muses," will only have to quote the following verses from his poem entitled "The Emigrant's Farewell," when he will at once gain admittance as a true poet, and a seat somewhere near to Hannah More:—

From the prairie wild and rude,
Where the hostile tribes are lying;
From some dark and dreary wood,
Where the fierce hyena's cry ring:
Shall we oft look back to thee,
Father-land of many nations,
As we sit beneath the tree,
Thinking of our dear relations.

Those among us who are possessed with the idea that we are descendants of the Ancient Britons, and take almost a personal interest in Cæsar's invasions of our island, will perhaps venture to read Mr. Kenilsh's poem. It is as long as Cæsar's invasions were short, and as dull as his narrative is interesting. At the same time we must admit that it is original, and is very far from being, as we at first suspected, a mythical relation of the history of the expeditions to Britain. We have the story told from the British point of view, and if the various speakers, "Druid and Bard and Warrior Chief," are beyond measure long-winded, it is satisfactory to know that they could fight as well they could talk, and gave Cæsar such a beating that the poem can thus be brought to a triumphant end:—

He therefore, with what haste he might,
Kept on his journey through the night;
And, forced against his will to flee,
Led back his army to the sea.
The march was long; but, without stay,
He reached his ships the following day.
Then, at the second watch, with all
His force embarking, sped to Gaul.

This defeat had of course been mainly brought about by the war-chariots, which went—

Sweeping the plain, in circle vast
And formidable, hooking the flanks.

We can fully sympathize with the poet in his wish that, while such a novel military operation was going on as this "hooking the flanks," science could,

at that awful hour,
Have given to aeronaut the power,
Secure, as now, to range the skies,
Where dart, nor fiercer shaft may rise.

We only wonder that he does not add the wish that with the aeronaut there might have been some Special Correspondent well disposed to the British side. Mr. Kentish, in describing a sunrise, talks of

The still-accumulating tides
Of fluid glory.

As we look upon his book and the other minor poets who are gathering thickly round us, we feel inclined to change two words in his line, and in despair to lament over

The still-accumulating tides
Of fluent nonsense.

Mr. Lewes, the author of St. Cross, is so far familiar with Horace that he can quote from the Ars Poetica:—

Pictoribus atque Poetis
Quidlibet audenti semper fuit æqua potestas.

Convinced of the truth of this, he ventures to make "dawn" rhyme with "warri," and to call such lines as the following a sonnet:—

With Wapping Sailors did the painter find Companions coarse, congenial to his mind;
And Northern Farmers see the poet please,
Of transcendentalism antipodes.

We hope that if the Board of Trade ever takes courage to try to reach traders who palm off all kinds of rubbish as sound wares, the poets may not escape who, at the head of their doggerel, write sonnet or ode, and, without having gone to the expense of purchasing a rhyming dictionary, yet venture to deal in rhymes.

Anster Fair, though it is only a republication, has a merit and an interest of its own. Its author, the crippled son of a small merchant and farmer in Scotland, by his own industry and ability, and by the help of an excellent parish school, first gained a "small but seasonable preferment" for himself as a village schoolmaster, with a salary of no less than forty pounds a year, and next "the chair of Oriental languages" in St. Mary's College, St. Andrew's. We are not informed as to the emoluments of the latter post, but as his salary as schoolmaster had for a great number of years been more than equal to his wants, we can picture him to ourselves in the decline of his life—when we consider, in addition to his high emoluments, his knowledge, his power of expressing himself, his reputation, and his sound health—as frequently applying to himself Horace's lines, and saying:—

Quid voveat dulci nutrimenta majus alumno,
Qui sapere et fari possit quæ sentiat, et cui
Gratia, fama, valetudo contingat abunde,
Et mundus victus, non deficiente crumena?

While he was still village schoolmaster he published Anster Fair. It attracted Jeffrey's attention, and was favourably reviewed in the forty-seventh number of the Edinburgh Review. In the memoir of Tennant prefixed to this little volume is given the following extract from Jeffrey's review:—

Perhaps we have detained our English readers too long with our two tuncful countrymen—referring also to Hogg's Queen's Wake, which was reviewed at the same time. They have neither of them, we confess, the pathos and simplicity of Burns, or the energy and splendour of Scott, but they appear to be persons of promise; and, at all events, to be singly worth a whole cagel of ordinary songsters from the Colleges and cities of the South. We leave them now to their fate, and if they do not turn out well, we engage to be more cautious in giving out words of good augury for the future.

It is curious if, as we are informed in a foot-note, there is a bit at Byron in the passage about "the Colleges and cities of the South." For it was 1814 when this notice appeared in the Edinburgh, and by that time Byron had written not only his English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, but also the first two cantos of Childe Harold, and three or four more of his finest poems. Whatever merits Anster Fair may have had, however sore Jeffrey may have still felt, and however good a Scotchman he may have been, we should have scarcely thought that he would have ventured thus to challenge comparison between Tennant and Byron. Anster Fair, as far as the plot of it is concerned, is not unlike the old ballad of the Tournament of Tottentham. The hand of the beauty of a country district "is held out as the reward of the victor in an ass race, and a match of running in packs; a competition of beggining and of glory, falling."

There is a good deal of quiet humour in the way in which the story is told, of which the following stanzas are a fair specimen:—

So started, as the herald gave the blast,
At once the sailors in their socks away,
With gallant upspring, notable and vast,
A neck-endang'ring violent assay;
The solid earth, as up to sky they past,
Push'd back, seem'd to retire a little way,
And, as they up-flew furious from the ground,
The gash'd and wounded air whizzed audibly a sound.
As when on summer eve a soaking rain
Hath after drought bedrench'd the tender grass,
If chance, in pleasant walk along the plain,
Brush'ing with foot the pearl-hung blades you pass,
A troop of frogs off leaps from field of grain,
Marshall'd in line, a foul unseemly race,
They halt a space, then vaulting up they fly,
As if they long'd to sit on Jhr's bow on high.

We should think that publishers would find a much more profitable trade in reproducing poems like this one before us, which, though not of the highest excellence, have yet merits of their own, than in bringing forth poems which, if new, are nevertheless utterly worthless.

MR. DISRAELI AT MANCHESTER.

THE visit of Mr. DISRAELI to Manchester has been a very great success. Even their bitterest opponents own that the Conservatives can organize well, and the fruits of a long-extended and carefully-studied organization were apparent in the repetition of the chief of the party. Popular enthusiasm, the splendour of rank, the fashion of the hour, the solid support of the upper classes, the generous liking of the multitude for a man who has fought his way to the top of the tree in the face of many of the greatest obstacles that ever barred the path of an English politician, all combined to do honour to the guest of Lancashire. Had the Conservatives not been well organized, the demonstration could not have been attempted, but if there had been nothing more than Conservative organization to command success, such success as was achieved could never have been obtained. It is not difficult to understand how those classes which live somewhat in the political world should have been attracted by Mr. DISRAELI's coming. They have been so disgusted by the innumerable blunders of the present Ministry, by the arrogance of its leader, and by the gross incompetence of some of his minor colleagues, that they might not unreasonably feel delighted at the thought of encountering a statesman whose blunders, if many, are not recent. They may also have naturally wished to show their sympathy with a public man who has never been tame or commonplace, whose audacity is unrivalled, and who can always speak so as to give his hearers a little to think over and much to remember. But it is impossible to attribute the success of Mr. DISRAELI's visit to the mere irritation or admiration of politicians. His triumph was as much a popular triumph as any ever accorded to Mr. GLADSTONE or Mr. BRIGHT. Real working-men applauded, beset, and shouted for the hero of the hour. How this happened in Manchester, which was once thought the centre of Liberalism, may be accounted for in many different ways, although there is always something more in popular events than can be traced to precise causes. In part, no doubt, Mr. DISRAELI was reaping the reward due to him for having, in the teeth of the party now bent on honouring him, carried the Reform Bill of 1867. He gave the people their votes, and the first consequence was that he was ousted from power. Now that his opponents have had their spoil, and have done very little for the English poor, and are halting in the way, using big phrases but seeming afraid of their own shadows, the people ask whether Mr. DISRAELI ought not to have his turn. The unknown is always magnificent to the infant politician, and it may seem to poor men as if the leader who dished the Wings and educated the Tories might, if he were allowed a chance, do wonderful things for them. Calm judges may acknowledge that Mr. GLADSTONE had much to say on his side when he argued, as a few months ago he was so fond of arguing, that with such measures on his hand as the Irish Church and Land Bills, and the scheme for abolishing Purchase, he could not be expected to give much attention to ordinary English matters; but people who go to Manchester with orange and blue banners, and draw carriages through the streets, are not apt to be calm judges, and it is not very wonderful that they should see in Mr. DISRAELI the author of the last Reform Bill and the possible benefactor of the poor. Possibly, too, the secret of Mr. DISRAELI's success may have been of a more general character. He unites two very powerful characteristics which are very rarely conjoined. He is, on the one hand, a man speaking alone, isolated; keeping himself free of all parties, and even of a party that long ago he left, with no political affiliations or connexion to his name, and no personal interest of any kind in the cause that he has chosen to support, which is the worst of all causes. He is not a member of any nities; he keeps the House of Commons up to its higher level; he can be reserved and reticent when prudence commands; he thoroughly understands the conduct of an Opposition. In whatever light the matter is looked at, it may be fairly said that Mr. DISRAELI has earned the honours now vouchsafed to him; and those who see nothing in his political philosophy to enlighten them, or in his present opinions to serve them as a guide to the future, may cheerfully acknowledge that, if the Lancashire populace chose to be enthusiastic about him, it had at least as good grounds for its enthusiasm as ordinarily justify the excitement of the hour.

But when we pass from Mr. DISRAELI's reception to his speech, we feel that we have got back to the public speaker on whom much adverse criticism has been so often and so justly bestowed. We find ourselves in a region of disguised platitudes, of half-reasoning, of sentiment that will not bear discussion. He stated that he had not come to make a party speech, and the greater part of what he said was a panegyric on the English Constitution. It is easy to praise the QUEEN, the Lords, and the Church, for at this moment no one of any importance seriously thinks of attacking any of the three. But what was wanted was praise founded on just grounds, and a defence that would endure investigation. Mr. DISRAELI so praised the Crown and the Lords as to inspire more doubts than he allayed. The two grounds he selected for admiration of the Crown were, that the Sovereign by long experience controls and aids the counsels of Ministers, and that English monarchy is a cheap form of government. It is quite true that the QUEEN has had long experience, is an excellent woman of business, and can very often help those whom she is consulting, although one of her very first merits is that she has loyally followed the advice of the leaders of different parties in succession. But the worst of praising an institution for a temporary and occasional excellence is that, if this particular excellence is withdrawn, the institution itself may be unjustly despised. Mr. DISRAELI, with a reliance on an ignorance of history in his hearers which no doubt a long experience of masses of Englishmen amply justified, appealed for an illustration of his theory to the memory of GEORGE III. No appeal could have been more unfortunate than that to the memory of a prince who certainly reigned long enough, but who, after thwarting the policy of the ablest of his Ministers, was nearly or wholly imbecile for almost twenty years. What aid to his Ministers was derived from the apathy of a selfish recluse like GEORGE IV., or from the boisterous frolics of his successor? No English King has really aided his Ministers since WILLIAM III., with the exception of GEORGE III. at the beginning of Pitt's Ministry, and the conduct of both reigns would at the present day be considered monstrous. As for the cheapness of monarchy, personal monarchy is not a cheap one, and that is all that Mr. DISRAELI means. The expense of our monarch is often performed gratis, and it is an important duty to undertake. This is an unhappy time at which to do so. It is of course undeniable that the Duke of GREECE for drawing up the Washington Treaty, and that the country so far got on. A Republican critics might reply that, if money had been bestowed on the Duke of GREECE, he might have paid many thousand pounds to a man content to look after the interests of England. With regard to the House of Lords, Mr. DISRAELI made an observation which has much truth in it, that hereditary peers are less likely to be hopelessly obstructive and to set themselves against the body of the people than peers might be whose peerage was only for life and who had only themselves to think of. But it is difficult to find any solid ground in his general dissertation on the position of the House of Lords. He said that under every form of government a Second Chamber is necessary, but that there can be no Second Chamber worth having except one like the House of Lords, and that to have a House of Lords is a special English privilege. This is a most melancholy view of human affairs, and as the wits of the rest of mankind must now be set to work, by the instinct of self-preservation, to see how life can be carried on without an institution that cannot be created or imitated, something may be discovered which will lead England to suspect that its privilege, though fortunate, is not absolutely essential. Mr. DISRAELI also referred, with the satisfaction he has often betrayed, to the days when the House of Lords was under the guidance of Lord LYNDRUST. There could not be a greater mistake than for any well-wisher of the House of Lords to seek to renew the days of Lord LYNDRUST. The House of Lords under the guidance of Lord LYNDRUST was simply a slaughter-house of all measures of a Liberal Administration, not because they were bad, but because to allow them to pass would tend to the glory of the Whigs. It is precisely so far as the House of Lords has emancipated itself from the pernicious counsels and unwholesome influences which then prevailed that it has regained the confidence and respect of the country.

Mr. DISRAELI devoted the greater part of his speech to a disquisition on the Constitution; he attacked the Government with considerable energy and success for some of its recent blunders; he ventured on some extraordinary statements as to the foreign policy of the country; he strove to show that the condition of the agricultural labourer had greatly improved, accounting for low wages in Dorsetshire by the ancient participation of farmers and labourers in smuggling, and standing up, in a manner which in the leader of the agricultural interest was highly creditable, for the right of labourers to strike for wages so long as they keep themselves clear of professional agitators. But he had scarcely a word to say which could guide Conservatives on any of the questions of the day. The only Ministerial measure of the Session which is supposed to be part of the real Liberal programme is the Ballot Bill. At the beginning of the Session Mr. DISRAELI announced that he would give the Ballot Bill his most unflinching opposition; but he was absent on the occasion of the second reading, and he had not a word to say about the Ballot at Manchester. Here was a measure now pending before Parliament which he had pronounced to be most disastrous, retrograde, and uncalled for, and yet, speaking in the name of his party and delivering its programme, he had not a word to say about it one way or the other. He attacked the treatment of the army by the Liberals on the ground that they had concentrated the army in England, were going largely to increase it, and wished to place it under scientific officers unconnected with territorial influences, and that thus England was menaced by all the dangers which she used to dread from a standing army. If grounds of opposition so serious are to be considered to be those on which the Conservative party seeks to stand, they certainly ought to have been stated last year when the abolition of Purchase was under discussion. At this moment Mr. CARDWELL is seeking largely to increase the number of the standing army, and to disperse it over England. If the localization of the army dissipates the dangers which Mr. DISRAELI apprehends, he ought to have owned that so far his fears are removed. If the localization of the army places each locality at the mercy of a portion of the standing army and its scientific officers, what is a leader of Conservatives and Constitutionists for unless he exposes and attempts to defeat the whole scheme? As to finance, again, Mr. DISRAELI was wholly silent. He may not as yet perhaps be prepared to decide whether his party should court popularity by advocating reduced expenditure or increased armaments. But in all his political novels he insisted over and over again on the great injury inflicted on England by indirect taxation, and he upheld direct taxation as the great key to national prosperity. The Ministry propose to devote almost the whole surplus of the present year to lessening direct taxation, and yet the author of romances in which the exaction of ship-money is defended as a splendid triumph of the great principles of direct taxation has not a word to say against the Budget. Conservatives may take a pride, which in a measure is perfectly legitimate, in Mr. DISRAELI; they may wave their ensigns and blue banners over his head.

they may delight to learn from his speeches the true defenders of a cheap Sovereign and an House of Lords; they may be fascinated by his courtesy and his epigrammatic paradoxes; but they should keep as quiet as he may bid them while of office, and be educated by him as much as they can while he is in power.

THE DUTCH TERCENTENARY.

IF centenaries or tercentenaries are in any case celebrated, the people of Holland have an excellent reason for holding a festival in the present year. In proportion to numbers and their natural resources the Dutch have the glorious history of any European State; nor is any reign so famous, with the exception of that of Hohenzollern, so entirely identified as the House of ORANGE with the national history. The consolidation of the great military Powers of the Continent has unfortunately overshadowed and reduced to comparative inaction all the smaller States, nor would it be possible for a WILLIAM the SILENT or a WILLIAM III. to withstand in modern warfare the enormous armies of France or of Germany. There is also a grave disadvantage in the use of a language which is only spoken by a population of three millions, and which is seldom acquired by foreigners; yet the reduced Kingdom of the Netherlands continues to maintain its independence, to increase its accumulation of wealth, and to administer a large Colonial Empire. The troubles which it shares with more powerful communities still bear a close analogy to the causes of the original rising against the persecuting despotism of PHILIP II. The Roman Catholics, forming a third of the population, are subjected to the baneful influence of clerical agitators, who in Holland, as elsewhere, prefer spiritual allegiance to secular loyalty. The remoter apprehension of the ambitious projects which are sometimes attributed to Germany is probably unfounded. The Low German of the Netherlands is perhaps as nearly related to the language of Brandenburg and of Saxony as the Czechish dialect to the Russian; but philology and ethnology are studied in German Universities as branches of learning, and not as instruments of political intrigue. For the sake of commerce and of friendly intercourse it is wholly unnecessary that Amsterdam should be subject to the same government with Berlin. It is a lasting subject of regret that at two different historical epochs the whole of the Low Countries failed to effect or to retain the union which would have afforded the best security for their greatness and independence. Religious differences detached Flanders and Brabant from the league against Spain, and political errors combined with ecclesiastical squabbles to dissolve in 1830 the united kingdom which had been founded by the wisdom of statesmen after the fall of NAPOLEON. There is reason to hope that, although Belgium will never again be amalgamated with Holland, both nations are inclined to cultivate the alliance which is dictated by their common interests.

If the modern fashion of historical anniversaries had prevailed two hundred years ago, the first centenary of Dutch independence could not have been conveniently celebrated in 1672. The year was the most disastrous in the annals of the United Commonwealth, including the most successful of Louis XIV.'s invasions, the bought alliance of CHARLES II. with France against Holland, and the murder of the DE WITTS. It could not at the time have been foreseen that the young heir of the House of ORANGE would succeed to the task of his ancestors and of his rivals, and that he would devote his life to the defence of European liberty and independence against the French monarch and his English vassals. It was after the fall of the DE WITTS that WILLIAM III. became Stadtholder, and that he undertook the conduct of the war. When a second century had elapsed, the Dutch had almost entirely withdrawn from an active share in the conduct of European affairs; and their internal harmony was disturbed by French intrigues with the democratic party against the power of the House of ORANGE and the influence of England. The insults offered by the French faction to the Princess of ORANGE, and the consequent intervention of Prussia, were among the latest transactions which preceded the outbreak of the French Revolution. Immediately afterwards the divided nation was conquered and annexed, under different names, to the French Republic and to the Empire. On the liberation of Europe the Stadtholder became a constitutional King; and notwithstanding the separation of Belgium from the monarchy, Holland has since been contented and that to commemorate the rising against Spain by the erection of a monument in which a sea nymph appropriately symbolised the United Commonwealth, or independence, or perhaps civil and religious liberty; and it was highly fitting that the King should be invited to take a part in the ceremony of opening the monument, and that the most popular speaker of the day should recall the memory of the national exploits in suitable oration. In a country which has produced an admired school of painting there were not wanting artists to devise historical decorations in accordance with the instructions of native scholars. Amongst the attendants was the American historian who, more than any other writer, has contributed to the fame of the early heroes of the Commonwealth. Mr. Motley's History of the Dutch Republic, in spite of many defects of style, will form a more lasting record of the glories of Holland than even the water nymph of Rotterdam.

It may be hoped that the temporary excitement which was caused by the late treaty with England has already subsided. The transfer of the settlements on the Gold Coast will probably be found as convenient to both parties as the similar arrangement which is frequently effected between private owners who happen to possess either undivided moieties of one parcel of land, or adjacent strips of property which are inconveniently intermixed. The negro tribes in the neighbourhood will no longer be divided into Dutch and English parties, nor will they hope for allies and patrons in the conduct of their intestine feuds. The police of the land and sea will be more cheaply and more effectively managed, and Dutch traders will retain full right of access to the local markets. As the purchasing Government had neither the will nor the power to put any pressure on the vendors, the large majority in the Parliament of the Hague which approved of the transfer probably represented the general opinion. In all respects it would seem that the condition of the country ought to be regarded with complacency and satisfaction. If money is the index of national prosperity, the Dutch are probably the greatest people in the world, surpassing, in proportion to their numbers, either the English or the Americans. Their colonial administration, though it is not unreservedly approved by foreign observers, is, after its own manner, eminently successful, as it is deliberately systematic. If any English dependency were governed like Java, Parliament would probably be unable to resist the remonstrances of economists and Liberal politicians. A paternal Government, producing a large revenue to the parental Exchequer, approves itself to the practical judgment of the Dutch. Their colonial receipts relieve the heavy burden of the national debt, and, if the natives of the island are subjected to restrictions for the benefit of the mother-country, their condition is tolerably comfortable. General trade flourishes, and the Dutch manners are as bold and as skilful as their predecessors who assumed the title of Water Beggars. The area of the limited territory of the kingdom is still from time to time artificially enlarged, as in the early days when, according to the involuntary compliment of the satirist, they—with mad labour sold the land to shore.

In Holland, as in other parts of the world, the adherents of the Ultramontane clergy delight to announce that they are Catholics before they are patriots and before they are men. The preparations for the festival were interrupted by disturbances at the Hague, and in some other parts of the country. English fanatics of the same wrongheaded sect have been known to lament the failure of the righteous enterprise of the Spanish Armada; and it seems that the priests of the Hague persuaded the carpenters that it would be a sin to celebrate the resistance of their forefathers to the murderous persecutions of A.S.V.A. The supporters of the Papacy sometimes affect to sympathise with political freedom, even when they most earnestly advocate the establishment of religious uniformity; but the more violent section of the party confidently maintains the doctrines which are deduced in Pius IX.'s Syllabus from the precedents of former ages. In obedience to the Pope, they hold that resistance to orthodox kings can in no circumstances be justifiable, and that the suppression of heresy by fire and sword is both a right and a duty. The promoters of the sesquicentenary festival are not necessarily more hostile than Bismarck himself to Roman Catholic tenets when they renew the protest of their ancestors against the Spanish exactions and massacres of three hundred years ago. Their opponents must be understood to approve, not only of the practices of the Inquisition, but of the execution by PHILIP II. of assassins for the destruction of WILLIAM OF ORANGE. The bigots are content to remember their share in all the historical associations of the Commonwealth; and, if they are consistent, they regret that the Netherlands were not throughout the seventeenth century a remote dependency of the decrepit monarchy of Spain. In Holland, as in Belgium, the introduction of a sectarian element into political controversy has largely affected the significance of party designations. The Conservatives of the Low Countries, relying on the ignorance of the poorer parts of the community, favour a wide extension of the suffrage, while the Liberals defend the supremacy of intelligence, education, and property. The communists and anarchists who are to be found in Holland, as in the neighbouring countries, perhaps hate the clergy more than the owners of property; but this loyalty in all its varied forms has a common quality. Whether the Pope is prudent in declaring war on all established Governments because they have refused to defend his temporal power, is a question to which the events of the next few years will return no uncertain answer.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE OPPOSITION.

THE misfortunes and the mistakes of the Government have been so innumerable that it was natural to anticipate that Mr. DISRAELI would have a splendid field for the exercise of his powers when, towards the close of his speech at Manchester, he applied himself to a hostile criticism of the conduct of Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues. But he made very little use of his opportunity. He was captious, unfair, and paradoxical. A great part of his remarks was devoted to an attempt to prove that the Crimean war, the failure of the attempt to settle the Alabama difficulty, and the concessions recently made to Russia, were solely caused by the Conservatives not having been in office. His main argument was, that foreign Powers know that the Conservative party is always firm, and always ready to go to war, and that therefore they do not venture to hope for concession from England when the party of courage is in power. What may be the hallucinations of foreign Powers it is difficult to say; but if the foreign Powers concerned had condescended to consult Englishmen, they would have learnt that the Conservatives have been for the last twenty years in a minority, so that they could not express or give effect to the real feelings of the country, and that as home they have been engaged in making a perpetual series of surrenders of their policy. Mr. DISRAELI now says that the Crimean war was a total mistake, and Mr. BRIGHT himself could not have lectured at Manchester with greater effect on the folly of a great and distant military operation. Either this is an afterthought, or, if these were really the opinions of the Conservatives in 1855, it is not easy to see how the Emperor NICHOLAS could have been frightened by them. Almost in the same breath Mr. DISRAELI declared that the results of the Crimean war were most valuable, and that England in the Black Sea Conference unanimously abandoned what she had earned by her military successes. The simple fact is, that England, although she would have been perfectly justified in going to war after Prince GORTCHAKOFF's despatch, did not feel willing to fight Russia without the assistance of France in order to prop up Turkey. To avoid war on this ground was perhaps the most prudent, but it can hardly be said to have been the most dignified and spirited course possible, and if Mr. DISRAELI thought we ought to have gone to war, why did he never say so? The Americans, according to Mr. DISRAELI, would have ratified the STANLEY-JOHNSTON Convention had they not seen that before the time came for its ratification the firm, courageous Derbyites were out of power, and the squeezable Gladstonites were in; and they therefore determined to get something much beyond what they had previously asked for. If Mr. DISRAELI could have foreseen that the Washington Treaty would declare England liable to be judged by rules of international law previously non-existent, he would have denounced it. When he actually found that to be the case, he never made any serious protest against it. The confidence of the country cannot be won by a statesman who in moments of difficulty keeps silent, lets things drift on, and then, when all is over, declares that if he had had the management of affairs everything would have gone well. Mr. DISRAELI has not even a general programme of the foreign policy of the country which can guide his party and influence the nation. He takes care to say that he is all for peace, and that England, with India on her hands, and the United States constantly threatening her, cannot take a prominent part in European politics. He wishes England to stand aloof, but to stand aloof from Europe in an attitude of proud reserve. Foreign Governments will, it may be imagined, be sharp enough to find out the meaning of the "proud reserve" as clearly as they have found out the meaning of the "moral influence" of England. Mr. DISRAELI's view of the true line of English statesmen seems to be, that when England is threatened she should show her pride by declaring herself ready to go to war, and her reserve by backing out when her words are taken in earnest. Such a policy must either end in wars we do not wish for, or in disgrace we do not deserve.

It was of course very easy for Mr. DISRAELI to find food for sarcasm or reproach in the conduct and language of particular Ministers. Mr. GLADSTONE's unguarded utterances and sentimental dalliings with all kinds of foolish people make him a target for attack that no shooter can miss. And although Mr. DISRAELI could not make much capital out of the Alabama negotiations, as they are still pending, he had a delightful opportunity of attacking the PREMIER for his delay in taking up the consideration of the American Case. No Minister has ever cut a worse figure than Mr. GLADSTONE did when he had to own that for weeks he chose to pay no attention whatever to a matter of primary importance to England, although every organ of public opinion was continually discussing it, and the Cabinet had had for a long time every necessary means of considering it. Mr. DISRAELI was quite right in exposing and condemning so flagrant an abandonment of an obvious duty on the part of the First Minister. But his little jokes about Mr. LOWE, his sneers at the proposal to tax the agricultural machinery of the farmer, at the treatment of the publican as if he were necessarily a sinner, and at the threat that the lonely heritage of the widow and orphan might be taxed, although in no case really undeserved, were trivial substitutions for some expression of the principles of Conservative finance, and for an intimation how the difficult but inevitable subject of a Licensing Bill is to be properly dealt with. Ireland gave rise to the taunts which Mr. DISRAELI is always ready to utter when Ireland is mentioned. Certainly Ireland is not a very bright subject for the Ministry to dwell on just now, but Mr. DISRAELI is never content to refer to recent history without perverting it. Justly taking credit for the discernment he had shown in appointing Lord MAYO, he asserted that Lord MAYO, by his exceptional vigour and skill, baffled the schemes of the Fenians, and that it was the opinion of Lord DERBY's Cabinet that Ireland needed rest and complete absence of all political excitement. Lord MAYO did nothing more than the Liberal Government had done towards suppressing insurrection in 1865, and it was Lord MAYO who set the ball of intense political excitement rolling by his famous declaration that the Government intended to adopt the policy of what is called levelling up. The consequence of this declaration was that Mr. DISRAELI and his colleagues had to quit office, and, as he says, they quitted it without a murmur. What could have been the good of murmuring with a majority of a hundred and twenty against them? The policy of their successors was "to despoil Churches and to plunder "landlords," and the result has been sedition, treason, and a cry for Home Rule. Lord DERBY spoke after Mr. DISRAELI had finished, and it was curious to contrast the manner in which the two leaders of the Conservative party handled this point of the relations of the Ministry to Ireland. Lord DERBY was studiously fair and moderate, and avowed his belief in the honesty of the Ministry when they said they were determined to resist the dismemberment of the Empire. Mr. DISRAELI would as soon have thought of owning this as Mr. WHALLEY would think of admitting that the POPE may be a good Christian. But Lord DERBY went on to say that he thought the Ministry would have some difficulty in reconciling the repression of the Home Rule movement with their axiom that Ireland should be governed according to Irish ideas. This was a piece of just and telling criticism. The Irish Church and Land Bills were valuable, not because they were in accordance with Irish ideas, but because, under the peculiar circumstances of the country, they were just in themselves. Had they not passed, it would have been painful, though necessary, to repress Irish ideas when they take the form of a proposed dismemberment of the Empire; but now that Ireland has nothing to complain of, there is no reason why it, more than Wales, or Scotland, or Lancashire itself, should be allowed to threaten England with secession.

Lord DERBY had much to say which Conservatives might listen to with satisfaction and profit. He has generally as much to teach Conservatives as Mr. DISRAELI has little, and in a few brief and pregnant sentences he defined the policy of his party. The triumph of that party is, he says, sure to come, and whether the triumph when it comes will be worth having will all depend on whether the Conservatives know how to wait. There are many discontented Liberals in the Ministerial ranks, and they might be very willing to coalesce with the Conservatives to defeat the Ministry. A Conservative Government would then be in office, but not in power, and the more extreme Liberals would endeavour first to wring out of a Conservative Government what the present Government would never concede, and then would endeavour to consolidate their party, and get their leaders to resume office on the basis of a general acceptance of principles from which moderate Liberals would now shrink. "This," said Lord DERBY, "is their game, and precisely for that reason it must not be ours." He will not consent to the Conservative party occupying again the position which it occupied during the years when Mr. DISRAELI rose to the summit of his fame, and passed that Reform Bill which has made Mr. DISRAELI the welcome guest of Lancashire working-men. There can be no doubt that Lord DERBY is right in saying that patience is the true policy of the Conservative party. But it will be curious to see what will be the effect of his very candid utterances on the Ministry and the Liberal party. There can be no doubt that it will add considerably to the strength of the Government that its most hostile critics should be aware that for the moment they are completely powerless. Discontented Liberals cannot do much harm to the Government unless the Conservatives will join them. If they are content to accept a comparatively humble position, the Ministry may easily go on safely for a time. They only need to adopt a policy of modest reserve, to avoid blunders, to be very watchful, to bring in half measures, to try to please everybody, to accept amendments thankfully, to promise to consider everything that any one has to say. They have already succeeded in obtaining somewhat of the position to which such a policy would lead them. Having extricated themselves from the most dangerous of their scrapes—from the COLLIER scandal, the Megara disaster, and the Alabama bungle—simply because there was no one to take their places, they have set themselves to work to see how they can avoid doing anything that will not be thought generally conciliatory. Mr. LOWE brought forward the most commonplace of Budgets in the tamest of speeches. There were no dark hints this time of impositions on farmers' horses, or on the lonely heritages of widows and orphans. The landed interest is not this year terrified by new schemes of local taxation, and the long-promised Bills for recasting a portion of the law of real property have died away. If the Scotch would only be kind enough to have some faint notion of what they want, they might have anything they fancied put into their Education Bill. The opposition to the Parks Bill has been disarmed by concessions which take away its sting in the opinion of every discontented Liberal except Mr. AUBERON HERBERT. Churchmen are conciliated by being told that the Government is going to be very firm about the Education Act this year, and Nonconformists are conciliated by being told that the Government is not sure but what it will not be quite so firm next year. Morally it is almost beautiful to see such men as the leaders of the Cabinet so changed. The sword of Mr. GLADSTONE is turned into a ploughshare, and the spear of Mr. LOWE into a pruning-hook. But politically it is beyond calculation how long this millennial state of things is likely to endure. All that can be said is that Conservatives like Lord DERBY are wise in thinking it for their interest that it should go on for some time longer if possible.

THE CHANCERY FUNDS BILL.

IN his financial statement Mr. LOWE called attention to the Court of Chancery Funds Bill, which has since been read a second time and will be passed without difficulty. The public object of the Bill is to extend the banking business of the Treasury, and, although there is no special provision for the purpose, to furnish means for the ultimate reduction of the National Debt. Incidentally the provisions which relate to investments and deposits will in many instances be advantageous to private holders of Chancery funds. Past and present suitors in Chancery have their satisfaction of contributing to a fund which, practically belonging to no special proprietor, is to a certain extent available for public objects. The Suitors Fund provides the subject matter of the prolonged controversy on the situation and architecture of the Law Courts; and it is now destined to facilitate the further creation of Terminable Annuities. The money which passes into and out of the custody of the Court of Chancery in its judicial and administrative capacity maintains an average or growing amount, like the stationary mist which is deposited by the air currents on the ridge of a hill. It was by the aid of this large balance that Mr. GLADSTONE formerly hoped to commence the process of reducing the interest of the National Debt to two and a half per cent. Mr. LOWE's less ambitious scheme will also be less profitable to the State; and there is no doubt that it can be effected. The whole of the fund, at present amounting to perhaps sixty millions, is to be transferred from the Attorney-General to the Paymaster-General, or, in other words, from the Court of Chancery to the Treasury. When investments have hitherto been made at the risk of the persons entitled to any funds, separate accounts have been kept of the securities. It is provided by the Bill that, with certain exceptions, all securities of any one description, and all money standing to the account of the Paymaster-General on behalf of the Court of Chancery, shall be taken to be one common and general sum of securities and money, and shall be promiscuously dealt with according to the orders of the Court. The Consolidated Fund will be liable to cover any deficiency, and, in consideration of the absolute security afforded by the public credit, the Treasury will deal at its discretion with any Chancery securities by converting them into other Government securities of equivalent value, which is a phrase signifying Terminable Annuities. It will also from time to time determine the amount of money, or of any special kind of security, which is to be retained for the purpose of meeting current demands. The money is to be held on deposit at a fixed interest of two per cent. payable to the owner.

That the nation, or the Government on its behalf, should dispose of its credit, as of any other possession, to the best advantage, is a perfectly legitimate operation. Two or three hundred years ago it could not have been foreseen that there was a direct profit to be derived from the manipulation of the public revenue, and still less from the contraction of debt; and any proposal for advancing trust funds to the Crown would have been regarded with just suspicion. In the eighteenth century, when England was the paradise of placemen, the office of Paymaster-General became the most lucrative of public employments. It was in this post that the first Lord HOLLAND acquired the great fortune to which he owed the unpopularity of his later years. Even at that time it was thought by purists that the interest on public balances properly belonged to the nation; and in later times the Paymaster, before the office was abolished or absorbed, was only entitled to a fixed salary. In the present day it is not the custom to make a profit on the Exchequer balances; but the Government has discovered more than one opportunity of turning its credit to account. The funds of the Savings Banks have already been converted into Terminable Annuities without any risk beyond the possibility that the demands for repayment of deposits may exceed the receipts. A similar operation will be effected with the Chancery balances, nor is it improbable that hereafter the same process may be applicable to other moneys which may be entrusted to the Government. At some distant period the business of life insurance may possibly be undertaken on a large scale by the State, which would have the advantage over private associations of not requiring a large accumulated reserve. Some future Chancellor of the Exchequer will perhaps find that when the Treasury has become a large banking establishment, the facilities for receipts and payments which are now afforded by the Bank of England may be more cheaply provided at home. One or two speakers in the late conversation on the Budget pointed out the anomaly of borrowing money at interest at one time of year, while large balances were allowed to be idle in the early spring. Banks are, like Insurance Offices, instituted for the purpose of rectifying the irregularities of private transactions. The owner of a large number of houses, or of a fleet of ships, saves the payment of premiums by becoming his own insurer, and great money-dealers are to some extent their own bankers.

The machinery of the Bill seems to be well adapted to the purpose of converting the property hitherto held by the Court of Chancery into a book account of the Treasury. All moneys which are not, in the judgment of the Paymaster-General, required for meeting current demands are to be lent by him to the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt, who are in return to pay to him any money which may be required beyond his reserved balance. If at any time the Commissioners have not money enough in their hands to meet payments under the Act, the Treasury may either direct them to convert securities into money, or may issue the necessary sum out of money applicable to the Sinking Fund, or out of the growing produce of the Consolidated Fund. As the Paymaster, the Commissioners, and the Treasury are really but so many names corresponding to various functions and attributes of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it may be hoped that their complicated internal transactions will be effected without embarrassment or difficulty. The principle of the scheme is that no fund or separate property shall be set-marked, and that the owners of Chancery securities or deposits shall be national creditors of funds or of money. As the funds under the control of the Court of Chancery are already invested in national securities, the State will be to a great extent both creditor and debtor. The only contingency in which there would be a large demand for repayment on the capital account would be the introduction of great changes in the law of inheritance. With a restriction of the power of creating limited estates in personality, the administrative jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery would be contracted in a corresponding degree, and the occasions of litigation would be also diminished. It is for the present unnecessary to anticipate a change which would render some new arrangement necessary. The State has fortunately the means of meeting any sudden demand by obtaining power from Parliament to create any stock which may be required for the purpose. A banker who cannot break follows one of the most satisfactory of pursuits.

It appears that a sum, of which the amount is not stated, now under the administration of the Court of Chancery, will be immediately available for the reduction of the National Debt. The fund consists of certain sums awarded for compensation for slaves on the abolition of slavery, which were liable to claims in the Colonial or Imperial Courts. The claimants must be supposed to have abandoned their demands, and the owners to have deemed the recovery of their property hopeless. The dividends have for many years been paid over to the National Debt Commissioners, and the principal is now to be similarly applied. The Consolidated Fund will of course be liable to meet any claims on the fund, not exceeding its amount, which may be hereafter legally established. The clerks and officers under the Accountant-General will be transferred to the Paymaster's Office; and the Accountant-General himself will retire on full pay. The arrangement is consistent with former precedents; but it might have been thought that it would have been more economical to require the services of the Accountant-General to perform the duties of the new office. During the period of transition the office will in some degree be regulated by the authority of the Lord Chancellor, by whom the Accountant-General has been appointed. The Chancellor will have the power and the duty of framing rules for the transfer of the office, for the mode of giving effect to orders of the Court affecting any money or funds under its control, and generally for the settlement of the relations between the Paymaster's Office and the Court of Chancery. The Treasury will confine its attention to the fiscal part of the business; and it is known that its principal object will be to convert the securities of which it will become the holder into Terminable Annuities. The objections which have often been urged to schemes for selling Terminable Annuities in the market are less applicable to permanent funds in the hands of the Government. With the exception of Insurance Companies, it is practically impossible to find customers for securities which annually diminish in value until they finally cease. The Treasury will effect the commutation at the estimated value of both kinds of securities, by merely recording in its books the result of an arithmetical calculation. The only consideration which will probably be forgotten is the inevitable continuance of the decline in the value of gold.

FRANCE.

M. THIERS has dismissed the Assembly for the Easter holidays with a few words of encouragement and counsel. He is very anxious that the deputies should disabuse themselves of any foolish notions about retrenchment. He does not positively say that the expenditure of the country never shall be less, but he frankly tells the Assembly that it will be wasting its time if it allows itself to think of lessening charges instead of devoting itself to the creation of fresh sources of revenue. "Real courage," he says, "consists in bringing up your receipts to the level of your expenditure." To any one who remembers some of M. THIERS's speeches when former Budgets were under discussion, it is a little startling to be told that the Budget for 1873, so far as expenditure is concerned, will not materially differ from its predecessors. It used to be thought that one of the great weapons of the Parliamentary Opposition was abuse of Imperial extravagance. M. THIERS keeps up the form of denouncing Mexican expeditions, insane wars, and unnecessary expenses; but if France under the Republic is to spend the same sum on necessities alone that she spent under the Empire on necessities and luxuries together, the gain is rather in words than in money. No doubt M. THIERS would say that under the Empire luxuries were bought in place of necessities, and that France has never before enjoyed the substantial advantages of a real balance, a real sinking-fund, and a thoroughly efficient army and navy. Unfortunately there are three weak places in this assurance. The real balance rests on the assumption that taxes which have not yet been voted will bring in sums which have yet to be collected. The real sinking-fund will certainly be diverted from its professed purpose as soon as the Government has a war or an insurrection on its hands. The army and navy have never been really tested since they both broke down in 1870. There is no need, however, to wonder at M. THIERS's satisfaction with the financial and military condition of France, since he finds matter for congratulation in what to ordinary minds seems a still less comfortable prospect. The present state of Europe, he thinks, is everything that could be desired after such an unexampled commotion. The Europe and the France of to-day are not the Europe or the France of 1815. Nothing could well be truer than this last statement, and in the mouth of the Emperor WILLIAM it would have seemed perfectly in place. The Germanic Confederation has vanished, and Alsace and Lorraine have been annexed to a new German Empire. But when M. THIERS professes to find cause for satisfaction in the contrast between 1872 and 1815, he must either belong to the order of politicians who are thankful for small mercies, or he must be using words in a highly recondite and non-natural sense. Europe, it seems, respects France too much to trouble itself about the form of the French Government. All it asks of Frenchmen is to preserve order at home. If this were really the attitude of Europe as regards France, it would bear a suspicious likeness to the permission sometimes given to children to amuse themselves how they like provided they make no noise. It has been suspected from time to time that this is rather the tone of the German Government in its communications with M. THIERS, and that Prince BISMARCK has not been unprepared to enforce order in France in the event of Frenchmen proving themselves unequal to the work. But it is hard to say on what authority M. THIERS attributes a similar contempt or a similar readiness to Europe generally, and still harder to conceive why it should give him pleasure to think that he has discovered the existence of either.

In speaking of the relations between the Government and the Assembly M. THIERS seems to have halted between the desire to cajole and the desire to defy the deputies. Order, M. THIERS holds, is in no danger, for the army belongs to no party but the law, and the law is another word for the Assembly and the Government which its votes will establish. This is exactly the doctrine that the Right loves to hear preached. The majority in the Assembly hold the destiny of France in their hands. They are the legitimate rulers of the country, and Marshal MACMAHON is both willing and able to execute their decrees whenever it shall please them to give him the signal. That they have not yet proclaimed a monarchy is merely an instance of their forbearance. They have the right to do so without any further appeal to the country, for the supremacy of law means the supremacy of whatever Government the present Chamber chooses to set up. After prophesying smooth things for the benefit of the Right, M. THIERS went on to do the same service for the Left. Taking another leaf out of the ex-EMPEROR's note-book, he declared that parties were alike incorrigible and powerless. Why the Left should have been specially delighted with this phrase is not very evident, for the extreme Republican faction is not less impracticable than the extreme Monarchical faction. It seems to have been understood, however, that M. THIERS had aimed this shot at Legitimists and Imperialists exclusively, and accordingly the Left cheered vociferously, while the Right maintained a freezing silence. The Monarchical party are exceedingly indignant at being taunted with impotence by an official who, as they consider, is the mere creature of their will. Whether it was wise or foolish in M. THIERS to show his contempt for the majority in the Assembly in this open manner is a question which it is impossible to answer without fuller knowledge of the object which he had in view. If his wish is to keep on good terms with them, he is taking an unusual course to compass that end, though at the same time it is one which has hitherto been successful. If, as the Paris Correspondent of the Times believes, he is aiming at the constitution of a new and more homogeneous majority, composed of the Moderate Left and a part of the Right Centre, whose programme shall be the definitive establishment of a Conservative Republic, he is probably not far wrong in his choice of means. The Monarchists form the most active and decided element in the Conservative ranks, and they have consequently had more than their fair share in shaping the policy of the party. But the anxiety of the framers of the Legitimist Manifesto and the Orleanist Letter of Adhesion to make it clear that they only wished to arrive at an understanding as to what should be done when the Provisional Government had come to an end, showed clearly that, with an influential section of the majority, adhesion to M. THIERS is still an article of faith. It is probable that the motives which led these petitioners to repudiate all idea of cutting themselves adrift from the PRESIDENT will lead them in the end to accept whatever terms he imposes as the price of permitting them to remain in alliance with him. What they would like best of all perhaps is an immediate restoration, to be brought about by M. THIERS. What they would like next best is a provisional Republic, to last for the life of M. THIERS, and to be followed by a restoration. They would like the immediate and definitive establishment of a Republic under M. THIERS's guardianship very much less than either of these; but they would like it immeasurably better than the definitive establishment of any form of government whatever without M. THIERS. If the PRESIDENT has satisfied himself that the combination of this section of the Conservatives with the Left would give him a working majority, it is far from unlikely that he is no longer anxious to prevent an open breach between himself and the Monarchists.

The particular epithets which have given offence to the Right are not applied without just cause. The Frenchmen who are scheming for an immediate restoration, whether that restoration be Imperialist or Legitimist, show themselves powerless because they dare not openly avow their ends, and incorrigible because they do not see that what France needs above all things is something like a general agreement as to the form of government, and that at present nothing but the Republic has any chance of conciliating even acquiescence. If the Right dared to go its own way, civil strife of some kind would inevitably follow. No nation would endure to have its constitutional fate decided for it by an Assembly elected for a different purpose, and obviously afraid to submit to the verdict of a fresh election. If the Monarchical party does not see this, it is incorrigible intellectually. If it sees it, and remains uninfluenced, it is incorrigible morally. If only consistent Legitimists were concerned in such schemes, their position would be at least respectable, because the triumph of abstract right in the person of HENRY V. would in their eyes be a national blessing for which no price would be too high. But the mass of the nominal Legitimists have no feelings of this kind. They desire a restoration, not because they think submission to the heir of the BOURBONS a duty, but because they calculate that a BOURBON restoration will give them sufficient strength to put down their adversaries by force of arms. The hopes of the Imperialists are much the same in kind, though they necessarily differ in detail. The Legitimists have to contend against an antipathy which is rather a matter of sentiment and tradition than of practical experience. The Imperialists have to contend against the disgrace and disaster associated with Sedan. In the majority in the Assembly, who hate the Republic worse than any form of despotism, there is an obvious tendency to condone the faults which led to the Revolution of September, in order to exaggerate the shortcomings of the succeeding Government; but the country at large shows no disposition to confound the two. The libel on General TACCHU were a daring attempt to make out that the fall of the Napoleonic dynasty was due to treachery, not to inherent weakness—that it would not have fallen to pieces if it had not first been betrayed. General TACCHU's unpopularity in Paris, and his failure in the conduct of the defence, pointed him out as a promising target for slander, and have evidently had their effect on the jury. But if the trial has left General TACCHU's military reputation where it found it, it has brought out the cowardice and selfishness of the monarchist Imperialists into stronger relief than ever.

MR. HARCOURT'S RESOLUTION.

AS the discussion on Mr. HARCOURT'S Resolution was not a serious debate on a practical motion, but only a conversation—a "good talk," as the gossips say—Mr. LOWE did not think it necessary to criticize the terms of the vague and unmeaning declaration which was presented for the endorsement of the House of Commons. It is worth while, however, to observe what is the magic formula by which economists of the school of Mr. HARCOURT imagine that the expenditure of the country can at once be reduced. The House of Commons was asked to express the opinion that "the national expenditure is capable of further reduction without danger to the safety and good government of the country, and that it is desirable that such expenditure should be reduced accordingly, in order that the taxation of the people and the public debt may be diminished in a larger measure than is proposed in the said Resolutions"; that is, the Resolutions of Ways and Means proposed by the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. The House of Commons was assured that, if it would only take the trouble to mutter this spell over the Budget, the national expenditure would instantly subside, and several millions of taxation might be remitted. An abstract resolution is in politics pretty much what the quack's bread pill is in medicine; it is a cheap, simple, and universal remedy, and, if it does little good to the patient, it sometimes makes the fortune of the vendor. Mr. HARCOURT seemed to think that the merit of his Resolution lay in its similarity to Mr. STANSFELD'S Resolution in 1862. We suspect, however, that Mr. STANSFELD'S success ten years ago is one of the reasons of Mr. HARCOURT'S failure now. The value of abstract resolutions on financial questions has been tested in the interval; and by his own confession Mr. HARCOURT would not now be proposing another application of the old nostrum if the former application had afforded any real relief. Four years ago, when Mr. GLADSTONE was out of office, he promised that his advent to power should be followed by a reduction of taxation, and it is instructive to observe how he kept his promise. He lost no time in reducing the Estimates, and in giving indirect taxation the benefit of the reduction; and he had no sooner done this than he discovered that the Estimates must be raised to something like their old figure, and direct taxation was required to make good the difference. The army has been reorganized, and Mr. LOWE argues that the present expenditure is transitional and will be followed by considerable economies. It remains to be seen whether a body of professional officers who have to depend on their pay for their livelihood can be maintained at the same cost as a body of officers who were willing and able to purchase their commissions. Even if Mr. CARDWELL'S reforms lead to increased expenditure, it will not follow that they are extravagant. Genuine economy consists in obtaining full value for your money, and a costly article is sometimes more economical than a cheap one.

There were several obvious objections to Mr. HARCOURT'S Resolution. In the first place it was proposed at the wrong moment. It related not to the Ways and Means, but to the Estimates of the year. The question before the House on Thursday night was not what should be the amount of the national expenditure, but how an expenditure of which the amount had otherwise been fixed should be provided for. Mr. HARCOURT confounded two things which are quite distinct, but this confusion of mind runs through the whole of his argument in favour of diminished expenditure. He seems to be under the impression that the natural and proper course is first to determine what shall be the total amount of expenditure, and then to distribute the sum among the different branches of the public service. It is true that in private life a man has to begin by considering how much he can afford to spend, for the simple reason that he ought not to spend more than he has got; but for the present at least it is certain that our expenditure is below the point at which the Government would have to consider whether the nation could meet the demands upon it. Mr. HARCOURT is distressed at the idea of any taxation falling on farm-labourers; but, this is a question, not of the amount, but of the distribution, of taxation; and when Mr. HARCOURT has had time to pursue his studies in political economy a little further, he will perhaps discover that the reason why it is deemed inexpedient to supplement the wages of labourers by payment out of the rates is equally a reason why they should not be relieved at the expense of the Treasury. The question which a practical statesman has to determine is not what arbitrary figure shall be fixed for our total expenditure, but what are the wants and interests of the country, and what should be done to supply the one and to promote the other. Mr. HARCOURT is of opinion that the kingdom cannot be invaded, that the Crimean war should never have been undertaken, that we have no interest in anything which happens beyond our own shores, and that, if we only have a good fleet cruising round the island to keep off invaders, we might disband a considerable part of our army. This is a distinct and consistent policy, and of course those who agree with it can have no difficulty in arriving at Mr. HARCOURT'S conclusion that our military expenses are excessive. Mr. RICHARD, who is a prominent member of the Peace Society, and who thinks that we should get rid of our navy as well as of our army, also holds quite logically that our expenditure should be reduced. These, however, are not the opinions of the country at large; and as free constitutional government means, as Mr. HARCOURT may some day come to understand, that the country shall be governed, not as the HARCOURTS and RICHARDS happen to think it should be governed, but in accordance with the convictions and desires of the majority of the people, the Ministry are of course bound to provide such defences as the nation demands. If Mr. HARCOURT is anxious for popular support in his economical crusade, he should first of all endeavour to convince his countrymen that his views of what is best for them are sound. When they are satisfied that it is a mistake to keep up an army, there will be no difficulty in making a considerable reduction of expenditure.

While the Ways and Means depend upon the Estimates, the Estimates in turn depend upon the policy of the country. Nothing can be more mischievous and absurd than to attempt to thwart a policy upon which the country has set its heart by providing insufficient means for carrying it out. Mr. HARCOURT remarked that the Crimean war was not only a political blunder, but a military disaster, and he might have added that one of the causes of disaster was Mr. GLADSTONE'S celebrated vote in Supply for the despatch of the Guards to Malta and for bringing them back again. Those who have the conduct of affairs are bound to respect the opinion of the country, provided, as Mr. LOWE observed, that this opinion is not so far divergent from their own that they cannot, as honest men, give effect to it, and then, of course, it is their duty to resign. It is easy to declaim against foolish panics and professional alarmists, but if the panics and alarms exist, it is necessary to take measures to restore public confidence. Even if the panics were, as Mr. HARCOURT thinks, groundless, it would be in every way sound economy to prevent their recurrence by a large expenditure; but there are men who are neither foolish nor interested who do not share Mr. HARCOURT'S opinions on this subject. It is true that the expenditure of the country is greater than it was in former years, and Mr. HARCOURT ridicules the idea that our expenditure should keep pace with our resources; but perhaps he will admit that an increase of population, which he left out of account, is a valid reason for increased expenses. A large family costs more to manage than a small one. Moreover, there are many things which it is now held to be desirable that the State should do which in other days were either never thought of or were left to private enterprise. Prices have been going up, wages have had to be raised, and money in its relation to commodities is of less value than formerly, as every housekeeper knows. It is possible that our expenditure may be more than it ought to be, and that some of the objects to which it is devoted are unnecessary, or that others are too dearly purchased. If Mr. HARCOURT and his friends can throw any light on these questions, everybody will be much obliged to them. It is easier to cant about extravagant Estimates and blunted armaments than to go through the drudgery of examining the public accounts in detail, and seeing that the country gets value for its money; but there is no royal road to national economy, and it is only by tackling the issues that the Estimates can be cut down.

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION.

UNDER the title of the Proportional Representation Bill, a scheme has been drawn up which seems well adapted to form a Parliamentary Constitution for the Island of Loopta. The chemists who extracted sunbeams from cucumbers, and the tailors who measured their customers with trigonometrical instruments, would have been delighted with clauses which look at first sight like the examples in an old-fashioned arithmetic book. To each constituency are to be assigned "so many members as the constituency contains entire multiples of the quotient"; and, "if a place (being at the time of pressing

"this Act a Parliamentary borough, and being by this Act, "or by a scheme made as hereafter in this Act mentioned, "included in a county constituency) is found to contain a population exceeding or equalling three multiples of the quotient, "it shall be constituted a separate borough constituency." The construction of the clause supplies a severe puzzle in the art of reading; and by a subsequent provision the returning officer is empowered to reject a vote on account of illegible writing. The Bill is evidently designed, not only for its avowed purpose, but as an effective stimulus to elementary education. As may be inferred from its title, the measure is founded on the principles of Mr. HARE's well-known system; but, in condescension to antiquated prejudices, the original theory is for the present partially modified. Mr. MORRISON, Mr. AUBERON HERBERT, who will find in the Bill an additional use for his slate-pencils, Mr. FAWCETT, and Mr. THOMAS HUGHES seem not yet prepared to fuse all the constituencies of England and Wales into one; and they even condescend to retain a nominal distinction between boroughs and counties, while they take care at the same time to make the concession illusory. The franchise for boroughs is not altered by the Bill; and "in the case of a county constituency all persons "are to be electors who would, if the Act had not been passed, "have been entitled to vote for any county or borough by this "Act included in any such constituency." The provision as to counties is entirely nugatory, for, as care is taken to add one or more existing boroughs to every county constituency, the borough franchise is in all cases, as if by an unforeseen accident, extended to the counties. The universal suffrage which is contemplated by Mr. HARE seems for the present to be postponed, but inasmuch as the constituencies are adjusted according to the last census, it may be assumed that, by some amended Proportional Representation Act, a perfect numerical symmetry will be attained. The preamble recites that "it is "expedient that the number of members returned by each constituency should be, as far as practicable, in proportion to "the population of such constituency from time to time"; but as the phrase "population of a constituency" happens to be simple nonsense, the meaning of the legislators can only be approximately or conjecturally ascertained. The population of a constituency is the population of a fraction of the population; and the framers of the Bill may, with equal inaccuracy, have referred to the part or to the whole. If there are 10,000 voters in one district with 120,000 inhabitants, and 9,000 voters in another district with 125,000 inhabitants, it is impossible to determine which would be the larger "population" of a constituency. It is a pity that philosophic legislators deeply versed in arithmetic, and careful of caligraphy, should not have mastered the rudiments of grammar.

The least unintelligible part of the Bill is a schedule containing a list of the proposed constituencies, with their respective quotas of members. The Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and London are to retain, as at present, five members, but they are to be capriciously fused into a single constituency. The City of London also is to retain its four members as a tribute paid by science to tradition. The rest of the country is to be divided into seventy or eighty constituencies, returning on an average one member for a population of 50,000. Each elector may send in a list of candidates previously nominated, but his vote will only be counted once; and in the first instance he will be deemed to have voted for the candidate at the head of his list. If there are 100,000 electors and 10 members to be chosen, every candidate who obtains 10,000 votes will be at once returned. The voting-papers in which his name stands alone will be counted first in order, "and then those "in succession in which the fewest other candidates are "designated," and, as the draughtsman superfluously adds, those will be placed last "in which the greatest number of other "candidates are designated." A popular candidate may consequently have numerous votes to spare, and in that case the vote will hold good for the second name on the list; and if it becomes again disposable in the same manner, the process of transfer will be repeated. When all the cards have been finally shuffled, if any of the candidates have still not obtained the prescribed number of votes, the lowest in numbers will be excluded, and his unused voting-papers will be distributed among others who may be named in the list. Eventually the election will be determined by a majority, and where the numbers are equal the returning officer is to have a casting vote. Although it has not been thought prudent immediately to abolish all local boundaries, the framers of the Bill have made a considerable advance in the direction of a single and centralized representation. Thus North Wales and South Wales, with all their counties and boroughs, are grouped into two constituencies respectively returning ten and sixteen members. The voters scattered over hundreds of square miles, and having no common interest or means of communication, would at the first election vote at random, or not at all; and when the scheme was better understood by election managers, the trouble of choice would be taken out of the hands of the constituencies. In the United States and in Republican France the system of tickets has effectually removed the control of elections from the nominal constituencies to the skilful manipulators who arrange the selection of candidates. Without similar interference the voters in such a constituency as that of South Wales would be utterly unable to judge whether any candidates whom they might prefer could be inscribed on their lists with any prospect of success. In the most favourable case two or three of the best known candidates would receive a large number of superfluous votes, and the distribution of their unused voting-papers would be effected by chance. The skilled agents who made a profession of the science of quotients and multiples would be more absolutely masters of the constituencies than the same class under a less artificial system; and one of the first results of Proportional Representation would be the universal prevalence of pecuniary corruption. It is much easier and safer to bribe a few professional arithmeticians or politicians than to buy up hundreds of householders.

The statement in the preamble that members ought to "represent the opinions of all the electors in proportion to "the prevalence of such opinions from time to time," is more than questionable. A recital that it was expedient that just opinions only should be represented, or that, according to the demand of ANACHARSIS CLOOTZ, all knaves and fools should be suppressed, would be incomparably sounder, although it might be difficult to give effect to the principle. Mr. MORRISON and his colleagues have probably little respect for the second French Empire, which rested on the opinions of the majority of electors for the time being. The French peasantry happened to be of opinion that a despotism administered by prefects was preferable to any mode of government in which the enlightened classes exercised considerable influence. It is true that the Proportional Representation Bill would correct the mischief of universal suffrage, as far as it secured a share of the representation to minorities; but if any measure of the kind is at any time adopted, the provision by which each elector is restricted to one vote will disappear in the process of legislation like the analogous securities which Mr. DISRAELI appended to the first draught of his Reform Bill. The inequality and variety of constituencies furnish for the present an imperfect check to the uncontrolled predominance of numbers; but it is idle to expect that the majority will consent to establish new impediments to its own uncontrolled supremacy. It is not enough for a political projector to devise a system which would be plausible or expedient if it were established; it is necessary that every institution should be strong enough to maintain itself. In America one limitation of the suffrage after another has been swept away without resistance until votes have been given to hordes of emancipated slaves who have already reduced large parts of the Southern States to hopeless anarchy. Mr. COMDEY's plan of subdividing constituencies and restricting each to the choice of one member is in every way preferable to the arbitrary scheme of giving each elector a single vote for a voluminous list of candidates. If legislation were now conducted as in the mythical ages of Greece, it might be practicable for Mr. MORRISON and Mr. FAWCETT, like SOLON or LYCURGUS, to bind the English nation by an oath to observe the provisions of the Proportional Representation Bill until they returned from voluntary exile, or until a release was obtained by the response of an oracle. In present circumstances, even if they could obtain a hearing for their elaborate scheme, the popular party would pick and choose among the enactments which might respectively extend or restrict its power. The result would be in the first instance pure democracy resting on universal suffrage; and when the craft of election managers was sufficiently developed, wealth would perhaps indirectly recover by means of corruption a portion of the influence which had ostensibly been monopolized by numbers.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.

THERE are already some faint indications of a recurrence of the legislative block about which so much was said last Session. The Easter Recess has come and gone, and the Public Health Bill has not yet been read a second time. If London were included in the operation of the Bill, there might be some compensation for this delay. The heats of July occasionally give sudden prominence to the sanitary defects of the metropolis, and the immediate neighbourhood of the Thames might suggest matter for some additional clauses. But as London is to remain outside the Bill, at all events until such time as it pleases Mr. Bruce to give it a municipal government, there is no chance of the metropolitan members being stirred up to insist on making the Bill more stringent; and the general course of similar measures points to the importance of the discussions in Committee being taken as early as possible. The opposition to the Public Health Bill will probably resolve itself into a series of surprises. Vested rights and vested indolence will profess perfect acquiescence in the principle of the Bill, and then devote themselves from time to time to drawing the teeth of its most important clauses. This manœuvre is most easily executed at the fag end of a Session. Public spirit rarely keeps members in town as long as private interest, and when the independent friends of the Bill have left London, the Government may at any moment see itself deserted by its usual supporters, and be forced to modify a provision which earlier in the year it would have been able to retain in its original shape. Nor will Mr. STANSFELD find it so easy by and by to adopt the suggestions which he has repeatedly invited. The opponents of the Bill will urge that some of those who think with them have gone away in the belief that the Government would adhere to its original proposals. It is difficult for a Minister to insist very strongly on the rejection of his own words in favour of somebody else's, and the shortest way out of the dilemma is to pass the clause as it stood in the first instance. These difficulties will be avoided—at all events they will not be aggravated—if the Bill goes early into Committee; but with a long Whitsuntide recess in prospect this will scarcely be found compatible with any further postponement of the second reading.

The criticisms to which the Bill has hitherto been subjected relate principally to three points. It is charged with sanctioning a mischievous multiplication of authorities, with perpetuating a needless and sometimes pernicious distinction between urban and rural authorities, and with playing into the hands of local obstructiveness by allowing the local sanitary authority to appoint its own officers of health. Those who have raised the first of these objections maintain that the Boards of Guardians are altogether unfit to have the care of the public health, and that the proper course would be to create a county sanitary authority to which the Guardians in each Union should be strictly subordinate. A County Board, it is said, would be composed of better materials than a Union Board, and its action would relieve the central authority of much of the control which, as the Bill stands, it will have to exert. In answer to this it may be said, first, that the insertion of an intermediate authority between the local authority and the central government really involves a further multiplication of authorities. A County Board would either have to subdivide itself into distinct Committees or to delegate the work to existing local authorities, who would presumably be the Guardians in the several Unions. In the former case the members of the County Board would virtually be elected with a view to the requirements or the prejudices of each particular district. Obstructive parishes would return obstructive representatives, and if these obstructive parishes happened to constitute a district by themselves, the disposition to reduce the Act into a dead letter would have the same power of making itself felt in the County Board as it will now have in the Union Board. In the other case the Guardians would hold much the same position as they do under the Bill, with the difference that the authority to which they are immediately responsible would be the County Board, instead of the Local Government Board. In other words, the aim of the proposal is not to aggregate local authorities so much as to subdivide the central authority. It may be argued perhaps that a number of controlling bodies not responsible to Parliament will be more efficacious than one controlling body sitting in London and presided over by a responsible Minister. But the supporters of the County Board as the nominal unit of sanitary administration must make up their minds to go the whole length of this substitution. It is idle to suppose that the Local Government Board would be able to exercise any effectual control over Boards representing whole counties. In the vast majority of cases, at any rate, the action of the County Board would be subject to no revision short of a new Act of Parliament. It is a further drawback to this plan that it increases the number of elective bodies in the country, and experience shows that the result of this is greatly to increase the difficulty of finding good men to serve on them, and greatly to lessen the amount of public interest felt in their proceedings. The County Board would drain away all the best elements of the Boards of Guardians, and whatever might be the effect of this on sanitary administration, it could not be other than injurious to Poor-law administration. By the scheme embodied in the Bill, the duties and the powers of Boards of Guardians will be largely extended, and the inducement to men of position and intelligence to serve on them will be proportionately increased.

The objection to the perpetuation of the distinction between urban and rural authorities seems to be sufficiently disposed of by the fact that it merely answers to the distinction between town and country. The conditions of the two are so different that it would argue extraordinary carelessness or extraordinary pedantry not to recognize a corresponding difference in their requirements. There are many restrictions which are absolutely necessary in town that would in the country be simply a source of purposeless annoyance. It is expedient no doubt to meet cases in which rural districts, either by gradual or sudden growth, become towns in everything but the name; but the clauses empowering the Local Government Board to invest any rural sanitary authority with the responsibilities of an urban authority seem to provide for this contingency. If any further enactment on the subject should seem to be required, it might perhaps take the form of a definition of the population and area which, when found in conjunction, should at once make the district a town for sanitary purposes. It is also worthy of consideration whether particular clauses of the Acts which now apply only to towns ought not to be extended to rural districts. Thus new buildings in villages might be subjected to more control than is at present exercised over them. The overcrowding of particular spots in districts otherwise thinly inhabited might thus be checked, and much consequent ill-health be prevented. It would be well also if certain duties now assigned by implication to the local sanitary authorities were assigned to them in plain words. The duty of providing a sufficient supply of wholesome water, for example, is cast on rural as well as urban authorities by the law empowering the Secretary of State to remedy any default on their part; but the existence of this obligation would be made plainer by a new clause directing all sanitary authorities, whether rural or urban, to examine into the character of the existing water supply and to remedy any serious defects either in quantity or quality. The third objection to the Bill as it stands—the unfitness of the local authorities in many cases to have the appointment of their own officers of health—either ignores the distinction between administration and supervision, or anticipates a question which properly belongs to the organization of the Central Department. If there are to be local authorities at all, it seems to follow that they must have the appointment of the officers through whom they are to act. No body of men can be expected to work entirely by means of instruments imposed on them by some one else. If the appointment of the local officer of health were vested in the Government, the result would certainly be that the local sanitary authority would regard him as a stationary inspector, and would delegate the execution of their own plans to other officers chosen by themselves. It is hard to see what advantage a system of stationary inspection would possess over the travelling inspection at present in force. It would be far more difficult for an official constantly living in the district to preserve entire independence than for a man whose connexion with each locality is only intermittent. But supposing him to be successful in this respect, the system would tend to generate chronic feuds between the local sanitary authority and the local Government inspector, which would be most inimical to the smooth working of sanitary administration. Nor would an inspector only acquainted with the arrangements of a single district be able to give the sanitary authorities whom he has to advise the benefit of that extensive observation which falls to the lot of a man who is constantly seeing and comparing the management of many districts. One great function of the central sanitary authority will be to collect the best information on sanitary questions, and to diffuse it by means of its representatives among the local authorities. There is an obvious economy in using the inspectors for the collection as well as for the diffusion of information; and to discharge the former function to advantage, they must be free from local ties.

THE EASTER MONDAY SHAM FIGHT.

THE practice battle which took place last Monday on Brighton Downs was undoubtedly an important turning-point in the history of the Volunteer force. It was the first business-like examination of the value of our citizen army, concerning the real worth of which some doubts have lately been expressed. The spirit of criticism was awakened, and it was understood that the usual indiscriminate complimentary notices of the Volunteers would this year be supplanted by impartial praise or blame. It was indeed tacitly admitted that on the verdict of the umpires, official and non-official, both the continued existence of the Volunteer force in its present shape and a repetition of the Easter manoeuvres depended. The official umpires have not yet spoken, but it appears to be the general impression that the Volunteers are valuable auxiliaries to the regular army, and that the Easter Monday manoeuvres are well worth the money, trouble, and interest bestowed upon them.

The chief objects sought to be attained on these occasions are two—namely, practice for the Volunteers, and the gathering of lessons likely to be useful in future. We believe that both objects have been attained. Mistakes and shortcomings there certainly were, but so there were during the autumn manoeuvres, when an army almost entirely composed of regular troops was employed. Considering, however, that we are only just beginning to study systematically the art of modern war, a fair measure of success was reached. Perhaps those most open to criticism were some of the commanders of battalions who quietly persisted in allowing their men to be annihilated, and who from a deficiency of military imagination were unable to realize the fact that in real war their battalions would have ceased to exist as organized bodies. Others, again, apparently entertained very confused notions of their proper front. But it must be borne in mind that when tactical arguments are not enforced by actual missiles a very great demand is made upon the imaginative faculties. A contest with single-sticks is a good preparation for sword-play, but is by no means a perfect substitute for it. A blow with the single-stick frequently fails to be appreciated, while a cut from a sword enforces recognition. It is the same with peace manoeuvres. Again, English troops are taught to feel great confidence in their superior morale, whereas in a sham fight morale has no place, and the contest is nothing but a cold-blooded scientific affair. It is only just to offer these excuses for troops and officers who insisted on continuing the fight when they had been slain or dispersed three over, or stolidly refused to leave off interchanging fire with an enemy in their front when another body was pouring volleys into their backs. Still it is certain that both brigadiers and colonels occasionally displayed an utter absence of reflection and of power to take the initiative. There was also a great waste of powder in firing at ranges which should at the most have been reserved for a few picked marksmen. As was pointed out by one of our contemporaries, skirmishers and even whole battalions fired rapidly on skirmishers who were five hundred yards distant, and at closer ranges whole battalions interchanged shots with a thin line of skirmishers, thus giving "ten lives to one that they took." Skirmishers should be opposed by skirmishers only; but this simple axiom seems to have been repeatedly ignored last Monday. Again, the total indifference to cover displayed was in many cases painfully apparent. Major TELLENBACH lays it down that no more men should be sent under fire than are necessary. This rule, founded as it is on the plainest principles of common sense, was conspicuously violated; for as soon as the skirmishers of General LYONS's force opened fire on the Mamelon which marked the right centre of Sir ALFRED HORSFORD's position, whole battalions were brought over the brow of the hill to oppose them, though the battalions in question were exposed, not only to musketry, but also to artillery fire.

With regard to the order of battle, the dispositions appeared to us as questionable as were those commonly made during the autumn manoeuvres. There was no adequate reserve on Sir ALFRED HORSFORD's side, and his second line was, almost from the commencement of the fight, brought up to the front. Indeed it struck us that the order of battle on both sides was too thin, and that battalions hung about, under a close fire, too close to the skirmishers in their front. The want of solidity to which we refer was not so apparent in the case of the Lower army; still both commanders seemed too hasty in committing all the troops at once to close action. The consequence was that when LYONS pierced HORSFORD's centre, the defenders had no troops available for the only feasible remedy—a brisk counter attack. On both sides everything depended on a single blow. An excuse for the weakness of HORSFORD's line may be found in the immense extent of his position—nearly three miles, occupied by about 10,000 men, instead of by at least thrice that number; but a good general makes his dispositions conform to the ground, and does not occupy a longer line than he can hold in force. Another error which struck us was that, as soon as LYONS sought to provoke his adversary to display his force, the latter did so, showing his whole line on Barrow Hill at the mere provocation of a distant fire of skirmishers. While on this subject, however, it is only fair to acknowledge that General LYONS derived great advantage from certain indications which it was not in the power of the enemy to conceal from him. We read the other day that in Central India the monkeys, by their agitation and chattering, frequently betray the presence of a tiger. On Monday a similar function was performed by the spectators who, assembling in crowds on the summit of Barrow Hill, showed that there the bulk of HORSFORD's army was drawn up. It has been vehemently asserted by a Correspondent of the Morning Post that the piercing of HORSFORD's centre was only accomplished by an unjustifiable manoeuvre, stated, though quite incorrectly, to have been disallowed by the umpires. Lord BURY, whilst the action raged in front between Warren Farm and the Barrow above mentioned, sent part of his brigade through the lane which intersects the inclosure, and the rest of it round the south-east angle, and formed line across the flank of the First Division. It is alleged that General HORSFORD, considering the whole of the farm to be tabooed as an impassable morass, thought himself free from all danger on that side. On the maps, however, it is clearly shown that, though the fields composing the farm were surrounded by a prohibitory line, the lane which traversed them was open, and was to be regarded as a causeway. The position of the red flags, moreover, could leave no room for doubt on the subject. There was therefore no hitch in the operations at all; and if General HORSFORD really acted on the theory attributed to him, the error was no doubt due to the conventional nature of the arrangements. In actual war a causeway leading through his centre into his rear would never have escaped the sharp eye of General HORSFORD, who certainly would not have failed to guard the débouché from so important a defile. It is an axiom that an obstacle, such as Warren Farm was supposed to be, is advantageous to the defender when it terminates at his first line, but the reverse when it pierces it; and consequently it would have been more prudent had General HORSFORD's position been a little more retired than it was. No doubt, however, conventional difficulties here again intervened. That the Brighton force was utterly defeated there can, we think, be no question; for the fact that HORSFORD's right brigade forced back the left of the attacking force was a circumstance of no real moment. LYONS would naturally hold back his left so far as was consistent with his plan of attracting the attention of the enemy towards the latter's right. As HORSFORD's troops were drawn up, the decisive point was between Warren Farm and the Barrow; and if LYONS was successful there, he could afford to regard with indifference the movements of HORSFORD's wings. Had the fight continued, HORSFORD's entire right wing must have been completely rolled up, whilst his left could with difficulty have saved itself from annihilation by a forced march and a hasty embarkation. Having endeavoured to point out, judging after the event, what seemed to us the defects in the dispositions of one of the ablest generals we have, we must add that most of them would probably have been avoided had General HORSFORD been opposed to a real instead of a mimic foe. After all, one side or the other generally obtains a decided success, a drawn battle being rare in war. On this occasion General LYONS was victorious, but it must be remembered that he possessed great advantages. The Prussians contend that the assailant has more chances in his favour than the defender, chiefly because he can make the dispositions of the enemy subject to his own. In this instance the nature of the ground rendered it difficult for HORSFORD to discover the intentions of the enemy, and circumstances almost forbade the Brighton force to take the initiative and demand the offensive.

We must add a few words as to the evident incompetence of some of the newspaper critics. The young lions of the Telegraph made themselves particularly conspicuous by roaring most thoroughly out of tune. Their ignorance of the ground is shown by an assertion that HORSFORD's position was to the east of Warren Farm, whereas four of his brigades were posted to the south and the other two to the north-west of that inclosure. They tell us also that the Second Division was in reserve. As a matter of fact, only one brigade of that division was properly in reserve, while the other two fought a separate battle about Bevenham. The climax, however, is reached when out of the depths of their internal consciousness they evolve field-batteries marching past, and outposts from Housford's army in position. Housford never threw out any piquets at all; while as to the field-batteries, whose excellent appearance is graphically described, not a single gun passed the saluting point. Was this part of the letter written on hearsay, or the day before the battle? The Times committed itself no less than its penny contemporary; for, among other blunders, its correspondents speak of "strategy," and blame the "want of strategic knowledge" of certain officers. They appear to be unaware that when two armies come in contact strategy ends and tactics begin. The errors of the Post we have already pointed out, and the shrill scolding in another contemporary of "One of GAMBETTA'S Lieutenants," who saw only "failure, lethargy, apathy, and incompetence," serves as a fitting echo to the censures of the military critic of the organ of the fashionable world. It would be easy to multiply these evidences of topographical ignorance, misuse of technical terms, inaccuracy of fact, and utter incapacity for either describing or criticizing military operations. In spite, however, of what has been said by careless or incompetent observers, we think the public may be safely assured that the Easter Monday gathering was on the whole a most satisfactory affair; that the Volunteers showed themselves, as a rule, observant of discipline, and perfectly competent to perform the very simple evolutions required to be executed in presence of an enemy. They proved also that they are not averse to undergoing the inconvenience, trouble, and restraint without which it would be impossible to make them useful auxiliaries to the regular army.

FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE.

THIS Easter week we have lost a man about whom opinions and feelings were much divided, who was by many of the best and most thoughtful among us looked on as the noblest and greatest of recent English teachers, and who certainly had that rare gift of inspiring enthusiasm and trust among honest and powerful minds in search of guidance, which belongs to none but to men of a very high order. Professor Maurice has ended a life of the severest and most unceasing toil, still working to the utmost that failing bodily strength allowed—still to the last in harness. The general public, though his name is familiar to them, probably little measure the deep and passionate affection with which he was regarded by the circle of his friends and by those whose thoughts and purposes he had moulded; or the feeling which his loss causes in them of a blank, great and not to be filled up, not only personally for themselves, but in the agencies which are working most hopefully in English society. But even those who knew him least, and only from the outside, and whose points of view least coincided with his, must feel that there has been, now that we look back on his course, something singularly touching and even pathetic in the combination shown in all that he did, of high courage and spirit, and of unwearied faith and vigour, with the deepest humility and with the sincerest disinterestedness and abnegation, which never allowed him to seek anything great for himself, and in fact, distinguished and honoured as he was, never found it. For the sake of his generation we may regret that he did not receive the public recognition and honour which were assuredly his due; but in truth his was one of those careers which, for their own completeness and consistency, gain rather than lose by escaping the distractions and false lights of what is called preferment.

The two features which strike us at the moment as characteristic of Mr. Maurice as a writer and teacher, besides the vast range both of his reading and thought, and the singularly personal tone and language of all that he wrote, are, first, the combination in him of the most profound and intense religiousness with the most boundless claim and exercise of intellectual liberty; and next, the value which he set, exemplifying his estimate in his own long and laborious course, on processes and efforts, as compared with conclusions and definite results, in that pursuit of truth which was to him the most sacred of duties. There is no want of earnest and fervent religion among us, intelligent, well-informed, deliberate, as well as of religion, to which these terms can hardly be applied. And there is also no want of the boldest and most daring freedom of investigation and judgment. But what Mr. Maurice seemed to see himself, and what he endeavoured to impress on others, was that religion and liberty are no natural enemies, but that the deepest and most absorbing forms of historical and traditional religion draw strength and solemnity of meaning and binding obligation from an alliance, frank and unconditional, with what seems to many the risk, the perilous risks and chances, of freedom. It was a position open to obvious and formidable criticism; but against this criticism is to be set the fact, that in a long and energetic life, in which amidst great trials and changes there was a singular uniformity and consistency of character maintained, he did unite the two—the most devout Christianity with the most fearless and unshrinking boldness in facing the latest announcements and possibilities of modern thought. That he always satisfactorily explained his point of view to others is more than can be said; but he certainly satisfied numbers of keen and anxious thinkers, who were discontented and disheartened both by religion as it is presented by our great schools and parties, and by science as its principles and consequences are expounded by the leading philosophical authorities of the day. The other point to which we have adverted partly explains the influence which he had with such minds. He had no system to formulate or to teach. He was singularly ready to accept, as adequate expressions of those truths in whose existence he so persistently believed, the old consecrated forms in which simpler times had attempted to express them. He believed that these truths are wider and vaster than the human mind which is to be made wiser and better by them. And his aim was to reach up to an ever more exact, and real, and harmonious hold of those truths, which in their essential greatness he felt to be above him; to reach to it in life as much as in thought. And so to the end he was ever striving, not so much to find new truths as to find the heart and core of old ones, the truth of the truth, the inner life and significance of the letter, of which he was always loth to refuse the traditional form. In these efforts at unfolding and harmonizing there was considerable uniformity; no one could mistake Mr. Maurice's manner of presenting the meaning and bearing of an article of the Creed for the manner of any one else; but the result of this way of working, in the effect of the things which he said, and in his relations to different bodies of opinion and thought both in the Church and in society, was to give the appearance of great and important changes in his teaching and his general point of view, as life went on. This governing thought of his, of the immeasurably transcendent compass and height of all truths compared with the human mind and spirit which was to bow to them and to gain life and elevation by accepting them, explains the curious, and at present almost unique combination in him, of deep reverence for the old language of dogmatic theology, and an energetic maintenance of its fitness and value, with dissatisfaction, equally deep and impartially universal, at the interpretations put on this dogmatic language by modern theological schools, and at the modes in which its meaning is applied by them both in directing thought and influencing practice. This habit of distinguishing sharply and peremptorily between dogmatic language and the popular reading of it at any given time is conspicuous in his earliest as in his latest handling of these subjects; in the pamphlet of 1835, Subscription no Bondage, explaining and defending the old practice at Oxford, and in the papers and letters, which have appeared from him in periodicals, on the Athanasian Creed, and which are, we suppose, almost his last writings.

The world at large thought Mr. Maurice obscure and misty, and was, as was natural, impatient of such faults. The charge was, no doubt, more than partially true; and nothing but such genuine strength and comprehensive power as his could have prevented it from being a fatal one to his weight and authority. But it is not unattractive to remember what was very much at the root of it. It had its origin, not altogether, but certainly in a great degree, in two of his moral characteristics. One was his stubborn, conscientious determination, at any cost of awkwardness, or apparent inconsistency, or imperfection of statement, to say out what he had to say, neither more nor less, just as he thought it, and just as he felt it, with the most fastidious care for truthful accuracy of meaning. He never would suffer what he considered either the connexion or the balance and adjustment of varied and complementary truths to be sacrificed to force or point of expression; and he had to choose sometimes, as all people have, between a blurred, clumsy, and ineffective picture and a consciously incomplete and untrue one. His choice never wavered; and as the artist's aim was high, and his skill not always equally at his command, he preferred the imperfection which left him the consciousness of honesty. The other cause which threw a degree of haze round his writings was the personal shape into which he was so fond of throwing his views. He shrunk from their enunciation as arguments and conclusions which claimed on their own account and by their own title the deference of all who read them; and he submitted them as what he himself had found and had been granted to see—the lessons and convictions of his own experience. Sympathy is, no doubt, a great bond among all men; but, after all, men's experience and their points of view are not all alike, and when we are asked to see with another's eyes, it is not always easy. Mr. Maurice's desire to give the simplest and most real form to his thoughts as they arose in his own mind contributed more often than he supposed to prevent others from entering into his meaning. He asked them to put themselves in his place. He did not sufficiently put himself in theirs.

But he has taught us great lessons, of the sacredness, the largeness, and, it may be added, the difficulty of truth; lessons of sympathy with one another, of true humility and self-conquest in the busy and unceasing activity of the intellectual faculties. He has left no school and no system, but he has left a spirit and an example. We speak of him here only as those who knew him as all the world knew him; but those who were his friends are never tired of speaking of his grand simplicity of character, of his tenderness and delicacy, of the irresistible spell of loveliness which won all within its reach. They remember how he spoke, and how he read; the tones of a voice of singularly piercing clearness, which was itself a power of interpretation, which revealed his own soul and went straight to the hearts of hearers. He has taken his full share in the controversies of our days, and there must be many opinions both about the line which he took, and even sometimes about the temper in which he carried on debate. But it is nothing but the plainest justice to say that he was a philosopher, a theologian, and, we may add, a prophet, of whom, for his great gifts, and, still more, for his noble and pure use of them, the modern English Church may well be proud.

MAHOMMEDAN RULE IN INDIA.

RECENT sad events in India have naturally drawn attention to a portion of our fellow-subjects who, numerically small in proportion to Hindoos, are yet important by the freshness and vigour of their historical traditions, and by their power to combine for social or religious ends. Various suggestions have been made by exponents of the political tenets and claims of Mahommedans in order to remove their distrust and suspicion, and excite their loyalty. Perhaps we may best understand the feelings with which Amir Khan, Saiyud Abdul Aziz, and Nawab Musharraf-Ood-Dowlah may be supposed to contemplate British supremacy in India, by considering what changes were wrought in that country in the space of a few centuries by emperors and preachers, their forerunners, before whom effete dynasties crumbled into dust.

The popular notion of history connects the conquest of India by Mahommedans with Mahmud of Ghazni, who is known to English readers by the picturesque pages of Gibbon, as well as by an unlucky pean of triumph which a late Governor-General raised over the Gates of Somnath. The truth, however, is that the early expeditions of Mahmud and his successors were little more than grand hunting raids on an extensive scale, the perpetrators of which pushed their explorations further and further, and brought back tempting accounts of populous cities, fruitful plains, and wealthy shrines which seemed created to invite the purer faith and the irresistible arms of true believers. The practical subjugation of India by the Mahommedans dates from the commencement of the thirteenth century, and the celebrated pillar which is the delight of tourists and antiquaries at Delhi was raised just about the time when the Barons of England were extorting Magna Charta from King John. In reality, however, the dominion of the Mahommedans may be said to have been twice established over India. From the time of the Slave Kings, who are inseparably associated with the pillar aforesaid, down to the death of Mohammed Toghlaq, is about a century and a half, during which time the conquering race was employed in extending its dominion beyond Hindostan Proper, into the plains of the Carnatic and over the alluvial soil of Lower Bengal; and just at the epoch when our Edwards were still filled with visions of the permanent annexation of French territory, the Mahommedan Empire had in India attained its widest range, but not its highest splendour. At the death of this Mohammed Toghlaq, in the middle of the fourteenth century, the Mussulman ascendancy was parcelled out amongst a number of independent Mahommedan dynasties. Vigorous and ambitious chiefs started up, as might have been expected, and established themselves at Bejapore, in Guzerat, in Khandeish amongst the Bheels, in Malwa, in Sind, in Golconda, and in Bengal and Berar. These adventurers coined money, erected splendid works of architecture, even sent navies to sea, and overthrew Hindoo armies by land, the leaders of which had conceived vain ideas of recovering their independence. Baber, known to the literary world by his graphic Memoirs, and Humayun, at whose magnificent mausoleum the young princes took refuge in September 1857, till they were captured by Hodson and his Guides, in vain tried to reconstruct the Empire. The inherent difficulty in the permanent conquest of India was that some sovereigns persisted in attempting to govern the country from Cabul. It was exactly as if William III. had attempted to rule England from the Hague, or as if the Georges had tried the same policy from Hanover. When Cabul was erected into an independent kingdom, about 1556, the task of subduing India, harder in appearance, became in reality one of comparative ease. And under the genius of Akbar the foundations of permanent peace and of unquestioned prosperity were established on a basis which endured for exactly 150 years. This was the second manifestation of Mahommedan strength. Akbar was as nearly as possible cotemporary with our Elizabeth. Jehangir's reign is parallel to the first of the Stuarts. Shah Jehan carries us on over the reign of Charles I., the Civil Wars, and the Protectorate. Aurangzib saw the fall of the Stuarts, the Revolution and the reign of William III., and the first few years of Queen Anne. Fifty years then elapsed, during which the inheritance of this crafty, bigoted, but highly capable sovereign was dissipated by a race of weak or dissolute princes, and the series of English victories was begun by Clive at Plassey.

A line of Mahommedan sovereigns may therefore be said to have ruled over India with more or less of concentration and ability for five centuries and a half, or from the reign of King John to the end of that of George II. A large portion of this period is taken up with the usual programme of disputed successions, revolted provinces, usurping lieutenants, and zenana intrigues. But great things were accomplished, and national legacies were bequeathed, in a century and a half, during which the throne was occupied by Akbar, Jehangir, Shah Jehan, and Aurangzib. And we shall endeavour, in as brief a compass as possible, to sum up the results of this eventful time.

In the first place, the Mahommedans introduced a faith which was a standing protest against degrading idolatry and obscene myths. The Hindu religion, with the revolting practices which it sanctions, is a sort of compound between Mexican cruelty and Grecian mythology deprived of all its elements of beauty. We do not forget that highly coloured sensuous delights are held out as rewards in the Koran, and that the creed transmitted by a long line of Caliphs is intolerant, sanguinary, and fierce. But the Mahommedans worshipped one God, and their cruelties were reserved for such as appeared to them blind and wilful unbelievers, and not for child-widows and helpless children of their own faith. As Miss Eden rather happily puts it in one of her letters, the creed was "incomplete." As far as it went, it was a measureless advance over a series of filthy or childish traditions characterized by that "proneness to evolve ideas from which others recoil with disgust," which Johnson indignantly ascribed to Swift.

With a better conception of the Supreme Being, the Mahommedans brought with them a higher literature, improved theories of civil government, and a language which, as Charles V. said of French, was emphatically the language of business and mankind. It had been used as a vehicle of expression by a long line of poets, who wrote amatory effusions in praise of ladies with the stature of the cypress and the cheek of the rose. It had also given birth to one epic which, even through the medium of a translation, seemed to Walter Scott to have caught a portion of the old Homeric spirit. One of its most popular authors has certainly shown something of the Horatian delicacy and happiness of expression; and it could boast of a series of authentic narratives and elaborate histories, which, if disfigured by occasional servility, or intolerance, or bigotry, yet stand out in happy contrast to the puerile Hindoo fictions which, as Lord Macaulay said, would move laughter in the girls of a boarding-school, and which abounded in kings thirty feet high, and reigns three thousand years long. Rich in every conceivable department of literature, it was admirably fitted for Imperial edicts and regal proclamations, for the Vakil sent on a diplomatic mission, or for the Kazi dispensing justice in the Court. It was written from right to left, and, where prompt despatch was required, it showed a decided superiority over the various dialects of the Devanagari type, which, like our own, are written from left to right, and are awkward tools for the best penman. Though simple in syntax and structure, it had a copious vocabulary of its own, enriched by additions from another Semitic language of almost inexhaustible profundity and wealth. It was, and is, as much the distinguishing mark of an educated Mahommedan to show some conversancy with the couplets of Sadi as it is for an M.P. to catch the point of a quotation from Horace; it was speedily mastered by the intelligent Hindoos, who possess the happy knack of adapting themselves to the requirements of the ruling power; and it became rapidly so diffused in great cities, and even over some portions of populous districts, as to merit the title of the French language of the East.

But the Mahommedans were not content with the introduction of Persian as the language of official correspondence and public record. They created, by fusion, another dialect, which commenced in the Camp and yet penetrated to the Palace. They took the rough and somewhat unpolished Hindi, left its grammar and its verbs mainly unchanged, enriched it with a vast store of nouns and adjectives descriptive of objects of civilization, luxury, and art, and made up a polished vernacular, which Sir James Macintosh compared to the fusion of Norman and Saxon elements into the tongue which we speak and write. The Hindustani language is now spoken with more or less of elegance and with some differences of pronunciation by Hindoos and Mahommedans all over Upper India. It is also the language of educated Mussulmans in many other places; in the Deccan as well as in Lower Bengal. Of course the ascendancy of a vigorous and conquering race was not sufficient to overthrow the ancient dialects everywhere, or to eradicate Hindoo conservatism. Village customs, rural peculiarities, agricultural tenures, held their ground with unconquerable pertinacity; but the civil servants of the Crown still use the official jargon which has descended from the Mogul Emperors, and in revenue Settlements they record the dues of the community and the rights of the State, by a nomenclature which would be almost intelligible at Teheran or Cabul.

Not only are the majority of the terms in use in criminal or revenue proceedings taken from the Arabic or Persian languages, but the traces of the conqueror are to be found in the geographical divisions of the country, in great cities, and in scores of rustic villages. Names of places are wholly Hindoo, wholly Mahommedan, or half one and half the other. The mukher form of Persian desmit is pisem, and has a Sanskrit termination tacked to it. Sometimes a celebrated place is known indiscriminately by its old and its new name. Agra becomes the city founded by Akbar. Delhi, where the fortunes of the Empire have so often been decided, is metamorphosed into the abode of Shah Jehan. Even Prayag, where meet the Jumna and the Ganges to charge Hindoos, becomes Allahabad. Patna—i.e. "the city"—the name of Hindoos—is called by Mussulmans Azim-abad, or the Mighty City. And Chittagong, far away on the shores of the Bay of Bengal, is Islam-abad or the Abode of the True Faith. Benares, or Kashi, the stronghold of Brahminical observance, has never, so far as we know, been given an alternative Mahommedan title.

To describe the architectural remains of Mahommedan reigns, viceroys or nawabs, soldiers of fortune, and petty states, would require a volume. It is sufficient to say that they erected mosques, palaces, and mausoleums, which in some plottings of design, elegance of structure, and richness of ornament, may fairly challenge comparison with any buildings in the world. We do not, of course, mean to say that they could build like the Romans, or sculpture like the Greeks, or to deny that their palaces are occasionally tawdry and their gardens ill arranged. But it is not difficult to select specimens of various kinds of buildings which would be pronounced unique and incapable of imitation. No pillar in the world is more striking than the Kutub. No sovereign was ever entombed in a mausoleum more capacious and magnificent than that of the great Akbar at Secundra; and, not to speak of the Pearl Mosque and the White Shrine at Futehpore Sikri, the builder of the Taj, if it were the creation of some Italian artist, as it is commonly held to be, has given us nothing simile aut secundum in palaces along the Arno, or in the chapels of the Medici.

The civil administration of the Mahomedans is best studied in the Travels of Tavernier and the sprightly letters of Bernier, who was a contemporary of Molière and a correspondent of Colbert. These authors had no theories to satisfy, and no object in drawing invidious comparisons between the European and the Oriental standards of government. The legitimate inference to be drawn from the accounts of these observant writers is, that the Mogul Empire was marked by occasional vigour and by general laxity and corruption, by insecurity of life and property, and by accumulations of wealth and magnificence at the capitals in terrible contrast to wretchedness and poverty in the provinces. Yet the Mahomedan criminal code, though crude, sanguinary, and not impartial, was far preferable to the inhuman code of pains and penalties, and to the legal and social inequalities, stereotyped by Hindoo lawgivers. No Kazi or Moulavi ever sanctioned perjury in his own edicts, as Manu did, though false evidence, in practice, is the failing of men of both creeds; and the wisest and best of Mahomedan sovereigns had all but put down by force the odious rite of Suttee, which escaped the notice of Wellesley, and was only temporized with by his successors, till it was summarily extinguished by the courageous and humane Bentinck.

The upshot of this review, then, is that a thoughtful and educated Mahomedan of the present day may well be pardoned if he looks back on the legacies bequeathed by his sovereigns to the Indian Empire with feelings of pride, and possibly with others which we have no great desire to analyse. The worship of one God, a graceful, polished, and useful literature, splendid architectural monuments, an improved system of collecting revenue and even of dispensing justice—these are certainly to be ranked in the category of benefits and reforms. And we may add that, in spite of some wholesale conversions and a good deal of fanatical intolerance, the conquered Hindoo had no permanent barrier raised against his advancement, and was often enabled to attain to eminence in the councils of the Emperor or the service of the State. On the other hand, we are compelled to declare our conviction that, if the Mahomedans are at present placed at a disadvantage in competing for prizes in the public service, the result is in a large degree due to themselves. Since the introduction of British rule, or certainly during the last forty years, no class of our fellow-subjects has been placed under any disability or disqualification. The difficulties long experienced by Roman Catholics and Dissenters in England have had no parallel whatever in Indian government. Nor was there any antecedent reason why Mahomedans as well as Hindoos should not turn out excellent Judges of Small Cause Courts, plead ably at the Bar, use the English language in debates and addresses, and sit with barrister and civilian Judges on the benches of the High Court. British statesmen have as clear a right to introduce English as the language of business and the avenue of preferment, as the Mogul Emperors had to introduce Persian. And it is wholly unreasonable for the Mahomedans and their partisans to insist that greater prominence should be given in our Indian Universities and Colleges to Arabic and Persian classics, and, as a natural consequence, that some ill-defined rewards or some unexplained public careers should be reserved for students who can quote Sadi and recite the "Seven Poems." The Mussulmans, like the race which they overthrew, must cheerfully accept the new order which has sprung out of their chaos, must remember that they are after all but one-eighth of the population, and must reflect that taxes are better raised for a scheme of railways and telegraphs than for the completion of the Taj Mahal on its original design. Where Mussulmans have set themselves in earnest to compete with Hindoos there has been no lack of success. They have shown themselves active policemen, attached servants, brave soldiers, wise statesmen, and excellent English scholars. No more signal instance of loyalty and devotion is to be found in the annals of the Mutiny than that of the Nawab on whom tardy honours were lately bestowed at Lucknow. No native Minister stands higher than Salar Jung. No principality has been better governed than the State of Bhopal. But these examples will not solve the Mahomedan difficulty any more than the chivalrous loyalty of the late Viscount will negative the existence of discontent among Fenians in Ireland, or disprove the necessity for over-awing dissection and treason by a judicious reserve of force.

PARLIAMENTARY PRIGS.

PRIGS must always have been prigs in Parliament, we suppose, but of late years they appear to have become more numerous, or at least more conspicuous. The increasing anarchy of Parliamentary habits, the loosening of party discipline, has given them a chance of pushing themselves unpleasantly into notice. A fluctuation may be observed in the prevalence of types of disease or physical weakness at different periods, and just now priggishness seems to be the predominant Parliamentary malady. Formerly the chief business of a member was to vote; he could listen to the debates or not, as he pleased, but he did not presume to take part in them. All the talking was done for him by the leaders; the principal men on each side tired off at each other, and the rest of the assembly was composed rather of jurymen than counsel. In the days when Lord Palmerston first entered the House of Commons, any great affair was debated, as his biographer regretfully reminds us, in a great manner by the leading men, and the art of debating was not lost in "a wilderness of commonplace remarks by commonplace men on commonplace subjects." What is still the fashion of the Lords was then the fashion of the Commons, and the discussion was kept up by a succession of important and authoritative speakers. But everybody speaks now, and everybody is as good as everybody else and better. There is no bashfulness, no modest reticence or reverent listening. A new member brings his subject with him, and perhaps a speech in his pocket, and waits at the table, after he has taken the oath, to claim a night for himself in the notice book. The returning officer's certificate of the state of the poll is regarded as a diploma of eloquence, wisdom, and political experience. The usefulness and dignity of the House of Commons are equally compromised by the recklessness with which questions are started for loose off-hand talk. The prig is in his element here. He need not follow suit to any one unless he chooses. He can pick out a subject to please himself, and can get it up at his leisure, and make a great show of his second-hand facts and borrowed arguments. He leads on his own question. The Government may be expected to look after the general business of the country, but on this particular subject he assumes to guide the House, lectures the Ministers, and gives himself all the airs of a Premier producing a great policy.

Reading over the list of notices given in the House of Commons, one might almost fancy that it was a programme of lectures for the season at some Mechanics' Institute in the country, or the questions to be propounded at a Young Men's Mutual Improvement Society. There is perhaps a good deal of room for mutual improvement, and discussion is in itself a wholesome exercise. But it would be well if members who feel the better for this sort of thing would be content with the tea-room on off nights, and would air their innocent gabble without retarding the business of the country. It may be necessary to teach our ministers their letters, and to supply them with elementary instruction on all sorts of questions, but it seems, to say the least, rather a waste of force to turn the House of Commons into a kind of political infant-school. It is not merely that there is a monstrous waste of time, but the attention of Parliament is distracted from the practical character of the work it has to do. The viewiness of the prig is becoming a Parliamentary vice. A petty item in the Estimates cannot be settled without a reference to first principles. There is nothing more enervating than large discussions on small questions. The large discussions may be needful, but there is a time and place for everything. It is not worth while to go to the roots of the Constitution when the question to be settled is only whether a twopenny rosette shall be provided for a beefeater's bonnet, or to mix up international arbitration and the wickedness of war with the Navy vote for rum. But the prig is nothing without first principles. He has his little stock of pragmatical conceits and abstract principles, and wants to make everything square with them; he does not see that he might as well expect mathematical lines to bear weights, or try to build a house with paper diagrams from Euclid. A University education, especially following upon the training at a public school, helps to save a man from this kind of priggishness. If he has gone through a course of debates at the Union he has usually got a good deal of yeast stuff worked out of him, and he is not likely if he happens to get into Parliament to start discussions as to the absolutely best form of government, the social contract, or the rights of man. He has, it may be hoped, got past that stage. He has learned that everything worth saying on these subjects was said before he was born, and that most people are quite aware that there is a sun in the sky, that water wets, and fire burns. He is ashamed to repeat the stale commonplaces, the trite similes, the cheap philosophy and venerable jokes which were once delivered with all the simple faith and gushing enthusiasm of youth. It is touching to observe a fresh young mind all aflow with the remarkable discovery that, if the government of the world were only left to the best and the wisest, everything would go well. But the measles and some other things are better got over in early life. Moreover the republic of gentlemen is hostile by instinct to the bumpiousness of the prig, and he is sure to suffer for it if he does not lower his pretensions, and condescend to mix with other men as equals.

On the whole, the chances are, that a man who has taken the University on his way to St. Stephen's has had the priggishness pretty well knocked out of him, but there is no contradiction in saying that perhaps the worst prigs are University men. It is natural that it should be so. If two priggishness survives in any marked degree the curative discipline to which it has been subjected, it must be deeply ingrained, and the case may be given over as hopeless. It is melancholy to find that all these advantages have been thrown away on a man who is still stumbling about among the axioms of politics, and who gets on the housetops to proclaim to the world that authority and honour are not invariably given to the wisest and most virtuous; or who fancies when he is spouting his copybook lines about the liberty of the subject, familiar passages from the Select Reciter and poor old Joe Millers, that he is tickling the House with his eloquence and wit, and making a great show of legid lore. The avocat who has taken to politics is a favourite subject of French satire, but Rabagas is at least genial and a bon enfant. The English type is sometimes less agreeable. The prig is not an ordinary prosier. We may suffer from a bore, and yet have a not unkindly feeling towards him, but the prig can hardly be regarded with the same equanimity. His calm assumption of superiority, his bumptious platitudes and patronizing wit constitute an irritant of the strongest kind, even without the cantankerous insolence which is occasionally added. Some people perhaps wonder how it is that such a clever fellow does not get on, how, with all his cleverness, he is outstripped by inferior men in the House or at the Bar. A little knowledge of human nature, a little of that common sense which enables a man to see the true proportions of things, and to take the measure both of himself and his associates, would probably save him from a good deal of mortification. The world is ready enough usually to take a man at his own estimate, if only it is sufficiently insistent on, but there must be some proportion between pretension and performance. When pebbles are bestowed as if they were diamonds, with an air of lofty and contemptuous patronage, the feelings of the recipients are apt to be neither grateful nor respectful.

An offensive and familiar form of priggishness is that of the commercial member, who has made his fortune in trade, and who thinks that the salvation of the country depends on its strict adherence to the sublime principles of the ledger and the petty-cash book. Soap-boiling has brought him wealth, local influence, and a profound conviction of his own wisdom and capacity as a man of business. He is satisfied that the difference between the management of a great manufacturing concern and the government of a nation is only a question of statistics. In a nation there are more people to be looked after, the transactions are on rather a larger scale, but that is all, in substance the two things are the same. The processes of government are therefore to be measured by the precedents of soap-boiling, and where they disagree it is the former that are faulty. For example, take the diplomatic service. There is nothing like that in connexion with soap-boiling. There are travellers, it is true, and agents, but they only get a commission on orders. What can be more monstrous than that a set of fine gentlemen should be eating their heads off and bringing in no returns? In an ordinary way letters and telegrams are enough, and if any special piece of business has to be negotiated, it would be cheaper to send an envoy paid by the job than to keep up a permanent staff. From this point of view argument would be wasted in showing that diplomacy is all humbug, fostered by self interest, and corrupted by corruption. The first principle of this school of administrative reformers is government by lowest tender. The plan might perhaps be a good one if everything could be got by contract at a moment's notice—capacity, experience, integrity, tried men and seasoned timber, an army efficient and equipped, a fleet ready for sea. No account is taken of the difference between sharp personal supervision and the only kind of supervision which can permanently be applied to the public service, of the tremendous interests at stake, or of the necessity of being always prepared for transactions which, if left to an emergency, would convulse and overthrow the markets. The work of politics, it has been said, is not a mere game of chess, neither is it exactly soap-boiling. There are human elements which come into play in rather a tumultuous and disturbing manner, and which cannot well be brought within the compass of a rule-of-three sum. But the prig conceives nothing except from his own personal standpoint, and insists that everything shall be shaped to suit his didactic views and limit his experience. This narrowness is the essence of political priggishness. Even if a principle is good, it cannot be absolutely applied in every case. Symmetry and uniformity are very well in their way, but the policy of a nation cannot be laid out at right angles like a garden by Le Notre. A Government must put to the test it can—the best being often only the least bad—and, at the risk of offending the doctrinaires, must sometimes decline to sacrifice substantial results by a pedantic adherence to consistency. There is plenty to be done before the world is set quite straight, but the prigs and whipper-snappers only waste time and muddle business. It is fortunate perhaps that, as the number of them is increasing, their ambitious egotism should keep them asunder, if, as was said of some other creatures, they were of one mind, and tugged one way, they might perhaps do serious mischief. As it is, every man must have his own subject, and nothing pleases him that does not conduce to his personal exaltation. Hence the swarm of questions on the notice-paper. Some day we shall perhaps read:—"Mr. Blank to call attention to the origin of evil and move a resolution," or "This House desires to express its conviction that the government of the country should be directed to the promotion of the True, the Beautiful, and the Good." At one moment during the last Session the House seemed to have attained this sublime height, when a member, full of the infinite importance of some special crotchet, slowly and solemnly announced that he would "early in the ensuing Session call attention to the utter inadequacy of all existing legislation," at which stage the House interposed between the broad statement and the limiting particulars by a burst of some three minutes' continuous cheering. Somehow the prig is not set upon as he ought to be. His pragmatic conceit and shallow pedantry have too much scope. Lord Palmerston used to laugh him out of countenance, and the prig fears laughter as the witch does holy water. But perhaps it is natural that priggishness should be luxuriant in such a serious family as the present House of Commons.

THE BLACK WATCH.

A MONUMENT has been dedicated at Dunkeld to the distinguished regiment originally raised in Perthshire which is called the Forty-second of the Line, and is better known in the Highlands as the Black Watch. The history of this famous corps cannot be better given than in the words of the elder Pitt, who anticipated the policy of enlisting the fervid loyalty of the Highlanders in support of the Hanoverian line of Kings. He sought for merit wherever it could be found. He looked for it in the mountains of the North, and he drew into the service of the State a hardy and intrepid race of men, who, when left by jealousy exposed to hostile machinations, had gone high to overthrow it. "These men," he said, "were brought to combat on our side. They served with fidelity as they fought with valour, and they conquered for us in every quarter of the world." A monument to the valour of the Black Watch commemorates also the sagacity of the Minister who could both plan campaigns and select instruments to execute them. The six companies to which this title originally belonged were raised as long ago as 1729. The soldiers were all, in their own estimation, gentlemen; and when King George gave a guinea to one of them who had performed his sword exercise before him, the insulted warrior flung the coin to the porter at St James's. They carried for many years the broadsword and target of their countrymen, as well as the musket which the Southern soldiery had vainly opposed to these weapons at Preston Pans. The six companies were augmented to ten in 1743, and after a mutiny, which was severely repressed, the regiment embarked for Flanders. They shared with the English Guards the disastrous honour of the battle of Fontenoy, which was fought two years later, and their tartan is conspicuous along with the red coat of the Guards in Horace Verelst's picture of Marshal Saxe on his sick bed receiving congratulations on his splendid victory. Their colonel, Sir Robert Monro, being a man of immense bulk, was obliged when his men threw themselves on the ground to avoid the French artillery, to remain standing, because he feared that if he lay down he might be unable to get up again. The regiment shared also in the Dutch campaigns of the two following years, but its gallantry and good conduct could not enable the Duke of Cumberland to cope on equal terms with Marshal Saxe.

In 1751 the regiment was regularly enrolled by its present number, and seven years afterwards it received the distinction of being called the "Royal" Regiment of Highlanders. Being employed about the same time in America, it displayed in an assault on the French fort of Ticonderoga the same resolute, but unavailing, valour which was shown long afterwards by a younger regiment of Highlanders before New Orleans. On both these dismal days the Scottish regiment engaged lost more than half its numbers before the ramparts which it failed to take. A few years later the French flag ceased to defy Britain in North America, and the regiment, having helped to conquer Canada, returned home. It was again sent to America when the colonies renounced their allegiance to the Crown, and it bore honourable part in all those battles of the War of Independence which both countries should now endeavour to forget. Returning again to Europe, it served with credit in the Netherlands under the Duke of York in 1794, and with eminent distinction under Abercrombie in Egypt in 1801, in that campaign which may be said to have been the cradle of the army which attained its full growth under Wellington in Spain. It had landed at Aboukir Bay under the eye of Moore, and in 1808 it marched with that general into Spain. At the crisis of the battle of Corunna he bade the regiment "remember Egypt!" Returning, after a first abortive campaign in Spain to England, its first battalion was sent in 1809 to the melancholy flats of Walcheren, while the second battalion returned in the same year to Spain. The regiment thus became identified with many of the most brilliant incidents of Wellington's campaigns. The experiment which had succeeded so well in raising the Black Watch was frequently repeated until the British army contained more Highland regiments than the Highlands could supply with men. From 1793 to 1809 those districts had furnished 70,000 men for national defence. But the long war had nearly depleted the Highlands of adults suited to military service. In the year of the time there were 800 Scotchmen and only twelve English and Irish. Indeed this has always been almost a pure Scottish corps, and therefore the cathedral of Dunkeld is fully entitled to the material of its exploits which has been lately placed there. The 7th Highlanders, called Ross-shire Buffs, the 7th Cameron, the 92nd Gordon, and the 93rd Sutherland Highlanders, had all been raised in 1793-6, and they all in 1809 were almost pure Scottish corps. It would perhaps be more accurate to say that they were pure Highlanders, and that the Black Watch, by this time the present had succeeded in its mission, and was the of forgetting the distinctions of Gael and Saxon, Jacobite and Hanoverian, and treating the military traditions alike of Highlander and Lowlander as the common heritage of Scotchmen. This process is now almost complete, and we sometimes see the 26th Cameronians, who represent the most unmixed Whiggery of Scotland, confounded with the 79th Cameron Highlanders, to whom properly belong the Cavalier glories of Lochiel. There were in 1809, besides the five regiments already mentioned, at least eight others which had been raised in Scotland, and at that time wore the kilt. But it was impossible to recruit all these regiments with Highlanders, or even with Scotchmen, and Englishmen objected to the kilt, which was therefore abolished in six regiments. The great popularity of everything that is distinctively Scotch, which dates from the publication of the Waverley novels, has caused the kilt to be restored to some of these regiments. We read lately that an opinion had been formed in France against the use of grey horses in war, and we feared that the time might come when the Royal North British Dragoons would no longer bear the name which they have made so famous of Scots Greys. The bonnet of the 42nd Regiment appears to the irreverent Southern mind fit for nothing but to frighten children. But it seems likely that the kilt will endure as long as the British army. Per mare per terram, and—what is worse—through furze-bushes, it has been worn right gallantly by the Black Watch for upwards of 130 years.

Of the kilted regiments of 1809, the 78th and 93rd did not go to Spain, but the 79th and 92nd shared equally with the 42nd the glories of Wellington's campaigns. A Cameron was killed at the head of the 79th at Fuentes d'Onor. Another Highland regiment, the 71st, was also greatly distinguished at this battle, as well as elsewhere in the Peninsula. The 42nd and 79th fought in the same brigade at the battle of Toulouse, and the former regiment suffered a particularly heavy loss in this, which was the last battle of the Franco-Spanish war. The 93rd Regiment had been sent about this time to America, where it dashed itself to pieces against the defences of New Orleans by a display of useless daring similar to that already mentioned of the 42nd Regiment at Ticonderoga. But all the Highland regiments which had served in Spain returned home after the battle of Toulouse, and they were all available for the army which was formed in Belgium to resist Napoleon after his return from Elba. The 42nd and 92nd were brigaded together under Picton, and in the next brigade to them, commanded by Kempt, was the 79th. These two brigades formed a division under Picton. It was the first division of British infantry that arrived at Quatre Bras when Ney, by order of Napoleon, attacked that position on the 16th June. The 42nd were charged by French cavalry before they could throw themselves into squares, and the two flank companies suffered heavily. The colonel, Sir Robert Macara, was killed here, and the command of the regiment was held successively by four officers within about as many minutes. The arrival of Wellington with other infantry relieved Picton's division from the extreme pressure which they had for some time endured, and Ney found himself unable with the force at his disposal to drive the allies from Quatre Bras. Next day Wellington withdrew his army into that position of Waterloo which is as familiar to many of us as Brighton Downs. All visitors to Waterloo remember that Picton's division was on the left flank—that is, the flank opposite to Hougomont. Picton was killed early in the day while advancing his two brigades to check D'Erlon's advance. The charge of Ponsonby's "Union" brigade of cavalry, of which the Scots Greys formed part, was made to relieve Picton's division from part of the pressure of D'Erlon's corps. The tale of Waterloo, by Erckmann-Chatrian, contains a vivid description of this charge by a French infantry soldier who must have had the Highland regiments of Picton's division in his front. The relief of the hardly pressed Black Watch by the Scots Greys was an incident of the battle on which Sir Walter Scott loved to dwell. He of course remembered that the 42nd was raised originally among the Whig clans of Campbell, Munro, and Grant, while the 2nd Dragoons are the identical corps which Claverhouse led against the Covenanters at Bothwell Bridge, and of which General Thomas Dalzell was the first colonel. It is said that when ces terribles chevaux gris made their reckless charge, some swift-footed mountaineers of the 42nd ran with them to seize the French artillery. It ought not to be forgotten, although we do not wish to wound the susceptibility of others, that the retreat—to put it mildly—of a Dutch-Belgian brigade placed Picton's division in peril which would have shaken less firm troops. The 71st Highlanders were further to the right of the line in the same brigade with the 52nd Light Infantry, which it assisted in that well-timed movement to which the repulse of the last effort of Napoleon was largely due.

The more recent exploits of the Black Watch are familiar to us all. The 42nd formed with the 79th and 93rd Regiments the Highland Brigade in the Crimea, which was commanded at the Alma by one of the best of Scottish soldiers, Sir Colin Campbell, afterwards Lord Clyde. In the Indian mutiny the same regiments, and also the 78th, bore part, and all these regiments bear "Lionel" upon their colours. There are of course other regiments in the service which can show a longer roll of service. Thus the 18th Royal Irish Regiment bears on its colours the inscription Victoria's Honourable Premium, in honour of a service which was performed before the eighteenth century began. The 2nd Regiment of the Life, or "Royal," boast themselves to be descended from the Scottish Archers of the Body Guard of the Kings of France. But we may say that the Black Watch have been everywhere and done everything, from their first raising to the present time. Some regiments and some officers are more fortunate than others, and while the 42nd was fighting at Toulouse under Wellington, the 93rd was fighting at New Orleans pretty much by the light of nature. It is expedient to preserve the glorious traditions of the various regiments of our army, and to give to these traditions a local habitation, which should be, if possible, in the district where a corps was originally raised. To invite a Highlander to enter the Black Watch or the Cameron or Gordon regiment is obviously a different thing from proposing to him to become a soldier of an army. We ought not to forget that, although the Black Watch has always been pre-eminently a Scotch regiment, there is an English hero, Ben Battle, who, at least in poetry, belonged to it. He lost at the same time his second leg and the Forty-second Foot. But we doubt whether his name will find a place upon the monument at Dunkeld.

DRAWING-ROOM EPIPHYTES.

IN every coterie we find certain stray damsels unattached; young ladies of personable appearance and showy accomplishments who go about the world alone, and whose parents, never seen, are living in some obscure lodgings where they pinch and scrow to furnish their daughter's bravery. Some one or two great ladies of the set patronize these girls, take them about a good deal, and ask them to all their dinners and "at homes." They are useful in their degree; very good-natured; always ready to fetch and carry in a confidential kind of way; to sing and play when they are asked—and they both sing and play with almost professional skill; full of the small talk of the day, and not likely to bore their companions with untimely discussions on dangerous subjects, or to startle them with enthusiasm about anything. They serve to fill a vacant place when wanted; and they look nice and keep up the ball as far as their own sphere extends. They are safe, too; and, though lively and amusing, are never known to retail gossip or talk scandal in public.

Who are they? No one exactly knows. They are Miss A. and Miss B., and they have collaterals of respectable name and standing; cousins in Government offices, dead uncles of good military rank, perhaps a father, dead or alive, with a quite unexceptionable profession; but you never see them with their natural belongings, and no one thinks of visiting them at their own homes. They are sure to have a mother in bad health, who never goes out and never sees any one; and if you should by chance come across her, you find a shabby, painful, peevish woman who seems at odds with life altogether, and who is as unlike her showy daughter as a raven is unlike a humming-bird. The drawing-room epiphyte introduces mamma, when necessary, with a creditable effort at indifference, not to say content, with her conditions; but if you can read signs, you know what she is feeling about that suit of rusty black, and how little she enjoys the rencontre. Sometimes she has a brother, of whom she never speaks unless obliged, and of whose occupation and whereabouts, when asked, she gives only the vaguest account. He has an office in the City, or he has gone abroad, or he is in the navy and she forgets the name of his ship; but, whatever he is, you can get no clue more distinct than this. If you should chance to see him, you get a greater surprise than you had when you met the mother; and you wonder, with a deeper wonder, how such a sister should have sprung from the same stock as that which produced such a brother. Sometimes, however, the brother is as presentable as the sister; in which case he probably follows much the same course as herself, and hangs on to the skirts of the Upper Ten who recognize him, preferring to idle away his life and energy as a well-dressed epiphyte of greatness rather than live the life of a man in a lower social sphere. But, as a rule, stray damsels have neither brothers nor sisters visible to the world, and only a widowed mother in the background, whose health is bad and who does not go out.

The ulterior object of the ladies who patronize these pretty epiphytes is to get them married; partly from personal kindness, partly from the pleasure all women have in bringing about a marriage that does not interfere with themselves. But they seldom accomplish this object. Who is to marry the epiphyte? The men of the society into which she has been brought from the outside have their own ambitions to realize. They want money or land, or a good family connexion, to make the sacrifice an equal bargain, and to gild the yoke of matrimony with becoming splendour. And the drawing-room epiphyte has nothing to offer as her contribution but a fine pair of eyes, a good-natured manner, and a pretty taste for music. To marry, therefore, well among the society in which she finds herself is almost impossible. And her tastes have been so far formed as to render a marriage into lower circumstances as impossible on the other side. Besides, what could she do as the wife of a clergyman, say on three hundred a year, with a poor parish to look after, and an increasing tribe of babies to feed and clothe? Her clear high notes, her splendid register, or her brilliant tenor, will not help her then; and the taste with which she makes up half-worn silk gowns, and transforms what was a rag into an ornament, will not do much towards finding the necessary boots and loaves which keep her sisters awake at night wondering how they are to be got. She has been taught nothing of the art of house-keeping, if she has learnt as much as she can of that of the drawing-room. She cannot cook, nor make a little go a long way by the cunning of good management and a well-marked economy; she cannot do serviceable needlework, though she may be great in fancy work, and quite a genius in millinery; and the habit of having plenty of servants about her has destroyed the habit of turning her hand to anything like energetic self-help. Epiphyte as she is, penniless stray damsel, more than half maintained by the kindness of her grand friends, she has to keep up the sham of appearances before those friends' domestics. And as ladyhood in England is chiefly measured by a woman's usefulness, and to do anything in the way of rational work would be a spot on her ermine, the poor epiphyte of the drawing-room, with mamma in rusty black at those shabby lodgings of theirs, learns to practise in self-defence all the foolish helplessness of her superiors; and, to retain the respect of the servants, loses her own.

What is she then but one of those misplaced beings who are neither of one sphere nor another? She is not of the grandes dames on her own account, yet she lives in their houses as one among them; she is not a woman who can make the best of things, notable and industrious, and by her clever contrivances of saving and substitution able to order a home comfortably on next to nothing, and yet she has no solid claim to anything but the "undercut" of the middle classes, and no right to expect more than the most ordinary marriage. She is nothing. Ashamed and unable to work, she has to accept gratuities which are not wages. Waiting on providence, and floated by her friends, she wanders through society ever on the look-out for chances. Each new acquaintance is a fresh hope, and every house that opens to her contains the potentiality of final success. To be met everywhere is the ultimate point of her ambition with respect to means; the end kept steadily, if fruitlessly, in view is that satisfying settlement which shall take her out of the category of a hunger-on, and give her a locus standi of her own. But it does not come. Year by year we meet the drawing-room epiphyte in the old haunts—at Brighton, at Ryde, at half-a-dozen good houses in London, on a visit to the friends who make much of her one day and snub her the next—and she does not go off. She is pretty, she is agreeable, she is well dressed, and she is accomplished; but she does not find the husband to whom all this is too precious to be foregone. Year by year she grows fatter or thinner as her constitution expands into obesity or shrivels into leanness, the lines about her fine eyes deepen, the powder is a little thicker on her cheeks, and there are more than shrewd suspicions of a touch of rouge or of antimony, with a judicious application of patent hair-restorer to lift up the faded tints. Fighting desperately with that old enemy Time, she disputes line by line the tribute he claims; and succeeds so far as to continue a good make-up for a year or two after other women of her own age have given in and consented to look their years. But the drawing-room epiphyte is nothing if she is not young, which is synonymous with power to interest and amuse. Her friends, the great ladies who hold drawing-rooms and gather society in shoals, want points of colour in their rooms as well as serviceable foils. The apple-pie that was all made of quinces was a failure, wanting the homely couche from which the savour of the more fragrant fruit might be thrown up. On the other hand there are social meetings which are like apple-pies without any quince at all; and then the epiphyte is invaluable, and her music worth as much in its degree as if she were a prima donna, each of whose notes ranked as gold. So that when she ceases to be young, when she loses her high notes, and has gout in her fingers, she fails in her only raison d'être, and her occupation is gone. Hence her hard struggles with the old enemy, and her half heroic, half tragic determination not to give in while a shred of power remains. On the day when she collapses into an old woman she is lost. She has nothing for it then but to withdraw from the brilliant drawing-rooms she has so long haunted into dingy lodgings in a back street, and live as her mother lived before her. Forgotten by the world which she has spent her life in waiting on, she has leisure to reflect on the relative values of things, and to lament, as she probably will, that she gave living grain for gilded husks; that she exchanged the realities of love and home, which might have been hers had she been contented to accept them on a lower social scale, for the barren pleasures of the day, and the delusive hope of marrying well in a sphere where she had no solid foothold. She had her choice, like others; but she chose to throw for high stakes at heavy odds, and in so doing to let slip what she originally held. The bird in the hand might have been of a homely kind enough, still it was always the bird; while the two golden pheasants in the bush flew away unsalted, and left her only their shadows to run after. On the whole, then, we incline to the belief that the drawing-room epiphyte is a mistake; that those stray damsels who wander about society unattended by any natural protector, and always more or less in the character of adventuresses, would do better to keep to the sphere determined by parental circumstances than let themselves be taken into one that does not belong to them, and which they cannot hold; and furthermore it seems to us that, beyond its present instability and future fruitlessness, the position of a drawing-room epiphyte is one which no woman of sense would accept, and to which no woman of spirit would submit.

MIDDLE CLASS EDUCATION AS IT IS.

THE reports of the local examinations which are held periodically under the direction of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge supply an interesting and instructive picture of the state of education throughout the country—at least among the middle classes. The candidates are no doubt to a great extent picked scholars. The schoolmasters naturally send their best pupils, as specimens of their powers of teaching; and if they have none who are likely to do them credit, they do not care to have the fact publicly advertised by the ignominious collapse of their representatives when taken in hand by competent examiners. It may be presumed that the candidates are, as a body, the crack scholars of the better order of schools, and that in point of education they are rather above the average of their age and class. After making the necessary allowance on this score, we are able to form a tolerably correct idea of the general standard of middle class education. It is impossible to doubt that the national movement which has now been started will produce important results, and that its influence will not be confined merely to those sections of the community which in the first instance will be brought immediately within its scope. The education of the labouring population will put the middle classes on their mettle. There is sure to be much discussion as to what should be done for the latter, and of course innumerable plans will be devised for their benefit. In the meantime it is well to know exactly how the matter stands, and what is the actual state of education. The fourteenth annual Report of the Syndicate appointed to conduct the Cambridge Local Examinations, which has just been issued, shows that last December examinations were held at forty-two centres, and that nearly 3,000 children were examined. There has been a steady and continued increase in the number of candidates entered for examination, and as the area is thus extended, it is natural that the percentage of those who distinguish themselves should somewhat decline, while the percentage of failures rises. With the girls this is especially the case. The number of senior girls who pass in honours has fallen in four years from twenty-three to eight per cent. of the number examined; the explanation being, we suppose, that whereas at first only exceptionally clever and well-trained girls were sent up, candidates of ordinary abilities are now emboldened to try their fortune. The number of girls who pass, but without obtaining honours, remains at much the same point as before, and it would appear that more attention is now paid to female education. In the remarks of some of the examiners we fancy we can detect something like a disposition to compare or contrast the relative abilities of boys and girls. Some of the examiners are attracted by the superior brightness and sharpness of the girls in answering questions on certain subjects, while other examiners are irritated by their rash confidence, their vagueness of language and ideas, and their self-complacent inaccuracy. It is complained that girls are apt to be too diffuse in composition, and one examiner thinks it "necessary to advise them to refrain from needless remarks and reflections." Perhaps he had the happiness of their future husbands in view.

In a commercial country arithmetic must necessarily occupy an important place in the education of the people. As far as shop-keeping goes, the arithmetical prospect is cheerful. The junior boys did well, and the senior boys showed a fair acquaintance with the ordinary rules; but the proportion of those who successfully worked out the higher examples, involving some independent thought, was small. This means, we suppose, that for ordinary trade purposes—for invoices and book-keeping—the rising generation possesses a sufficient stock of arithmetic; but beyond this much, or perhaps everything, remains to be done. The house-keepers of the next generation are also, we fear, likely to be at a disadvantage, unless they improve in what their grandmothers called ciphering. The percentage of failures among the junior girls was five times as great as among the boys; and although there was a slight improvement in the work of the senior girls as compared with last year, the percentage of failures was still very great, more than half the candidates being plucked. It is suggested that the chief causes of the girls' failure were "inaccuracy in the earliest rules, confusion of arrangement—contrasting most unfavourably with much of the boys' work, and undoubtedly the result of careless teaching—and, lastly, the use of obsolete and inaccurate methods, to be attributed to the employment of bad text-books." In grammar a general improvement is reported on the part both of boys and girls, though the latter would persist, much to the examiners' annoyance, in giving "derivations of grammatical terms from Greek and Latin, which were not required, and were usually incorrect." Dictation was, it seems, "by far the most fatal of the preliminary subjects," but the causes of this fatality are not explained; perhaps bad spelling was among them. We suppose handwriting is beneath the notice of academical examiners, as indeed it appears to be beneath the notice of schoolmasters generally, who are perhaps of Dogberry's opinion, that writing, if not reading, is a gift of God, and that it is not for man to meddle with it. What with steel pens, perpetual hurry, and want of proper teaching, the handwriting of the present race is distracting enough; and we shudder to think of the maddening hieroglyphics of the next. It is stated that "the practice of wasting time in the useless decoration of the papers has been almost entirely abandoned," and flourished eagles and other noble fests of ornamental penmanship will soon, we suppose, become a lost art, like the writing of samplers, and the neat, elegant, and unimpeachable handwriting of our grandfathers and grandmothers.

It is not unreasonable to refer the improvement which is remarked in the teaching of English history to the improved text-books which are now available. "A lack of interest and method was more noticeable among the junior boys than among the girls."

who, however, have yet to learn "how to condense information into a few terse sentences." The seniors of both sexes acquitted themselves satisfactorily, and had evidently got up their subject. The general breakdown of junior candidates in geography is probably to be attributed to a similar cause to that which accounts for their success in English history. While the text-books of history have been improved, those which profess to teach geography still belong to the dark ages of school-book literature. The knowledge of geography "was at once superficial and inaccurate, and bore the impression of careless and insufficient teaching; scarcely a candidate answered with any degree of accuracy a simple question of exports and imports." The seniors, however, appear to have done very well. The examiners are sadly disappointed at the incapacity of candidates to produce good essays. There are apparently no budding Addison or Macaulays now sharpening their quills, or rather we should say perhaps cross-nibbing their steel pens. It may be doubted whether the world will suffer acutely from this dearth of essayists. A large proportion of the juniors do not "even know what an essay is," and perhaps it is as well they should not. They will not be less happy themselves, and other people will not be pestered with bad and pretentious writing. Their seniors who have the advantage, or disadvantage, of them in this respect, produce essays which are "dull and spiritless," and we agree with the examiners that "the quantity of matter might well be curtailed." It is to be hoped that these children will find something better to do when they grow up than to write essays, which are pretty certain to be stupid, and which usually have a bad tendency to encourage priggishness of thought and expression, and the cultivation of that intolerable style which has been called newspaper English. It would be more to the purpose if boys and girls were taught to write a good, honest, straightforward letter, telling exactly what they see or think, in a plain, common-sense way. In the papers of the juniors on religious subjects "the diction of the boys descended sometimes to colloquial familiarity, sometimes far lower"—a depth which the horrified examiner leaves it to the imagination to conceive. Considering how much is now attempted to be taught in schools, the number of different subjects competing for attention, and the limited amount of time at the disposal of teacher and pupil, it is not surprising that there should be indications of superficial instruction. In this Report we find a complaint that juniors are not taught Latin with a view to sound scholarship; "their papers are only too suggestive of English versions and mechanical memories." The seniors came out of the ordeal more creditably, and in Greek both juniors and seniors did very well. The explanation of this is probably that Latin is taught merely as a matter of form, in order that it may be said that it is taught, while boys are put to Greek only when they show some aptitude for it. The examiners in French are not enthusiastic in their commendations; there is an improvement on former years, but "fairly creditable" is about the strongest praise they can bring themselves to award. There is a general agreement that in translation the girls are more spirited than the boys, but "translations from English to French were bad throughout." The result of the examinations in German was still less satisfactory. Many of the candidates could not translate even the passages which were set beforehand, and which might have been got up from "cribs." The impression which we derive from the reports on mathematics is that the juniors get up Euclid by rote, and are apt to give the right proposition with a wrong figure; that the seniors are not so easily caught out at Euclid, but are weak in "book-work," trigonometry, and applied mathematics. Zoology and botany are thrown in as a make-weight to compensate for deficiencies in the systematic discipline of classics and mathematics. We can hardly say we are surprised to hear that "a very common fault of students in zoology is the guessing of the answers to questions about which they know nothing"; that very few of the answers in botany "show an accurate or practical knowledge of the subject"; or that in chemistry "the papers of a majority of boys abound in references to theories of chemistry, while they show ignorance of the commonest chemicals and the simplest experimental laws," and "draw no distinction between matters of theory and of fact." As to geology, most of the candidates "appeared to have only an imperfect recollection of an elementary course of lectures, or of some very brief text-book." We are afraid that the teaching of natural history and natural philosophy is still very much in the hands of "Ph.D.'s" and graduates of Philadelphia, who make believe to teach these things because nobody would believe them if they professed to teach anything else.

DR. DÖLLINGER ON THE ENGLISH REFORMATION.

AS the course of lectures which Dr. Döllinger has recently been delivering at Munich on the "Reunion of the Churches" is already advertised to appear in an English translation, we may have a future opportunity of noticing them as a whole. But there is one, the penultimate lecture of the series, which has a special interest for Englishmen, as giving the learned Professor's view of the Reformation in this country and of the National Church. It is often useful to be able "to see ourselves as others see us"; and, although in this case the observer is a friendly and appreciative rather than a hostile critic, and has formed an estimate remarkably accurate in many respects which prevails among high Anglican authorities, still it comes to us with a weight and character of its own, as the criticism of an outsider who is also a man of acknowledged learning and breadth both of mind and sympathy. We have only as yet, it is true, the report of the lectures in the Allgemeine Zeitung to go by, but it seems to be a pretty full report, and we shall probably not run any risk of misinterpreting the author's meaning in our use of it. We may premise that Dr. Döllinger had spoken in earlier lectures of the Reformation generally as a European movement, and especially of its two chief leaders, Luther and Calvin. In the present discourse he is dealing with the English Reformation exclusively, and as its history illustrates the subsequent position of the Church of England and the state of parties within her pale. And he very properly begins by pointing out that England was, in one sense, peculiarly prepared to receive the seed transplanted from Germany to her shores, and that not so much from the teaching of those "precursors of the Reformation," Wicliffe and the Lollards, who seem never to have achieved any wide or permanent influence in the country, as from the half-ecclasiastical, half-political antagonism to Roman tyranny and extortion which had constantly found expression from the lips of our Kings and Parliaments since the end of the thirteenth century.

The origin of the English Reformation was very much what these antecedents might have led us to expect. Taking its immediate occasion from the quarrel of Henry VIII. with the Pope about the divorce question, it "received its impulse, rule, and form, not from the bosom of the people, as in Germany, but from above, from the sovereign." There was no reformer of commanding moral or intellectual power at its head, no Luther, or Calvin, or Melancthon; and its theologians, such as they were, did but borrow, and usually dilute in the process, the ideas struck out at Wittenberg or Zurich. Hence, too, the movement had so little distinctive religious individuality of its own, and owed so much more to national than to theological sentiment. Macaulay has hardly exaggerated its insular character when he says in a well-known passage, that "the Reformed Church of England existed for England alone, and was an institution as purely local as the Court of Common Pleas, utterly without any machinery for foreign operations." It sprang, in short, "from a compromise," as the same writer elsewhere observes. Dr. Döllinger does not quote Macaulay, but he describes how the compromise first originated, when Henry VIII. undertook to organize a Church, Catholic in all respects except in being out of communion with the Pope, and professing to remain, as in all outward appearance it did remain, still a part of the world-wide Catholic body, of which the Roman Church was only another branch, but with himself for its Pope. There was no change of doctrine, but much change of practical discipline. And to this compromise the whole English clergy, with the exception of Bishop Fisher, submitted. It was hardly possible in any case that matters should have continued in statu quo after Henry's death. But in fact Rome had already exhibited what the lecturer calls "a judicial blindness" which made return impossible. Clement VII. had been content to excommunicate Henry VIII., but in 1538 his successor, Paul III., took a step which seemed as if expressly designed to alienate the nation for ever from allegiance to the See of Rome. He not only excommunicated and deposed the king, but laid the kingdom under interdict, depriving its inhabitants of all rights, civil and spiritual, and handed it over to the first orthodox invader who might be able to seize and hold it. The Bull had no direct results, but it no doubt contributed to the further development of the Reformation after Henry's death. The lecturer passes lightly over Edward's reign, during which Somerset and Cranmer were at the head of affairs, merely observing that, while their Protestant policy provoked several revolts among the people, the clergy was the class which most readily succumbed to every fresh change. From Mary's ill-omened reign Dr. Döllinger dates, correctly enough we believe, the true origin of English Protestantism. Till then the nation had remained at heart Catholic. It needed a stronger hand than Edward's and a more persuasive voice than Cranmer's to convert it to the new faith. And the impulse came from without, and from the fiercest assailant of that faith, "the terrible Paul IV.," as the lecturer calls him, "who saw the only salvation for Italy and the world in the prisons and piles of the Inquisition." It was under the auspices of his legate, Cardinal Pole, who was the real ruler of England both in religious and temporal matters, that the terrible persecution broke out in which three hundred lives were sacrificed in the space of three years. Dr. Döllinger considers that Pole, who was himself accused of heresy, and who had certainly at an earlier period of his life been one of the most zealous of the reforming party at Rome, with Sadolet, Contarini, and Caraffa (afterwards Paul IV.)—men who desired to mediate between the adherents of the old and the new theology—took this way of clearing his reputation for orthodoxy. He is so accurate a writer that we should scruple to say he is mistaken, and we are of course aware that both Mr. Froude and Dr. Hook may be quoted on the same side. But we confess that we should like to see some stronger proof of Pole's active complicity with the burning policy than has yet been produced, and we hope Dr. Döllinger will enter more fully into the question when his lectures come to be published in extenso. That he is perfectly right in his comment on the results there can be no doubt at all. It is undoubtedly true that hundreds of thousands of Protestant books spread over the length and breadth of England would not have done so much to further the cause as the fire of Smithfield, and that the flame then lighted has burnt on, according to Latimer's dying prophecy, to this day. "If the hatred of everything which England calls Popery shows itself stronger and deeper after three centuries than in any other land, Queen Mary and her advisors are its authors, though it was no doubt confirmed afterwards by the Gunpowder Plot."

The great mass of the population was, however, still Catholic on the accession of Elizabeth, and, had Julius III. lived three years longer, or Pius IV. succeeded to the Papal throne a year sooner, the new Queen, who was at first undecided in her religious attitude, would probably have come to an understanding with Rome. But Paul IV., once a member of the reforming party, had adopted the spirit as well as the name of the Pope who deposed Henry VIII. He met her overtures with a peremptory claim to the absolute disposal of the English throne, and a denial of her legitimacy; and in the famous Bull Cum ex Apostolatus officio, recapitulated and even exaggerated the extremest pretensions of the haughtiest of his predecessors. Elizabeth replied by the Oath of Supremacy, which Dr. Dollinger observes that only 189 out of the 9,400 clergy refused; and he justly contrasts their tame submission with the courage of the thousands who sacrificed their benefices rather than acquiesce in the Puritan changes under the Commonwealth, and of the two thousand Puritan ministers who refused to submit to the restored Episcopal Church in 1662. This must, however, refer to a somewhat later period in Elizabeth's reign, when the feud between Papists and Protestants had grown irreconcilable; for the Government at first was anxious not to push matters to extremities, and in 1559 only 866 of the clergy took the Oath of Supremacy, some declining, but the great majority simply absenting themselves, and their absence being quietly connived at. Many of them, indeed, continued for some years to say the Latin mass in private, if not in public, while some combined the Latin and English forms. The bishops, however, who could not be thus passed over, were less compliant than under Henry VIII., and with a few exceptions stood their ground; and accordingly "new bishops were appointed, and validly ordained according to ecclesiastical rules, so that the episcopal succession was not then interrupted." The Liturgy of Edward VI., altered in a Catholic sense—the lecturer of course means the Second Liturgy—was again imposed by law, and the Thirty-nine Articles, "containing substantially the Protestant doctrines, but in a modified and conciliatory form"; and thus the edifice of the English Episcopal Church was completed. It differed from all the Reformed Churches of the Continent, but Elizabeth was more and more driven by political exigencies, as the head of the Protestant interest in Europe, to seek union with them. Meanwhile seminaries for training English priests "in the strictest Catholic system" were established on the Continent, and these seminarians, together with Jesuit missionaries, began to be introduced into the country in 1570, up to which time the great mass of English Catholics had regularly attended the established worship. But in that year Pius V., who had been among the fiercest of inquisitors, and, according to the Roman Breviary, was expressly raised by God to the Papal throne to crush heretics, put out the Bull In Canis Domini, which left his English adherents no choice between rebellion and apostasy. It anathematized not only the Queen herself, but all who acknowledged her sovereignty, "so that all Catholics who did not rebel were excommunicated, and it must have appeared to be the one object of this Pope, who had already tried to get the Queen assassinated, to stir up a general insurrection and bloody civil war in England." A series of plots, conspiracies, and rebellions followed, and the Queen's life "was daily threatened, and more so than any other in Europe," the design of the Romanizers being to place Philip of Spain on the throne. In 1585, when the Armada was fitted out, Sixtus V. issued a fresh Bull of excommunication and deposition against Elizabeth. "In view of those acts and Bulls of his predecessors, a later Pope, Urban VIII. (1623) declared that it was those Popes, Paul III., Pius V., and Sixtus V., who were responsible for the loss of England to the faith."

The English Government naturally enough met these measures by severe laws against the missionary priests, and several of them were executed, but always, it was alleged, on political, not religious, grounds. And Dr. Dollinger admits the justice of the plea. They were asked at first whether they would obey the Pope or their own Sovereign in civil matters, and those who replied in the latter sense were spared. But the Jesuits had systematized their doctrine of tyrannicide, and were teaching it far and wide by writing and word of mouth, and every monarch deposed by the Pope became at once an usurper and tyrant. Nor was the doctrine a mere abstract theory, as was shown by the murder of Henry III. of France, the frequent attempts on the life of Henry IV. and the Prince of Orange, and the "Satanic" Gunpowder Plot, in which English Jesuits were deeply implicated. And hence English Catholics were required, under James I., to abjure the deposing power, and the right of murdering princes excommunicated or deprived by the Pope, as a condition of toleration. But Paul V. forbade them to take the oath on pain of being refused the sacraments, and Bellarmine composed a work expressly devoted to proving its unlawfulness. To James himself, who wished to cultivate friendly relations with the Court of Rome, Paul V. replied that to deny the deposing power was heresy. It is not wonderful that the Catholics, who at the accession of Elizabeth had formed the immense majority of the population, should have dwindled by 1630, according to their own reckoning, to 150,000, notwithstanding all the labours and sufferings of the Seminary priests who had striven for above half a century to fan the dying flame. Their unhappy condition, with treason and tyrannicide sedulously taught by their Jesuit instructors and imposed on them as articles of faith, was again and again urged on the attention of the Curia, but in vain. Rome was inexorable. Innocent X., in the middle of the seventeenth century, repeated the sentence of his predecessors against all English Catholics who took the oath of allegiance; "the right of the Popes to depose kings, abetive subjects from their oaths, and enjoin rebellion was preserved inviolate."

The English Reformation was thus, according to Dr. Dollinger, from first to last, the act, not of England, but of Rome. It was forced on the Government, and through the Government on the nation—and that in the main against its religious convictions—by the Popes themselves. The original breach occasioned under Henry VIII. by the affair of the divorce was rendered irreparable by the suicidal violence of Paul III.; the temporary restoration of Catholicism under Mary only paved the way for the conversion of the nation to Protestantism through the burning policy of Paul IV., who also forced Elizabeth against her will into an attitude of definite antagonism; Pius V. and Sixtus V. made Catholicism in England synonymous with treason, and their successors continued, in spite of all entreaty and remonstrance, to enforce the connexion under pain of excommunication. And thus, without any commanding moral impulse such as was given in Germany by Luther, without a single theologian of mark among the reformed divines, or a single man of conspicuous learning or piety among the reforming bishops, the national religion was transformed during less than half of a single reign from Catholicism to Puritanism. The subsequent development of the English Church, and of the reactionary movement instituted by "the Laudian school, the precursor of the Oxford or Ritualistic school of to-day," opens up a fresh chapter in the history of the religious life of England, which we cannot enter upon here, but which the lecturer has discussed with his wonted candour and penetration, and with a minute acquaintance, as rare as it is remarkable, with circumstances and modes of thought of which he can have had no personal experience.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

CHIEF among the shifting signposts that mark the advance of civilization is the tone of a people with regard to the treatment of animals. Savages, as a rule, have little feeling in the matter; and yet, perhaps, on the whole their beasts have no great cause for complaint. For good or for evil, they share the lot of their masters. An Indian's mustang may be overriden, an Esquimaux dog may be overtaken; but there is much of the dolce far niente in their existence. For a great part of the year they revel in the grazing of unlimited prairie land, or gorge themselves on the refuse of superabundant fish. As for African poultry and Polynesian pigs, their existence may be regarded as infinitely more enviable than that of their masters. They are suffered to fatten in peace, while their owners are slaughtering, capturing, and torturing each other in internecine strife. If they do occasionally fall as an offering to the fetish, the pangs of a lingering death are not regarded as part of the acceptable sacrifice to the deity, and in blissful unconsciousness they meet the sharp stroke of the priestly knife. It is rather in the intermediate stage that animals are worse off, when men get overcrowded, receive arts and laws, and begin to take order with themselves. A want of elbow-room leads to a struggle for existence, and is followed by a craving for artificial excitement. Dumb animals go to the wall; they are over-worked and under-fed. There is no educated opinion to take them under its protection; there are no special laws to protect them from ill-usage. Hence, as men are forbidden to compel their fellows to play at murder, as the populace is denied the satisfaction of gloating over human forms writhing in a blood-stained arena, they fall back on the next best thing, and entertain themselves with bull-fights, cock-fights, and Roman horse-races. We English have certainly earned the right to speak on this subject, and in the course of a generation or two have made some progress in humanity. Public feeling has set strongly against all that savours overtly of inhumanity; we have passed some stringent laws in the same sense, and can boast an energetic and well-organized Society whose object is to enforce them. And yet we may perhaps speak with the more persuasiveness since we have little right to give ourselves airs of superiority. It is not so very long ago that badger-baiting, dog-fighting, and cock-fighting held recognized rank among our "manly" sports. The cock-fight, indeed, was far more of an institution among our magnates than the training-stable is nowadays, inasmuch as the birds could be bred, fed, trained, and fought more cheaply and easily than horses. We say nothing of the prize-ring; for those who entered it ranked by courtesy as something better than the brutes, and, to do them justice, they sometimes were so. The English upper classes were guilty of practising fashionable, systematic, and gratuitous cruelty, and yet one thing we may fairly urge in extenuation. A certain rough spirit of fairplay presided at these "amusements." The animals were paired before they were pitted, the man who matched and fought them generally delighted in sports that required them to harden and danger. A typical patron of the Ring and everything sporting was probably "a proper man of his time," himself, had often proved his manhood in his own and his country's sports, and had strained highly-trained muscles over some well-earned

This, we conceive, is where we may really have cause for self-conviction in contrasting ourselves with our neighbours. The Southern races, notably Italians and Spaniards, please themselves with spectacles where cruelty is the object, not a mere incident. We do them no injustice in saying so; it has been an immemorial tradition of their training, and ancient and contemporary history can be quoted in proof of it. As the effeminate Roman gallant of the Lower Empire, floating in purple and fragrant with essences, lolled critically over the arena where hardy barbarians were matched in the death-struggle, where helpless martyrs were being rent limb from limb by Libyan lions and Hyrcanian tigers, so the Romans of our day gather from palaces as from hovels to the horse-races at a holiday blessed by his Holiness, and often graced by his sacred presence. We know what those horse-races are; we have often heard of them, if we have not seen them—a dozen or so of miserable screws, scared to death as they gallop over greasy pavements between yelling crowds, till they scarcely feel the balls with the spikes that, tearing from their trappings and gore their flanks. In the same way the modern Iberian exchanges the excitement of cards and rattling roulette at the club for the comfortable seat where he can calmly abandon himself to his sensations as the slow drama of the bull-fight works on to its inevitable termination. Unlike the game-cock and the British bull-dog, both Roman horses and Spanish bulls are made passively to minister to pleasures which they never share. The horses are in abject terror when they are not in mortal pain. The bull enters, morose, shy, and sullen, to be goaded slowly into the ungovernable rage that betrays him to the organized attack of his enemies. The game can have but a single ending. Let the bull charge as gallantly as he will, he must at last be trailed out ignominiously at the tail of the mulas. No grace is given him, even if he gladden the hearts of the crowded ring with the sight of a dozen of disembowelled horses, spurred staggering about the arena to the plaudits of bright-eyed beauties. It seems to us to be pushing charity to absurdity to say that a people is not deliberately cruel when, from the highest to the lowest, it encourages sports like these. It is quite another thing, however, to assert that the public may not be brought to think and act differently, although, when immemorial practices of this sort are general, education must necessarily be a work of time.

When these are the national sports, it follows almost necessarily that the brutes will have small consideration shown them in matters that concern the everyday business of life. We can vouch from personal experience that the Times Correspondent who has been writing lately on this subject from Rome rather tones matters down than exaggerates them. For instance, he mentions with a discreet reserve the assurance given him by an acquaintance that it is the Italian practice to skin kids alive for the sake of enhancing the quality of the skin. We recollect an Italian cook of prepossessing exterior, and with excellent testimonials to character, and to all appearance a most respectable person, who owned to habitually skinning rabbits alive. She chanced to be detected in the act, owing to the heartrending cries of the wretched animals, and certainly she could neither plead thoughtlessness nor doubt that they were suffering acutely. As for horses, Italy is their Inferno. An average vetturino animal would fancy himself transported to paradise if he woke in the shafts of a London four-wheeler. You may see in regular employment gaunt skeletons whose anatomy seems to work by such posthumous vitality as continues motion in a guillotined trunk or a decapitated eel. They have just sufficient flesh on their bones to tempt the poisonous horse-flies that swarm in the rich Lombard lowlands or invigorate their venom in the lower ranges of the Alps. Frequently you see them obviously lame when starting on a journey of a week's duration. Often you may detect the twitch and shudder each time the miserable animal raises and bends its broken knee. How they sustain even such animation as they show on the wretched sustenance they are supplied with, is a standing mystery to the traveller who observes them from the coupé of his lumbering vehicle. He may suffer in their sufferings, yet, humane as he may be, what can he do but go home to England? If he appeals to the vetturino's feelings, or even to his interests, the man would only laugh in his face, unless influenced by the idea of the buona-mano. So long as he is temporary master of the unhappy cattle, the stranger may procure them some alleviation of their sufferings. If he elect to repudiate his contract and forfeit his money, he knows that they will have to work on all the same in less considerate service. If he try his luck with another carriage-master, it is more than likely that he will not change for the better. Yet beneath the horse of the vetturino are lower depths still. Take, for instance, such promiscuous carriages as the Neapolitan corricolo. The vetturino permits his horse to have his scudo; the corricolo driver, never. The former must perforce set some limits to his load; the latter none whatever. With priests and peasant women sitting three or four deep in the lofty body, with men and lads clustered along the shafts like flies, with children heaped in the net below like oranges, the corricolo horse is condemned to a perpetual shambling gallop, fore and hind legs alternately doing the work by spasmodic jerks. To be sure they move on roads that would be tolerable but for the clouds of dust that stifle their panting lungs. There they have the advantage of their brethren whose lot is cast in cities. The stranger in Rome, where the taste for riding is so prevalent, would almost as soon think of taking his morning canter on the ice of the Capriccio as of trusting himself on horseback within the city gates. He performs the city part of his picnic journey to Ostia or Veil in a four-wheel carriage. Thus he ensures the safety of his own legs and ribs, separating his fate from that of the horses that draw him. Slipping about on smooth pavements, in perpetual peril of a strain, no wonder that Roman horses get nervous. Even the most fortunate of them, those sleek animals which amble in the coaches with the symbolical umbrella overhead, seem to get an anxious look about the eyes. It can only be the repeas of the annual villaggiatura that keeps them in tolerable condition, for elsewhere they can know no peace of mind from the time they are taken up from the breeding-grounds of the Campagna. As for the less lucky beasts, born in or descended into the hard service of the Roman plebs, sprains and strains go for nothing with them. They must stumble along in life till nature shakes itself to pieces.

In short, there is so much to be done by an Italian Society for the suppression of cruelty to animals, that we can well understand philanthropists shrinking back in discouragement. Their field is co-extensive with the Peninsula. It would be invidious, if not impossible, to institute prosecutions for acts that are of hourly, if not inevitable, occurrence. You must have horse labour in Rome, and until Rome is entirely repaved the Roman horses must suffer horribly. It would be impossible to license Neapolitan corricoli to carry only a limited number of passengers without exciting the lazzaroni and contadini to rise under some modern Masaniello. Unless you are prepared to restore the terraced gardens of the Apennines to their natural barrenness you cannot compel a peasant who has nothing but furze and cabbage-stalks to feed his starving donkey properly. Yet the fact of the evil being so grave and so general should only be an argument the more for dealing with it. Everything must have a beginning, and the natural beginning is to preach down from higher places to popular opinion by precept and example. In England we boast with some reason of our humanity, yet there are blots enough lingering in our social system in contempt of sentiment or defiance of law. Were our horses houyhnhnms, they would have plenty of scope for agitation in vindication of their rights. The grand staple-chaos of the season shows a list of casualties which might have shocked any unsophisticated Southerner who assisted at it. We too often parch and starve our cattle as they travel to market. A good deal of needless maiming and crippling goes on at our battues, and the middle of the nineteenth century has witnessed the introduction of pigeon-shooting as a fashionable entertainment for the fair sex. Still, in spite of all, we have laws on the statute-book which we are willing to enforce, and there is no question as to the tone of English public feeling. If the Italians mean to assert the position in civilization to which they are entitled to aspire, they may as well decide on promptly starting in the path which they must surely tread sooner or later.

KIRKSTALL.

THE great Cistercian movement of the twelfth century has left its mark in a singular way on the taste and speech of the nineteenth. The companions of St. Bernard are the men who, if they have not, like Sultan Mahmoud, supplied us with ruined villages, have at least supplied us with ruined abbeys. We believe that there is a class by no means small among articulate-speaking men to whom the word "abbey" simply means "ruin," except perhaps when the name is transferred to houses built "in the abbey style," which commonly means that they have pointed windows without any tracery. What is thought of "abbeys" in such an exceptional state as those of Westminster and Bath it is not for us to guess. It is so distinctly understood that an abbey, to be an abbey, must be unroofed and have its walls broken down, that it is not unnaturally inferred that every building in such a state must be an abbey. A castle is perhaps an exception. We do not remember to have heard of Caernarvon or Chesham Abbey. Otherwise abbeys are ruins, and ruins are abbeys. What people think the abbeys were before they were ruined, or whether they think that they were, like some freaks of modern caprice, built as ruins from the beginning, is a mystery too deep to be pried into.

All this mainly comes of the Cistercians. A ruined abbey is commonly a Cistercian abbey. The rule is not universal, but it is near enough to make it a presumption that a monastic ruin of the regulation kind is Cistercian. The older houses, the Benedictine houses, for the most part either arose in towns, or else towns rose around them. Now in a town a genuine picturesque ruined abbey can hardly be. The practical necessities of town life cannot afford to devote any large space of ground to the pious contemplation of ruins. And the picturesque associations of the genuine "abbey" are hardly possible in the midst of a busy centre of men. The great mass of the Benedictine buildings have therefore either utterly perished or else exist, wholly or partially, as cathedral or parochial churches. The large class of churches which were divided between the monks and the parishioners supplied that class of mutilated buildings where the nave is standing and the choir has perished. But a Benedictine church, neither destroyed nor preserved nor cut in half, but surviving in the form of a picturesque ruined abbey, though perhaps not absolutely unknown, is certainly far from common. It was the Cistercian movement of the twelfth century which covered the vales and river-sides of England with those religious houses which still exist in the form of the "ruined abbeys" of popular speech. That movement in England was the counterpart of the Benedictine movement in Normandy a hundred years earlier. Then we read that no Norman nobleman thought his estate perfect unless he had planted a colony of monks in some corner or other of it. So it was in England, especially in Northern England, in the days of the Cistercian reform. The causes which gave the movement a special vogue in Northern England are obvious. Northumberland was left almost without monks through the whole time between the coming of the Danes and the coming of the Normans. A few Benedictine foundations arose in the period of the Conquest itself. The hut of a wanderer from Auxerre grew by William's own help into the great minster of Selby. Ealdwine and his companions from Winchcombe revived the monastic life at Jarrow and Monk-Wearmouth, and from them the Benedictine rule spread to the great church of Durham itself. The metropolitan church at York always remained secular, but, just beyond the walls of old Eboracum, Earl Siward's church of St. Olaf of Gaimanbo grew into the Abbey of St. Mary. This was about all between Tient and Tyne—a contrast indeed to the crowd of great monastic houses in that diocese of Worcester from which Ealdwine set forth and with which the see of York long kept up so close a connexion. The land indeed lay open as the chosen field for the new monastic movement. Yorkshire, with its hills, and dales, and rivers, its natural wastes and the artificial wastes created by the stern policy of the Conqueror, was ready made to be occupied by Cistercian settlements. The monks of the new rule deliberately shunned the haunts of men. Whether they deliberately sought for scenes of natural beauty may be doubted; but at all events they stumbled upon them. When men set out to seek uninhabited places where the two great necessities of wood and water are to be found in plenty, the chances are that, whether they design it or not, the sites which they light upon will turn out to be highly picturesque. The Cistercians occupied wildernesses, and they carried with them agriculture and the arts. But it rarely happened that a Cistercian abbey became the nucleus of a town, like the more ancient houses of Peterborough and Crowland. The growth of modern towns has sometimes invaded the Cistercian retreats, but while the monasteries lasted, the Cistercians probably discouraged the growth of younger towns, just as they avoided choosing the older towns as a dwelling-place. Hence it follows that the Cistercian monasteries have seldom been, like the Benedictine, either entirely swept away or preserved, wholly or partially, as existing churches. Sometimes they have become private dwelling-places, as at Woburn and Newstead. But more commonly their skeletons or ghosts survive in the form of ruined abbeys. They have been unroofed and dismantled, but it has seldom been the interest of any one wholly to pull them down. For the same reasons, the ruined Cistercian abbey commonly preserves its monastic buildings in a more perfect state than any other. When a Benedictine monastery survives as a parish church, its domestic buildings have commonly utterly vanished; now and then some fragment is turned to lay uses. When it survives as a cathedral church, the monastic buildings have been cut up into canons' houses. The Cistercian houses commonly still keep their refectories, dormitories, and the rest, neglected, ruined, mutilated, it may be, but at least not turned into probendal drawing-rooms and nurseries.

The result of this peculiar destiny of the Cistercian houses has been that they have won a higher place in popular estimation than they in strictness deserve. Few Cistercian churches were absolutely of the first rank. Fountains stands almost alone in having any claim to rank alongside of Benedictine churches like Gloucester, Peterborough, and Glastonbury. But, while they attract the common observer by their picturesque sites and by the vague charm which seems to attach to their ruined state, they supply the scientific inquirer with better opportunities than can be had anywhere else of studying the domestic arrangements of a monastery. And the churches themselves, though not rivaling the vast scale of the episcopal and greater abbatial churches, constantly present forms of the highest architectural beauty. A large proportion of them are built in the purest form of the graceful style of the thirteenth century. Others belong, to a somewhat earlier time, in cases where churches have been preserved which date from the first foundation of the monasteries in the twelfth century. As belonging to the later days of Romanesque, they supply excellent studies of the stages by which that style gradually gave way to the fully developed forms of Gothic art.

Among this earlier class a high place must be given to the well-known abbey of Kirkstall. Its picturesque site on a hill-side gently sloping to the Aire is now hardly clear of the smoke of Leeds and its suburbs, at the time of its foundation the place must have been a wilderness. It was chosen, like so many other monastic sites, as being rich in the two great monastic necessities of wood and water. It is described in the local history as "locus nemorosus et frugibus intecundus, locus bonis fere destitutus, præter ligna et lapides et vallem amœnam cum aqua fluminis quæ vallis medium præterfluebat." But, as at Bec and in so many other cases, the site on which the monastery was finally fixed was not that which had been first chosen. The history, which will be found in the fifth volume of the Monasticon, is well worth reading, as an example of the difficulties and vicissitudes which seem always to have beset the early years of a newly founded monastery. For our purpose it is enough to say that the existing buildings of Kirkstall Abbey, of the foundation of Henry of Leicestershire, a grandson of the famous Ilbert of Domesday, were begun in 1153 by the first Abbot, Alexander, who had been Prior of Fountains, and who led his spiritual solway from that monastery, itself then a foundation of only about twenty years' standing, to their new home at Kirkstall. Abbot Alexander sat for thirty years, and we read that within that time he carried on architectural works with remarkable zeal and success. He was able during his lifetime to build all the chief buildings of the monastery in a permanent form. He built the church, cloister, chapter-house, two dormitories, two refectories, and the other buildings that were needed. In the words of the history:—

In diebus illis erecta sunt ædificia de Kirkstall ex lapide et lignis delatis. Ecclesia videlicet et utrumque dormitorium, monachorum adlocet et conversorum, utrumque etiam refectorium, claustrum, et capitulum ab aliis officinæ infra abbatiam necessariis, et hæc omnia tegulis optime cooperta.

The Abbot was unusually lucky in being able to carry out such great works during a first incumbency. Few first abbots of any order lived, like Alexander and the more famous Herwin of Bec, to see their societies so thoroughly organized and possessed of such a perfect and elaborate set of buildings. And we may count him lucky also in that so large a portion of his work still exists for our own study. The church of Kirkstall, as it arose between 1152 and 1182, has never been rebuilt, nor has it been very largely either altered or mutilated. The ground-plan remains as its founder designed it. The chief later changes were the insertion of some Perpendicular windows, especially a great one at the east end, some of the usual tampering with the gables, and the raising of the single central tower. This last addition was most likely the cause of the only important mutilation. About 1792 a large part of the tower fell, leaving the tower itself in a strangely shattered state, and of course crushing a great deal of the central part of the church. Otherwise it would seem that the church had hardly suffered at all beyond the process of unroofing, which, we suppose, is of itself enough to raise any building to the rank of a ruin. The church is therefore nearly perfect, and it bears in all its fulness the impress of the date and circumstances under which it arose. It is just such a church as we should expect to be built by a brotherhood of a young order whose zeal was still warm. It is plain and stern, but in no way rude or unfinished. The simplicity of the ground-plan is thoroughly Cistercian. The eastern limb is short, the choir having occupied the space under the tower and the two eastern bays of the western limb. There are no choir-aisles, no surrounding chapels, no projecting Lady Chapel or procession path in any form, nothing but three chapels projecting from the east side of each transept, divided from one another and from the eastern limb by solid walls, and giving a dark, stern, and cavernous look to the whole eastern part of the church. Allowing for a few later insertions, the style of architecture throughout the church, and through a large part of the domestic buildings, is altogether uniform, and is plainly the unaltered work of Abbot Alexander. It shows that stage of the transition when the pointed arch had come into general use for constructive purposes, but when it had not yet been applied to the arches of smaller and decorative openings. Throughout the church of Kirkstall all the constructive arches, the pier arches and the arches of the vaulting, are pointed without a single exception. The arches of the doors and windows and the other smaller arches, equally without exception, remain round. This rule, so strictly followed in the church itself, is not quite so strictly followed in the contemporary conventual buildings, but it may fairly be looked upon as the rule of the architect throughout. The same plainness and severity which we see in the ground-plan we also see in the side elevations. Each bay consists simply of the pier arch and of a single clerestory window pierced in the wall above. There is no triforium-stage between the arcade and the clerestory, nor are the clerestory windows provided with any subordinate arches, nor is any passage made among them. But, on the other hand, though the triforium is wanting, we do not find that bare space between the arcade and the clerestory which we find in many churches of the German Romanesque, and at home in the later Cistercian church of Tintern. Such an arrangement, unless it is filled up with the mosaics of Ravenna, always looks bare, unfinished, and inharmonious. It always shows a lack of design, while at Kirkstall there is no lack of design, though there is throughout a seemingly intentional lack of ornament. The aisles, the small chapels, and the eastern limb were vaulted; the nave was not; the fact that the eastern limb is vaulted shows that the lack of vaulting in the nave is intentional, and not owing to want of skill or daring enough to vault so wide a space. While the first fervour of Cistercian zeal was still warm, it was probably deemed a duty to do well whatever needed to be done at all, but a vault and a triforium were most likely looked on as needless luxuries.

The domestic remains at Kirkstall are very large, and in some points puzzling. As far as we can make out, they have never been thoroughly examined and mapped out as they deserve to be. If they have ever so been done, we shall be glad to learn the fact and to see the book in which it is done. The two dormitories of Abbot Alexander are plainly enough to be seen, that of the monks attached to the south transept, and that of the convent parallel to it on the west side of the cloister. The double refectory may also be seen on the south of the cloister, parallel to the nave. But there seem to have been a good many changes in this part of the buildings, changes not only due to alterations of later date, but to changes of design while the work was going on. This is a place to examine puzzles of this sort in detail, and which should be thoroughly wrought out by some one, rather than we would not recommend it to be so.

examination would be quite worthy even of the hand which has called up again the domestic buildings of Christ Church, Canterbury.

THE THEATRES.

THE production of Cymbeline at the Queen's Theatre is, we think, the most successful Shakspearian revival that has been accomplished at that house. We had expected much from Miss Hodson in the part of Imogen, and we are bound to say that she surpassed our expectations. An audience of Shakspeare in Easter week is likely to be drawn more from the lower than the middle and upper class of playgoers; and it surely is a sign of healthy taste among the mass of Londoners that all the cheaper parts of this theatre should be filled to overflowing with orderly and attentive listeners. There is, generally speaking, no lack of intelligence in pit or galleries; but something was wanting either in speakers or hearers in the scene where King Cymbeline refuses to pay tribute to Augustus Caesar. The words—

Britain is
A world by itself; and we will nothing pay
For wearing our own noses—

express in homely language a popular sentiment which might be thought specially appropriate to present circumstances. With this exception the audience showed itself fully appreciative of the performance, and in particular it was obvious that they suppressed their tendency to applaud Imogen in order not to lose a word she uttered. Their silence was thus a greater compliment than noisy demonstrations of approval.

We should not have selected this play as specially suitable for revival. It labours under the disadvantage of speaking plainly of that which in so many modern plays is more or less obscurely indicated. The subject is unpleasant, and only the grace and tenderness of Imogen renders the story of Iachimo's false accusation interesting. This age is sufficiently familiar with adultery, actual or imputed, but it is still able to feel disgust at a wager by a husband on the result of an assault on his wife's chastity. Shakspeare has, however, contrived to commend both Imogen and Posthumus powerfully to our sympathy before he approaches that part of their adventures which might shock us. Almost the first words they speak are these:—

IMO. My dearest husband,
You must be gone, and I shall here abide the hourly shot
Of angry eyes; not comforted to live,
But that there is this jewel in the world
That I may see again.
POST. My queen! my mistress!
Oh lady, weep no more. I will remain
The loyal husband that did e'er plight troth.

It is very high praise to say of any actor in the part of Posthumus that the love of Imogen can be lavished on him in this scene without absurdity. The more perfectly she does her part the more intolerable would be any shortcoming in his. There are scenes later in the play in which a skilful actor may more strongly move his audience, but the impression made by this first scene is likely to be indelible, and even when Imogen is absent from the stage, she is present to the memory to supply a standard by which we measure every word, look, and gesture of the man who should be worthy of such a woman's love. It is proper that Posthumus, as a devoted husband, should say to his charming wife:—

I my poor self did exchange for you,
To your so infinite loss.

But these words ought not to be too manifestly true. The management is fortunate in possessing in Mr. George Rignold an actor who has done well whatever he has attempted at this theatre. His appearance as Posthumus in this scene is all that can be desired, and if there are one or two passages in other scenes to which he is hardly equal, it must be owned that they are very difficult. Only actors of the highest genius arrive at a mastery of their art while yet retaining that physical perfection of manly strength and beauty which is inseparable from our ideal of the British hero Posthumus. Veteran playgoers tell us that the elder Kean was, and always will be, unsurpassed in the character of Othello, and yet we think that he must have had some difficulty in the first act in persuading the audience that Desdemona could fall in love with him. Doubtless when it comes to concentrated passion, as where he says, "I'll tear her all to pieces," Kean could produce an effect upon his audience which is utterly unapproachable by his many imitators, and which, indeed, they should be earnestly advised not to attempt. If they are so fortunate as to possess what Homer calls the very glorious gifts of the Gods, they had better trust to them, and leave nature to do that part of the work to which such art as they have attained is manifestly unequal. If once the sympathy of an audience is fully enlisted by Othello or Posthumus, it may with moderate skill be preserved until the curtain falls. The love of Imogen for her banished husband can hardly fail to make him interesting, especially if he shows something of the quality of the oak to which so fair a plant might cling. The poetry of these early scenes belongs to the common life of ordinary people. The play is indeed eminently British. The story, the sentiments, the scenery, and above all the birds and flowers which adorn it, are all native, and in the best sense homely. Imogen had "most pretty things to say" when her leave-taking was interrupted. She would have bade Posthumus swear fidelity, and say his prayers at the same time as she says here, and would have given him a parting kiss between two charming words; but then comes in her father,

And like the tyrannous breathing of the North,
Shakes all our heads from growing.

If the play had been produced one week earlier, the force of this illustration would have been felt by every shivering witness of the boat-race. The difficult character of Iachimo falls naturally to Mr. Ryder, whose experience as a stage villain is probably unrivalled; and the scene in which he persuades Posthumus to make a wager with him on his wife's chastity is very effective. "If you buy ladies' flesh at a million a drachm, you cannot preserve it from tainting." This opinion might well displease the husband of a modern Imogen; but he would hardly imitate Posthumus in his manner of confuting it. However, we must grant something to dramatic exigency. The scene in Imogen's chamber would be impossible without the wager, and therefore we must tolerate a sort of collusion between husband and would-be co-respondent which is probably unparalleled in the Divorce Court. It is a remarkable proof of the superiority which Shakspeare generally preserved over his age that, while he makes Iachimo in this chamber scene depict in glowing language the beauty of the sleeping Imogen, he avoids using any word which would offend a modern ear. This speech is excellently spoken by Mr. Ryder, and as he returns with his prize, the bracelet, to the chest, and shuts down the lid, the beautiful song, "Hark, hark, the lark" is heard beneath the chamber window. The silence of night or earliest dawn, in which Iachimo perpetrates his villainy, is broken by that delicious chorus, "My lady sweet, arise!" We do not think this scene was ever better managed on any stage, and it deserved and obtained the profound attention of the audience.

The disagreeable portion of this play is confined within the first half of it. Iachimo produces the stolen bracelet in proof that he has won the wager, and Posthumus delivers himself of curses against all womankind, of which the heaviest is that they may have their will—

The very devils cannot plague them better.

Then he directs Pisanio to lure Imogen from her father's house and murder her. The scene where he shows her husband's letter to her, and she bids him fulfil the order for her death, enabled Miss Hodson to deepen the impression which she had already made:—

I draw the sword myself; take it, and hit
The innocent manhood of my love, my heart.

And then she throws away the love-letters which she had carried next her heart, and kneels to receive the stroke which Pisanio will not give. Again, when she puts on boy's clothes and arrives faint and hungry at the cave of Belarius and his young companions, she powerfully interests her audience.—

Best draw my sword; and if mine enemy
But fear the sword like me, he'll scarcely look on't.

Miss Hodson has not the stature which Shakspeare has ascribed to his other girl-boy Rosalind, but if any admirer said that she was just as high as his heart he would express the general feeling of the theatre. The part of Belarius belongs almost by right to Mr. Marston, who not only speaks his own speeches effectively, but seems to have transmitted some of his elocutionary skill along with his hunting lore to his supposed sons. The beautiful lines which they speak over the senseless body of Imogen, like those which were sung for a révelles beneath her window, are redolent of that rural England which Shakspeare knew and loved so well:—

Thou shalt not lack
The flower that's like thy face, pale primrose; nor
The azur'd hare-bell like thy veins.

The remembrance of this poetry may give pleasure even in the gloomy spring-time which we are now enduring. The last act of the play is rather heavy reading, but a judicious manager can put plenty of life and stir with small intellectual effort into the battle; and then comes the confession of Iachimo, the repentance of Posthumus, and the restoration of Imogen to her husband, and of herself and her long-lost brothers to her father. The success of this revival is complete. It is due first to Miss Hodson's excellent acting, and secondly to the admirable manner in which Mr. Ryder as stage-manager has superintended the details of the performance. It is, we think, the most complete work of the kind that has of late years been done. Even the physician who has to speak five lines speaks well. We should expect even greater results in the future from perseverance in the plan of striving after every kind of excellence.

The fashion of literary association, voluntary or involuntary, seems to be gaining ground on the modern stage. Sir Walter Scott wrote Ivanhoe, Mr. Andrew Halliday adapted it, and somebody else has burlesqued the adaptation. The young lady who performs Ivanhoe at the Court Theatre brings upon the stage a cross higher than herself, and we are doubtful whether this incident, which did not occur at Drury Lane, has been introduced under an impression that it is comic. It is at any rate satisfactory to observe that before the young lady in question takes part in a breakdown she deposits the symbol of Christianity in a corner. This burlesque has obtained a renewed lease of life probably because the manager felt that some relief was necessary to the overwhelming solemnity of the "romantic drama" which precedes it. The tragic darkness of Broken Spells is not indeed wholly unrelieved by comic scenes. But forgetting, if we can forget, the hide-and-seek business of the second act, the impression left by the remainder of the piece is that of intense, unmitigated gloom. As the characters are not historical, there was no necessity for fixing upon the First French Empire as the period of the play, and certainly the hideous fashions of that period did not need revival. We feel much sympathy both with the authors of this play and with the actors in it, who have all done their best, although not, we think, very successfully, to realize a lofty conception of dramatic art. The piece is undeniably well written, but we could have wished that there had been rather more to write about. A more barren and dreary subject was perhaps never selected by a dramatist, and the moody perversity of Bertrand, who insists that he and Estelle shall depart together out of a world which uses them unkindly, inspires not so much awe or compassion as a disposition to make fun. We admit that Mr. Hermann Vezin and Miss Ada Cavendish do their utmost for the piece, and we should like to see them better engaged. The author ought to be much obliged to any lady who will consent to wear the unsightly dress which is supposed to be appropriate to the period of the play. This fashion belongs to that large class of which the prototype was set when the fox who had lost his tail persuaded the other foxes to cut off their tails. By a self-deny-ing arrangement symmetry confounds itself with shapelessness. There is mention in the play of the Emperor Napoleon I., but any potentate of any age and country would do as well, and we do not think that the absurdity of this "happy despatch" ought in fairness to be ascribed to one people or period rather than another. Bertrand, having twice vainly solicited Estelle's company into the unknown world, departs thither alone. His speeches are well written and well delivered, but we cannot conceive that such a character can become popular. It is, indeed, abhorrent to ordinary English ideas, while that of Posthumus, notwithstanding his unseemly wager on his wife's honour, contains much that is in accordance with them. Although Bertrand is rejected by Estelle's parents, he still retains her love, and that, if he were not a poor sniveller, ought to be enough. And even if he had lost her heart, there are other hearts that may be won. But for poisoning oneself it is, as lago says, clean out of the way; and to ask the lady to poison herself for company is a manifestation of diseased vanity. Wishing well to this play, we cannot but fear that it contains only the elements of transient success.

FERGUSSON'S RUDE STONE MONUMENTS.*

MOST scholars who have paid much attention to the study of the antiquities of Britain will be familiar with the attempt made by Mr. Algernon Herbert, in his Cyclops Christianus, to "disprove the antiquity of Stonehenge and other Megalithic Erections in England and Brittany." The conclusion to which Mr. Herbert came, that Stonehenge was a work of the dark period of "renewed British independence," the time between the departure of the Romans and the coming of the English, has not met with any general acceptance. But it was assuredly not from any want either of learning or ingenuity on the part of its author that Mr. Herbert's theory failed to make its way. We are certainly far from accepting his views; but we can not the less recognize in him a real scholar, a man who did not play with his subject, but in whose views, whether we hold them to be sound or not, we see the result of real study and real thought. Mr. Herbert at least won for himself a right to be heard and a right to be answered, and his theories, though seldom accepted, have always been treated with respect by scholars whose researches have led them on the same ground. Mr. Herbert, to us at least, lives so completely in his books, that we really know not whether he be alive or dead in the flesh. We conceive his very name to be unknown beyond the small circle which finds an interest in the somewhat obscure studies to which he gave himself. The impression which his writings give us is that of one who loved his work for his work's sake, who wrote for special students only, and who was probably not disappointed at making no impression whatever on the general public. But to those who know that a certain view of a subject has been taken up by one whom no scholar need despise as an antagonist, there is something a little provoking in seeing a view which is nearly the same at once taking its place on men's lips when it is set forth with all due pretentiousness by one of the clever popular writers of the day. Mr. Herbert's views, right or wrong, were undoubtedly the result of real study, probably the result of the labours of a life. Mr. Fergusson's views have, according to his own account, been formed after a fashion which is by no means uncommon, but which few people acknowledge in quite so ostentatious a way. He tells us in his preface, "I have spared . . . no haste in forming my conclusions." We can quite understand that, as some people have thought that mischief was too precious a thing to be wasted, so writers of Mr. Fergusson's school may look on "haste" from the same point of view. To Mr. Fergusson—we are sure, quite unlike Mr. Herbert—haste seems so valuable that he has taken care not to spare any of it. We see the result. There are many conclusions in his book in forming which it is plain that "no haste" has been "spared."

Mr. Fergusson is not a new or unknown writer. He has already made himself a name as the author of the memorable sentence—"Paris, in the time of Charlemagne, had been the centre of a great and powerful empire." He has also made himself a name by the odd belief that Constantine built the Mosque of Omar, and by the still queerer process of insulting Mr. Finlay because he happened to have a brother whose name was not Finlay, but Macgregor. This last vagary was oddly enough avenged the other day, when we saw in the Times a mention of a gentleman bearing the same Christian and surname as Mr. Fergusson, but who had a brother whose name was Dalrymple. And Mr. Fergusson's strictly historical speculations have always caused us special interest. Mr. Fergusson, a clever man by nature, saw that architecture could not be studied to any profit except in connexion with the political history of the countries in which the several styles arose. His attempt to connect the two was in itself praiseworthy; but, undertaken as it was without any grounding in historical geography, the result was the most ingenious confusion. The confusion is strictly ingenious; if Mr. Fergusson had not been naturally a very clever man, his blunders might have been of a less taking kind. Orkney was in the fifteenth century pledged to Scotland; therefore St. Magnus in the twelfth century is set down as an example of "the architecture of Scotland," but with the unconscious remark that the early Scottish buildings "resemble much more what is found at Trondhjem in Norway than anything at Caen or in the South of Europe." Somewhat later in the fifteenth century Bern conquered Vaud from Savoy; therefore the wonderful church of Romainmoutier, perhaps unique as an example of the eighth century, is set down as an example of "Swiss architecture," and we are treated to grave ethnological speculations accordingly. Then there are the endless wild theories about Turanians, Pelasgians, Phœnicians, Dorians, Teutons, and what not, the usual chaos to be found in the brain of a clever writer who has gone through no scholarly training either at the hands of others or of himself. When a writer of this kind turns his mind towards the subject of megalithic monuments, and "spares no haste" in "forming his conclusions," the results may be expected to be very remarkable, and very remarkable they are.

One thing to be noticed at starting is the utter untrustworthiness of a large proportion of Mr. Fergusson's facts. Inferences with regard to primeval antiquities have to be made from an examination and comparison of a vast number of examples in all parts of the world. It is quite impossible that Mr. Fergusson or any other man should examine them all for himself. Every inquirer must take a good deal on the evidence of other inquirers; but then a man who is himself to be trusted will soon find out who is to be trusted and who is not. A scientific antiquary will easily discern the brother scientific antiquary whose drawings and measurements are as much to be trusted as his own, from the wild theorist or the more picturesque draughtsman whose reports are simply good for nothing. Now it is astounding to see the kind of evidence on which Mr. Fergusson relies throughout, how vast a proportion of his illustrations are second-hand, copied from this book and the other book, without any personal examination on his own part, and without any report from any trustworthy witness. Sometimes indeed Mr. Fergusson is himself startled at the worthlessness of his own authorities. For instance, he has a chapter on Algeria, and we have a number of woodcuts copied from a local publication, whose author is described as "a M. Féraud, interpreter to the army of Algeria." What may be M. Féraud's position as a primeval antiquary we have no means of knowing, but Mr. Fergusson himself, in copying one of his woodcuts, makes the following startling admission:—"I have been obliged to take some liberties with Mr. Féraud's cuts; the plan and elevation are so entirely discrepant that one or both must be wrong. I have brought them a little more into harmony." In another place, in Biscay, Mr. Fergusson tells us that "the woodcut is copied from one in" (the New York) "Frank Leslie's 'Illustrated News';" which is itself taken from a French illustrated journal. "I do not doubt," continues Mr. Fergusson, "that the American copy is a correct reproduction of the French original; but there may be exaggerations in the first. . . . I wish, however, we had some more reliable [sic] information on the subject." These warnings on the part of Mr. Fergusson are no doubt very praiseworthy, but when a compiler has to alter his authorities, "one or both of which must be wrong," "in order to bring them a little more into harmony," we venture to think that, whichever of the originals may be wrong, his conjectural improvement is almost sure to be wrong, and we learn to look with great doubt on any of his illustrations whatsoever. In this frame of mind we reserve our belief in the astonishing monument which is engraved at p. 337, and which Mr. Fergusson has not unnaturally chosen as the ornament for the outside of his book. If Mr. Fergusson has seen with his own eyes a huge stone, like the capstone of a cromlech, resting on four or five "columns of Gothic"—he means Romanesque—"design," which "belong undoubtedly to the twelfth century or thereabouts"—still more if he can bring half-a-dozen scientific antiquaries to act as his comparators—we may believe that there is something in it. Till then, after the admissions which Mr. Fergusson has made—and the two which we have quoted are not all—we decline to accept anything whatever simply on the strength of an illustration in his book.

Mr. Fergusson seems to have set about his task in a very odd frame of mind. If it were not important, we should be inclined to ask about him the same question which Mr. William Arnold once asked about Mr. Francis Newman: "What was he can Mr. Fergusson have lived? He goes forth to do battle against Druids and dragons, as if he were still in the days of Stukeley. His head is as full as Colonel Forbes Leslie's of "naked forefathers" covered with blue paint. Who may have been the forefathers of Mr. Fergusson, whether we are to trust his Celtic beginning or his Teutonic ending, is too subtle a question for us. But, at all events, let Mr. Fergusson speak of his own private forefathers, and not father Druids, or paint, or any such vagaries of any "pannosum et exbraccatum genus" on us who come of the bold wiggeniths, who, among other improvements, first brought breeches into the Isle of Britain. Mr. Fergusson's friends may have been "brought up in the Druidical faith as most Englishmen have been"; we are happy to say that we have passed our lives in better company. But when Mr. Fergusson gets into good company, he does not know how to behave in it. We have already reminded our readers of his old demeanour towards Mr. Finlay. He gets to Troy, and pats "that remarkable siege" on the back. "Troy," we all know, "owes to Homer what whist owes to Hoyle"; but henceforth it will owe much more to Mr. Fergusson for so condescending a notice. Yet he need not have gone out of his way to put in a note such as this:—"I am, of course, aware that the now fashionable craze is to consider Troy a myth. So far, however, as I am capable of understanding it, it appears to me that the ancient solar myth of Messrs. Max Muller and Cox is very like mere modern moonshine." This is a beautiful specimen of that calm, unconscious impertinence which marks the possessors of the dangerous gift of "hasty" learning. Mr. Fergusson most likely mistakes the saying about "moonshine" for wit. But the words which we have put in italics luckily cover a good deal. "So far as Mr. Fergusson is capable of understanding" Professor Muller is a measure of space which would carry us a very short distance indeed. We need not here discuss the solar theory, but we do know, while Mr. Fergusson plainly does not, that the solar theory in no way excludes the belief in a substratum of historical truth in the Trojan or any other legend.

One characteristic which runs through the whole of Mr. Fergusson's attempts at argument is that which he has so happily confessed in the sentence which we last quoted—his incapacity to understand the statements and arguments of real scholars. To be sure the difficulty is returned in kind. We happen to know the mind of a good many of our best archaeological scholars about Mr. Fergusson's book, and there is a consensus such as we do not remember in the case of any other book. Every man is ready to show this or that blunder of Mr. Fergusson's in detail, but no man seems to have any clear notion what Mr. Fergusson's main object may be. In fact, his notions of nations and countries are so confused, one stage of the world's history is to him so exactly the same as another, that it is quite impossible to tell what his general system is. All that we can say is that he seems to have made no attempt to realise the actual state of knowledge. His again slaying the slain in the case of the Druids, who have long passed away out of the reckonings of scientific inquirers, is a case in point. Then he amuses himself with endless sneers against the Danish antiquaries, seemingly because he does not understand their system. Mr. Fergusson is seized with irrepressible delight whenever he comes across any case of "overlapping"—any case, that is, of transition, any case of a stone implement, for instance, being shown to be later than one of bronze. Now the very completeness of the Danish system awakens a little suspicion of it; it is almost too perfect; each stage fits almost too neatly into the others. But we never understood the Danish antiquaries as denying that some bronze objects might be older than some stone objects, just as some buildings with pointed arches are older than some buildings with round. In the like sort Mr. Fergusson is delighted beyond measure whenever he finds a Roman coin, or any other comparatively recent object, in or near one of the primeval monuments. Thus he does not forget to mention that a coin of Constantine was found in the chambered tump at Uleybury. To be sure, if our memory does not greatly fail us, a coin of Edward the Fourth was found there also; but this fact, as proving too much, is not enlarged on. Mr. Fergusson, in short, does not take in the way in which these monuments have suffered from all kinds of causes in the course of so many ages; the rifling at the hands of treasure-seekers, and the constant habit, strange as it may seem, but perfectly familiar to Mr. Greenwell and other scientific inquirers, by which a later age and nation has used burying-places of an earlier time over again. We do not mean that Mr. Fergusson takes no notice of these things; he speaks of them more than once, but it is plain that he has no notion of their importance, and how thoroughly they are, as more practised inquirers feel them to be, the hatchet to his own argument. In these matters, as in the matter of moonshine and solar myths, he has plainly spared no haste in forming his conclusions. And, except that we seem to remember the theory before in one of Mr. Fergusson's earlier works, we should have said that he had been equally unsparring in forming his amazing, but not very intelligible, theory as to the inhabitants of the South of Gaul and their works. With a sketch of this as a specimen of Mr. Fergusson's method, we will end the present notice, keeping our more minute examination of his views, especially as they concern our own island, for another occasion.

Mr. Fergusson points out the local disposition of the primeval monuments in Gaul. He has not been the first to do so, but this is just the sort of thing which he might be expected to do. He has the natural sentences which would enable him to do so, and to define a fact of this kind, but he has neither the sobriety nor the power of sustained reasoning which are needful in order to do so.

real use of such a fact when it is asked. He points out that the district of Gaul in which stone monuments are common runs along a line lying north-west and south-east from the Mediterranean to the furthest point of Brittany. The "dolmen region," as he calls it, as shown in his map, not only leaves out all Belgic and the greater part of Celtic Gaul, but it leaves out the Aquitains of Cæsar, the land south-west of the Garonne, in which few such monuments are found. Having noticed this fact, Mr. Fergusson begins to theorise about it. His way of speaking is as odd an example of helpless bondage to the modern map as we ever came across. He tells us that "there are no stone monuments in Belgium proper, and so few in French Flanders, or indeed in any part of Gallia Belgica, that we may safely assert that the Belgæ were not dolmen builders." When Mr. Fergusson talks on such a subject about "Belgium proper" and "French Flanders," it is plain that he cannot, however unconsciously, get rid of the idea that the point at which the permanent conquests of Louis the Fourteenth happened to stop had something to do with the disposition of the races of Gaul in the days of Cæsar. He then goes on to tell us about Bellesveus—in our Livy it is Bellovesus—and how his capital was at Bruges. As Livy mentions the Bituriges in connexion with Bellovesus, we might have thought of suggesting Bourges; but Mr. Fergusson does not see those things with our eyes, and to quarter Bellovesus at Bruges is at least not more wonderful than to quarter Charles the Great at Paris. Then comes a speculation about the Averni—again it is Averni in our book—and another speculation about the Iberians, where Mr. Fergusson gets, as well he may be, puzzled at the shifting uses of the word Aquitania. The result is that he inclines to the belief—"the impression on his mind is every day growing stronger"—"that the dolmen builders in France are the lineal descendants of the cave men whose remains have recently been detected in such quantities on the banks of the Dordogne and other rivers in the South of France." Then we read that "we know next to nothing of the languages spoken in the South-west of France, before the introduction of the Romance forms of speech." Mr. Fergusson uses words so oddly that it is quite possible that, by "the introduction of the Romance forms of speech," he may mean the introduction of Latin. If he means the process by which Latin gradually changed into Provençal and French, it is certainly a wonderful way of expressing his meaning. Then comes the fact that the ending ac is found in a large district where dolmens are common, and in another large district where they are but seldom found. This, according to Mr. Fergusson's peculiar style of logic, shows that "the ac-people were driven from that country [between the Garonne and the Pyrenees] by Ibero-Aquitaniens, before they had adopted the fashion of stone monuments." This is getting into times far too remote for us; but Mr. Fergusson soon makes his way into times much nearer our own. He lights on the domical churches of Anjou, Périgord, and some other parts of Gaul, and pronounces them to be the work of the same people who made the rude stone monuments. The connexion of ideas here is altogether beyond us; we can simply copy without presuming to understand. We had always thought that St. Front was copied from St. Mark's, and St. Mark's copied from St. Sophia; and Mr. Fergusson does not tell us whether he plants his "ac-people" at Venice or at Constantinople. But we do gather that these primeval monuments were made by a people who were in Gaul before the Celts; that these people were the lineal descendants of the cave men—that is, if we rightly understand the matter, of the Equimaux who were contemporary with the mammoths; that their nationality and their language were superseded by those of the Celts before the time of Cæsar; that the dolmens in Gaul, or at least in Brittany, were made in the Arthurian age, between the years 380 and 550 A.D.; and, lastly, that the domical churches of Périgord have something to do with the matter. These are the conclusions to which we are led by Mr. Fergusson's eighth chapter, headed "France." These several propositions may be capable of proof; they may be capable of being worked together into a consistent system; but if Mr. Fergusson has accomplished either of these processes, we have, perhaps through our sparing no haste in our eager efforts to get at his meaning, failed to mark the passages where the work is done.

RALSTON ON RUSSIAN FOLKLORE.*

IT is not often that our literature is enriched by a work on so virgin a soil as Mr. Ralston has begun to till in the book before us. He modestly forbears to draw attention to the fact that his is really the first book in the English language which deals with the subject of Russian popular poetry and its origin in obsolete mythology, and that but little help is to be found in books written in any language but Russian; but this is the fact. Indeed his list of authorities comprises twenty-eight works, some of them voluminous, and all written in Russian. A first attempt on a field so new and presenting such difficulties ought in any case to be welcomed with thankfulness, and exempted from very severe criticism; if not wholly satisfactory in itself, it would make the way easier for a successor. But this work needs no apology; it is thoroughly well executed throughout, and bears no trace of the painful toil which its author must have undergone before he could himself fully understand, and then convey so pleasantly to his readers, the idiomatic sense of the many songs and spells in obscure dialects of a difficult language, which are to be read in easy English in his pages. There are indeed few first works on so new and difficult a subject which leave so little to be unsaid afterwards as we believe will be the case with this. And this brings us to notice the discretion which, in combination with the boldness in striking out a new line, is the most meritorious feature of the book. It would have been easy to Mr. Ralston, when once engaged on his subject, to plunge deeper into it. He might have given a far larger collection of the songs themselves, instead of the few of each species which he has translated as specimens; and his book would have been larger, more complete, and—less read. Or he might have exhibited his learning or his philosophic acumen by indulging at greater length in mythological speculations as to the origin of the many curious superstitions which he has to recount; and his book would probably have remained unread, except by the very few who seize with avidity on all essays in comparative mythology. But these songs have a domestic and sentimental charm quite distinct from the connexion which they happen to possess with mythology, and it would be a great mistake so to treat them as to throw them into the hands of antiquaries alone. Mr. Ralston has acted very wisely in making this his first book on the subject, neither too large nor too learned. He is, however, by no means chary of information on the probable mythological origin of elves, fairies, and fairy rites, wherever anything better than unsupported conjecture is attainable; and his remarks will stimulate the ingenuity of those interested in these subjects. He will assuredly have to return to the subject of mythology, which he here shows himself competent to treat far more fully than was consistent with the plan of this book; and it is to be hoped that his present essay will both give him confidence in his own powers for the more learned work, and gain him the ear of those best able to appreciate a work which pre-eminently requires the encouragement of like-minded scholars. It would certainly not be among the merits of Mr. Morfill's forthcoming work on the "Slaves," which Mr. Ralston announces as by a scholar far better qualified for the task than himself, to stand in the way of further exploration of this field by him. We are glad that he speaks of his present volume, which treats mainly of the lyric poetry of the peasantry, as a first instalment only, and promises to devote another to their Popular Tales and Metrical Romances.

The invention of printing, and the consequent immense diffusion of literature, has so far changed the habits of civilized countries in regard to poetry and fiction generally as to render it difficult for us to realize a condition of society which required the presence of the minstrel and the rhapsodist to elevate men's thoughts above the sordid needs of the hour, to perpetuate the memory of the heroes of a bygone time, and create images of beauty and grace beyond the daily experiences of mean cravings and savage lusts. Written literature has become a personal discipline, a communion of the individual reader with the poet; rhapsodized literature was social, being poured forth to an assembly of the people. The former is more intellectual, more highly spiritual, but wants the warmth of affection which binds together poet and hearers under the latter condition. Hence minstrelsy, when it has once taken deep root in a people, is not at once or easily supplanted by the written word, and least of all where family ties and natural affection are strong, but intellectual and political enlightenment somewhat low. Thus it is not surprising that the Russian peasantry, like their Slavonic brethren the Servians and Bohemians, and the Finns, Lithuanians, Celts, and Greek Klepts, have retained in various degrees the habit of singing songs suited to all the events of domestic life, and of reciting heroic narratives or epics, sometimes of considerable length, which have only in recent times attracted the attention of the learned and been committed to writing. In 1814 Vuk Karajic Stefanovic surprised Europe by the publication of the Servian epics, which he had partly retained in his own memory from boyhood, and partly picked up from the Servian peasantry around him. Some of these poems, which had never previously been printed, extend to several hundred, and one to above a thousand lines. And in 1835 the eminent Finnish philologist Lönnrot revealed a yet more extraordinary fact—the existence of a Finnish national epic (the Kalevala) of more than twelve thousand verses. The long winter nights, and the intense cold of the far North, which restrain the outdoor labours of the peasantry and favour indoor amusements and social gatherings, unquestionably encourage the pursuit of rhapsody; and so we find that one collector has brought together no less than 50,000 verses of the Russian metrical romances called Bulinas, comprised in 236 poems, which gives to each an average of 210 verses. As a proof of the strength of the human memory when left to itself without the aid of writing, and as an indication of the probable origin and mode of transmission of the great epics of antiquity, Mahabharata, Ramayana, and the Homeric poems, these metrical romances are of the highest importance, and their contents will certainly yield a rich harvest to him who knows how to interpret them aright; though whether their wild stories are to be regarded as a poetic transformation of actual history, or as modernized mythology, or as little better than pure fiction, seems to be as yet undecided. But for intrinsic human interest, and as affording an insight into the habits and affections of the people of to-day, the short lyrical pieces which form the chief subject of the present volume are far superior.

After an introduction in which the various occasions and species of songs are discriminated, Mr. Ralston commences with the mythology of the old heathen Slavonians, speaking in turn of the original gods or first causes, of the secondary superhuman beings, demigods or fairies and sprites, and of such "story-land beings" as the ogress, the witch, the water-king, and the swan-maidens. As the Christianization of Russia only took place under St. Vladimir at the end of the tenth century, and then affected mainly the middle and south of the country, it is not surprising that so many relics of ancient heathenism should be still recognizable, but rather that so little trustworthy knowledge about the gods and their worship should be attainable. Mr. Ralston says:—

The religion of the Eastern Slavonians—among whom may fairly be included the ancestors of at least a great part of the present Russians—appears to have been founded, like that of all the other Aryan races, upon the reverence paid, on the one hand to the forces of nature, on the other to the spirits of the dead. They seem to have worshipped the sun, the moon, the stars, the elements, and the spirits whom they connected with the phenomena of the storm, personifying the powers of nature under various forms, and thus creating a certain number of deities, among whom the supremacy was, sooner or later, attributed to the Thunder-God, Perun.

These Eastern Slavonians seem to have built no regular temples, and—in striking contrast with the Lithuanians, not to speak of some of the Western Slavonians—they appear not to have acknowledged any regular class of priests. Their sacrifices were offered up under a tree—generally an oak—or beside running water, and the sacred rites were performed by the Elders, or heads of family communities.

On the fate of the ancient gods, their transformation rather than extinction, of which this volume affords ever-recurring evidence, the following passage is instructive:—

After Perun's statue at Kief had been flung into the Dnieper by St. Vladimir, and that at Novgorod had been cast into the Volkhof, and the people who used to worship him had accepted just so much of Christianity as left them what the chronicle called "two-faiths," then his attributes were transferred to a number of the personages whom the new religion brought into honour. In the minds of most of the people he became changed into the Prophet Ilya or Elijah, from whose fiery chariot the lightnings flashed and the thunders pealed as they had done in days of yore from that of Perun. The fame of his battles with the demons survived in the legends about the Archangel Michael, the conqueror of the powers of darkness, and other traditions relating to him may be traced in stories told about the Apostle Peter, or about Yury the Brave, our own St. George.

The Slavonic ideas on the condition of the soul after death are curious, and betray but little sign of being affected by the teaching of the Church. But the most striking point about them is their close approximation to the old Greek superstitions, which are familiar to us through literature, but can be held by the illiterate Russian peasantry only as an heirloom of primitive Aryan tradition. Thus the soul after death has to cross a sea to the spirit-world, and the modern Charon still requires his passage-money as of old. The abode of the dead, when once reached, reminds us strongly of the Elysian Fields and the garden of the Hesperides; but while the latter are beyond the setting sun in the West, the Russian Rai is the abode of the Eastern sun; the trees with golden fruit adorn both alike. The old Slavonian dead prolonged after death the characteristics of their life on earth, just as Ulysses found to be the case with Achilles, who however volunteered an observation far from complimentary to the spirit-world. Again, the Slavonians very generally regard the butterfly as an emblem of the soul. Who does not think at once of Psyche with her butterfly-wings? And this coincidence is the more striking because the emblem is by no means an obvious, but rather an arbitrary, one. Other conceptions also bear a more remote analogy to those held by the Greeks. As the abode of the blessed immortals was Mount Olympus, whither glorified mortals such as Hercules ascended after death, so the Slavonic human souls mounted a steep of iron or glass to the heavenly Paradise, for which task they are furnished with aids in the form of little ladders. The close connexion in mythology as well as in ethnology between the Slavonians and the Greeks will, we believe, be more and more acknowledged. Slavonic civilization issued from the Southern parts of the region occupied by the race—from Bulgaria, Kief, and Cracow; Ragusa and Illyria were relatively more important many hundred years ago than now; and Christianity was propagated from Thessalonica. It was therefore in constant and close communication with the Greeks; and if the ancient Thracians were a Slavonic people, this communication had subsisted for thousands of years. What wonder, therefore, if the Slavonians and Greeks held similar notions from time immemorial, and if they still retain the tradition of their union in politics and religion, as well as in the obscurer matters of popular superstitions?

While we are upon the subject of mythical ideas, we may notice the sagadki, or enigmas, in which many are preserved. In one a golden ship (the moon), sailing across the (heavenly) sea, crumbles into fragments (the stars), which neither princes nor priests can put together again. In another, the dawn, Sorys (which reminds one irresistibly of the Sanskrit Surya, the sun; an indeed striking etymological approximations are by no means rare), is represented as a fair maiden who has lost her keys. The moon takes no notice of them, but the sun picks them up. The keys are of course the dew, which the moonlight does not affect, but the sunbeams dry up.

The fair maiden, the Dawn, went wandering through the forest, and dropped her keys. The moon saw them, but said nothing. The sun saw them, and lifted them up.

After the chapter on Mythology, the remaining chapters treat of "Mythic and Ritual Songs," "Marriage Songs," "Folk Songs," and "Sorcery and Witchcraft." It is to be regretted that the last two remain to us to give any adequate idea of the hibited in these various songs. We must content ourselves with observing that the Slavonic mind is essentially domestic, and that the thoughts of the peasantry are chiefly exercised on what makes home happy. The affections of children for their parents, and still more those of brother and sister, are strongly marked; and the separation from the old home experienced by the young man called out to military service, and by the girl on her marriage, appears as a very severe wrench. The household spirit, the Domovoy, watches over the homestead and delights in the housekeeping virtues of frugality and order, and suffers deep grief at the death of the head of the family. There are curious marriage rites still performed which perpetuate the old mode of purchasing the bride from her parents, and the professional match-makers are still employed to conduct the negotiation; only what was in the olden time a bond fide transaction is now a mere piece of acting. For this sort of acting the Slavonians exhibit a remarkable liking, as when the bride has to lament bitterly in verse that her cruel parent has sold her against her will; whereas considerable freedom of intercourse, and of choice, and faithfulness to promises of marriage, seem to be the rule among the peasantry. More genuine may be the poetical laments of a bride for the loss of her maiden freedom when she assumes the more laborious and servile position of a peasant's wife. In the songs adapted to these various occasions much boldness of description, with frequent fancy and allegory, is discovered. Of their rhythmic character it is difficult to judge from a prose translation, but the frequent repetitions of the nature of a refrain in the choruses must be effective and inspiring. One characteristic should be noticed—the use of standing epithets:—"Just as in the songs an axe is always called sharp, a pitcher blue, a hand white, a girl beautiful, and a youth or a horse good, so is the stepmother always styled khaya, malicious." We conclude with a specimen of the "wailing of a fair maiden at the death-bed of her lover":—

If God would grant my love his health,
Were it but for one idle day,
Though it were only for one little hour,
Then would I wander with my love,
Would tread the mossy turf,
Would pluck the flow'rets blue,
Would weave a garland for my love,
And place it on my darling's head
Then homewards (leading him in glad content,
Would say, "My hope, my love!
We two will keep together, love,
Nor part, my darling, till at death
We say farewell for ever to the light;
Leaving behind us some such fame as this—
That we two loved each other tenderly,
And loyally, my love, together died."

TUCKERMAN'S AMERICAN ARTIST LIFE.*

THE arts in the New World have not presented as much novelty as might have been looked for. When an entire hemisphere was opened to civilization, offering aspects of nature singular for grandeur of form, glory of colour, and exuberance of tropical growth, it was not unreasonable to expect that the field, and indeed the function, of art might be considerably extended. The conditions were new. A people which had been pent up within the comparatively narrow confines of Europe went across the sea, and was let loose upon illimitable tracts of forest and of prairie. A race Anglo-Saxon and hybrid, an amalgam, as it were, of many nations, an outgrowth from time-worn European stocks, displayed in new homes the enterprise of the pioneer and the virtue of the citizen. The history of art in the Old World might have led to the belief that when ground is newly broken rare produce will follow. It is not a little singular how the replanting of populations has been attended with an outburst in art. Along the shores of Magna Græcia and Sicily, of Asia Minor and of Africa, are the temples and sepulchres of colonists who made art inseparable from commerce. And leaving classic times, we find that when the Norsemen sailed over to France, they built cathedrals; when hordes from Germany crossed the Alps, they strewed the plain of Lombardy with churches rudely, yet richly, sculptured; and when the Moors entered Andalusia, they reared and decorated the Alhambra in Granada, the Alcazar in Seville, and the Mosque in Cordova. That the coasts of America give small sign of works comparable to the grand art creations which have accompanied the migrations of the leading races of the world may admit of diverse explanations. A foremost reason doubtless is that America had to begin at the beginning; the Romans who in olden times made roads for Europe had never crossed the Atlantic; even the first necessity of shelter from the elements the colonists did not find ready to hand. Then, again, we think that the vast extent of territory to be run over, and the rapid development of a prosperity now vulgarly symbolised by "the almighty dollar," have been little favourable to art. In this and other ways there may have been engendered among the American people a go-ahead spirit, a rude restlessness, a propensity to locomotion, a proneness to action rather than to æsthetic contemplation. The fashion after which Yankee travellers "do" Europe is notorious; the mode in which they fly from Gallery to Gallery, rush at the Coliseum, race through the Vatican, is known to the cost of all quiet students. And even American artists who take up a residence in Italy find it far from easy to throw off characteristics which are inborn. Yet we gladly admit exceptions; indeed, it is impossible to believe that to the United States will be denied in the long run that art epoch which, as experience tells, follows after commercial wealth and intellectual culture. In the interesting volume before us we trace the rise of an infant school of Transatlantic art, and are enabled in some measure to judge of the future which awaits it.

The Americans show a vocation for landscape art; their minds dilate to the scale of their mountains, plains, and rivers; their imaginations kindle under the fire of colour in autumnal forests. Transatlantic poets have shown that the elements of a distinct nationality exist among them in the unaccustomed phenomena of nature. A new world moves the mind very differently from an old world; in our own country associations gather about the ivy-mantled tower, but in a continent where the forests have never been trodden by the foot of man, nothing comes between the mind and nature. The American poets as well as painters have reasonably obtained attention in Europe just in proportion as they have carried the imagination back to primeval ages, ere man had intruded on the solitudes of nature. Mr. Bryant, for instance, is prized chiefly for touches which portray in brief the traits of a land untilled, unpeopled. Thus the "Forest Hymn" opens with the line "The groves were God's first temples"; and again:—

These are the gardens of the desert; these
The unshorn fields, boundless and beautiful,
For which the speech of England has no name—
The prairies. I beheld them for the first,
And my heart swells, while the dilated sight
Takes in the encircling vastness.

The landscapes of Mr. Church and of Mr. Bierstadt have deservedly made themselves known in Europe by the faithful rendering of aspects of earth, phenomena of sky, and forms of vegetative growth which give a distinctive character to the continents of North and South America. "Niagara," "Icebergs," "Heart of the Andes," "Cotopaxi," and "Chimborazo," which we owe to Mr. Church, and "The Rocky Mountains," the best remembered work of Mr. Bierstadt, are pictures which extend the sphere of art beyond the comparatively narrow confines of the old Italian painters. Mr. Leslie (whom by the way we are not willing to give over to America) justly remarks that "it is but a small portion of the earth's surface that has been cultivated, so to speak, by the landscape-painter; because indeed all art has been confined within a narrow geographical limit." Humboldt, however, in a renowned passage in Cosmos, points to a time "when man's visible horizon will be extended, when knowledge of the grandest forms of nature, of the luxuriant fulness of life in the tropics, shall give to landscape art new development." We confess sometimes to have doubted whether here the philosopher of Germany, with certain painters of America, has not fallen into the common error of confounding science with art. It is easy, and of late it has become indeed the fashion, to abuse Claude, Gaspar Poussin, and Salvator Rosa; yet it may be questioned whether the inaccuracies of the old painters militated seriously against their art, while on the contrary the laborious striving after unattainable truths is often the ruin of a modern picture. Mr. Church, who, while studying among the Andes, dwelt in the house occupied by Humboldt half a century before, has, possibly misled by the dictates of philosophy, overstepped the limits of art; at all events he challenges difficulties beyond the reach of his technical powers, and thus his pictures occasionally break down or fly into scattered fragments, the forms being too subtle for firm cohesion, the colours too iridescent for subordination and unity. It is said that the artist keeps an equatorial butterfly impaled in his studio as the high key of prismatic colour to which he would pitch his tropical scale. And certainly, for dazzling sunshine, for scintillation of colour, such as is thrown off from the wing of a bird on the banks of the Amazon, for opalescent and emerald hues as reflected from gems, no painter has made pigments more responsive. Thus the "Niagara" whatever may be its defects, is exquisite in the effect of light thrown on and transmitted through dancing wavelets ere they make the final plunge; and so illusive is the iris which plays above the "hell of waters," that the author of Modern Painters examined the window glass in the exhibition room, suspecting that, by some optical trick, sunlight might have been thrown directly on the picture. And yet Mr. Church, the true artist ever striving to surpass himself, feels deeply the inadequacy of his art when brought into competition with nature. "I am appalled," he writes from his house on the Hudson, "when I look at the magnificent scenery which encircles my clumsy studio, and then glance at the painted oil-cloth on my easel." It has long been the daily custom of the artist to ascend a hill near to his country house, and thence to watch the sunset among glowing mountains and shadowy trees. The habits of students of nature in all parts of the world are similar. We have observed artists in Florence and Rome bend their steps at sunset to San Miniato and the Pincio, and we recall the words of American painters and sculptors whose names are written in the pages before us, as they gazed on the blue Apennines, or on the shadowy dome of St. Peter's, against the amber sky of Italy. American artists, belonging to a race highly strung in nerve, are signally sensitive to the poetry of nature, and thus they slide into verse insensibly, and seek expression in plastic and pictorial form for ideas which move them deeply.

Mr. Church, as we have seen, belongs to a class of artists found in all countries, who throw themselves into atmosphere, and hold communion with the elements. It has been rightly said that in his landscapes "the earth is always painted with reference to the sky"; it has also been observed that his eye is ever watchful of the electric laws of the atmosphere, that his pictures reflect phenomena even from the Aurora Borealis. Artists have rarely thus enriched or illumined their art; for the most part they have stood aloof from scientific discoveries in prismatic colour and polarized light. Even Mr. Church owes his achievements to the fact, not that he is a man of science, but a child of nature.

Mr. Bierstadt and Mr. Church, the foremost landscape-painters of America, are wide as the poles asunder. Mr. Church is self-taught, while Mr. Bierstadt, as his pictures testify, was severely drilled in Düsseldorf. Mr. Church takes possession of air and the elements, while Mr. Bierstadt lays firm grasp on solid earth. The latter, when he rears a mountain or sets out a plain, is as constructive as an engineer, as prosaic as a surveyor. Mr. Church, it may be supposed, has evoked his colour from spectrum analysis, while Mr. Bierstadt, caring little for colour, has been intent upon poising gigantic forms according to the laws of statics which govern vast masses in rest. Hence in the landscapes of this artist fixity, symmetry, and formality rule to a fault; nature is not in transition, nor creation in progress. Mr. Bierstadt, by parentage as by education a German, naturally knows the trick whereby sublimity may be worked out through a process slow, solemn, and sure. The art thus steadily evolved took America by surprise: the technique and training were about the most thorough ever seen across the Atlantic; accordingly "Rocky Mountains," thus dealt with, yielded the artist mines of gold. That the credit thus gained has been heavily drawn upon by work which no longer represents the original amount of study, we have of late had reason to fear. Still honour is due to Mr. Bierstadt. As a bold pioneer he carries art into the Far West; his pictures are more than pictures; they are studies in physical geography; the mountains he paints transport the mind to high altitudes and distant longitudes. "American Artist Life" abounds indeed in adventure. How strangely, for instance, does the following extract contrast with the diary, say of David Cox, or of other English painters accustomed to rusticate quietly at the "Oak Inn," Baitwys, North Wales. In the passage we quote the scene is laid on the prairie; the dramatis personæ are buffaloes in advance, with huntsmen, including Mr. Bierstadt, manœuvring according to the tactics of the chase. An eyewitness writes:—

Coming up, we found the largest old bull we had yet seen, standing at bay with a dozen revolver balls in different portions of his hide. Nothing but an elephant did harder than a buffalo. Purposely this buffalo was stopped instead of killed, in order that Bierstadt might have the rarest of artist-chances, the sight of an old bull charging before his death-shot. The buggy came up while we were holding him at bay. Our artist dismounted, brought out his colour-box, fixed his camp-stool, and took the charcoal in hand. We rode towards the dying warrior, and shouted at him. A new glare reddened his sullen eyes; he bowed his colossal head till his beard swept the tangled grass; he erected his tail, letting its tuft wave back flag-like in the wind, and made one mad plunge forward. For a moment all his wild nature was royally alive in him. We veered, and he turned on us. We pretended to fly, and again he charged. With every shifting posture the artist changed his place, and the charcoal quietly moved on. Three marksmen on horseback, and another from the buggy, drew up in line and fired at the old giant's heart. With one great gasp he fell upon his knees, glared defiantly as ever, half rose twice, and pawed the earth with one foot, shook his great mat of hair, fell again, and with one universal shiver rolled over, a dead bison. Bierstadt spent the whole remainder of the morning in transferring our bulls to his sketch-box.

Mr. Tuckerman writes pleasantly rather than critically or accurately; he belongs to that class of American authors who pen small poems and publish journals when they return from the tour of Europe. As a matter of course such writers dabble in art; nothing comes amiss to them; they talk equally well of the Apollo Belvedere and the "Zenobia" by Miss Hosmer; of the Laocœon in the Vatican, and "the Greek Slave" in the studio of Mr. Powers; of the "Flora" by Titian, and the "Venus" by Mr. Page. A smooth surface of sentiment is laid over every subject alike; each paragraph is coloured to a high pitch by superlative epithets. In this fashion Mr. Tuckerman manages to tell much that we are glad to learn of artists whose works we have watched for many years. We could however have borne with a greater amount of biographical facts, especially if we might have been spared what pass for philosophic reflections. The estimate given of American artists, we need not say, is partial in the extreme. A Pludius and a Titian appears to be like the "village Hampden," the common product of the soil. We will not speak of the living; but English travellers who may have had the privilege of visiting the studios in Rome of the late Mr. Bartholomew, Mr. Mozier, and even of the more famous Mr. Crawford, will know what discount to allow on the universal eulogy of Mr. Tuckerman. American artists, as a habit, attack every conceivable subject with an enterprise approaching audacity; they cover canvases which for size seem to be in proportion to their own vast Continent; they deal as largely in marble as stone-masons. And yet a certain offhand untutored genius may be granted them. American art, which doubtless will enjoy an honourable future, has hitherto suffered from ignorance in its professors and patrons alike. An expenditure of money ill-judged and lavish beyond all precedent in the history of painting has done much to bring the Fine Arts of America down to the standard of wholesale manufactures.

QUETELET'S ANTHROPOMETRY.*

IN his Social Physics, published more than an average generation ago, M. Quetelet broke ground in the application of the method of statistics to the laws which govern man in his physical, moral, and intellectual capacity—a sublime trilogy, as he himself describes it, the depth and complexity of which our utmost energies are insufficient to fathom. The immaterial elements which may be taken to constitute two out of the three organic components of which the entire being of man is made up have been more fully treated in later publications of the writer, who has made himself well nigh the head of a whole section of contemporary thought and work by his application of the mathematical theory of probabilities to the problems of ethics and politics. How far it may be possible ultimately to reduce the phenomena of ethical and social action to anything like the precision or rigour of positive science must long remain a question. Whether treated according to the speculative method of earlier philosophy, or the inductive and positive systems distinctive of modern schools of thought, M. Quetelet begins with doubt as to the prospect of problems of this class being brought to anything like demonstration even in the most distant future. He indicates indeed the design of approximating closer to their solution in further treatises corresponding to each separate head of the inquiry. In his most recent work, for which he has chosen the descriptive title of Anthropometry, and which, though written long enough ago to be dedicated to Sir J. Herschel, may still be new to many, if not most, of our readers, the veteran statistician has gone, in a systematic way which has never been attempted before, into the physical development of man, the third of the several provinces of inquiry originally mapped out by him. His scheme embraces not only all that concerns the variations of stature or aspect which distinguish man in general, but also all that relates to his weight, strength, and muscular development. At the outset of his study of the bodily proportions of mankind the writer was dismayed by the immensity of the field opened to his researches. How many numerical elements would be needed as a basis for the measurement of each individual, and to how many individuals must the process of mensuration be extended in order to reach a standard at all approximating to the normal or the absolute? To what extent will the method be modified by the conditions of sex, of age, of health or disease, running as these do into the still more subtle yet undoubted and appreciable influences which are exerted upon the body by mental agencies, by passion, education, restlessness or sloth of temperament, and the like? In these complex inquiries the works of naturalists afforded little or no help. Buffon and others had indeed sounded the question, but only to complain that, with all his egotism or self-interest, man had only interested himself thus far in knowing what lay outside, rather than what inwardly concerned himself. In the words of a great thinker and writer of our own times, the patriot statesman Vincenzo Gioberti, echoed by our author, the discovery of a new insect or the invention of a piece of mechanism is an event to stir the world of letters more than the freshest or profoundest solution of any problem most vitally concerning the philosophy of mind and life. In despair of philosophers M. Quetelet betook himself to artists. From them he obtained some light, but not all the light he desired. For laws of nature they presented to him but tinctures of their own fancy. Instead of the proportions of man as they exist in reality, they offered notions of their own, arbitrarily or conventionally formed. Having himself in early life, when the crisis of his country's fortunes seemed to bar the way to political distinction, found an outlet for his energies in the study of the fine arts, before definitively devoting himself to mathematics and the cognate sciences, he found scope among the most precise or technical of his scientific conclusions for that artistic element which blends itself inseparably with the processes of all true science. He is thus enabled to extend his survey of humanity beyond the range, for instance, of the military and anthropological statistics of American soldiers collected by Mr. B. A. Gould, the works of Wagner, Oettingen, Wappæus, Grunert, and other German statists, or those of Professor Bodio of Venice, besides those of Mr. Buckle, Mr. Samuel Brown, and others to whom M. Quetelet tenders his acknowledgments. As a basis, giving at once solidity and a reasonable limit to his speculations, he began with laying down the principle of unity of type as underlying all differences in man. Mathematical proofs are capable of being brought in to establish the reality of this radical type. A curve or an equation may be made to express in geometrical or analytical terms the human mean—"l'homme moyen"—the result of the anthropometry of, let us say, ten thousand individuals. Not that it will be necessary in practice to extend so widely the scope of observation. As in a mathematical series a limited number of terms will in most cases suffice to express the sum or value of the whole, so is the law of relative proportion to be sufficiently made clear from taking the mean of a fixed number of individuals of the race or other natural group under consideration. Ten appears to M. Quetelet a sufficient number to form the basis of such a generalization. To obtain, for example, the anthropometry of woman, he tabulates the proportions of ten female models chosen from the studios of artists, the mean of which gives the typical values in point of dimension of parts, weight, and muscular force. From the like number of experimental cases he would deduce the comparative measure of English, French, German, and Belgian, as well as of man and woman, or of each sex at different periods of life. With the number of examples for his ordinate, and the figures yielded by these tabular measurements for his abscissa, the anthropometrician can construct a curve expressing the external aspects of humanity in relation to any or all of the purposes of science or art. For in the system thus laid down by him, science and art, M. Quetelet makes it his boast, find their meeting point and their common measure.

Passing from the general definition of his method, M. Quetelet proceeds to exemplify it in its application to the canon of the human figure as employed in the arts, especially in sculpture. For his historical summary of the various standards of proportion in use from the earliest times he has chiefly drawn upon the treatise of Audran and the more recent Polykletos of Schadow. It includes a clear and critical discussion of the results obtained from classical and Oriental literature, tested and verified by measurement of the standard examples of ancient sculpture. The earliest written record of this class, the Silpi Sastri, or "book of the Fine Arts," an old Sanscrit MS., gives the canon in use in archaic Indian art. For Egypt and Assyria we have the standards actually incised or painted upon various monumental remains. For the classical period there are but scattered notices like those of Phiny and Diodorus, while on the other hand we have among us the finest actual models for the purpose of measurement and comparison. The more modern schemes of proportion which date from the Renaissance, the ruling types of which we owe to Leonardo da Vinci, Alberti, and Albert Durer, rested as much upon an ideal or a priori harmony in the artist's own mind as upon exact and actual observation of natural forms. The idea of a mean, so fundamental an element in the more positive scheme of science in our day, and which M. Quetelet apparently claims to have brought for the first time into this province of the arts, found no place in the calculations of these great artists. We ought doubtless to feel grateful to our author in the interests of statistical science for the immense pains he has been at in accumulating the tables at the end of his volume, containing as they do measurements by the thousand rather than the hundred, extending to every possible subdivision of the frame of man, and corresponding to every sub-period of life and growth. Of the value of these minute and endless points of detail to the interests of art, as distinct from those of science, we expressed our opinion some years ago (Saturday Review, December 8, 1866), while reviewing Mr. Story's elaborate and ingenious Canon of the Human Figure, a work which, with all M. Quetelet's reading, including as it does books quite as recent in date, finds, to our surprise, no place in the copious range of literature here set before the reader. Otherwise the enumeration which he gives of savants and artists who have treated the subject of the canon leaves little to be desired.

As a matter of scientific interest, investigations of this kind can hardly be carried into too great detail, and M. Quetelet is strictly on his own ground when seeking in his third book to determine the ratio or the limits of bodily change from birth to extreme old age. His elaborate tables exhibit the mean heights in a number of individuals, male and female, of Belgian race, for every year up to twenty-five; from thence by decades up to ninety, marking the maximum of stature in each sex, and the subsequent ratio of decline. These measurements even extend to seventy subdivisions or therabouts of the human frame, including the minutest changes in the proportions of the head and facial lines. Some of his results—such as, for instance, that the ear remains at every age exactly equal in length to the sum of both the eyes; that the eye is constantly equal at once to the space between the eyes and to the width of the nose, or that the breadth of the eye is contained five times in the diameter of the head, taken through the temples, and seven times in that from the forehead to the base of the skull—even if in mathematical accord, the numerical co-efficients being patiently wrought out, callipers in hand, savour rather of the curious or chance coincidences which spring from any array or combination of figures than from any true morphological law grounded on the physical relation of parts in the organism. Before the still more complex and subtle problem of physiognomy, or of changes in facial expression, mien, or gait, M. Quetelet's method is to all appearance mute. Whatever may be the physical changes wrought upon the frame by mental action, by life in the world as compared with life in the cloister or the bush, by passions indulged or repressed, by the storms or the sunshine of life, these finer grades or modifications of form, intensely significant as they are to the eye and mind of the artist, find no place in the arithmetical columns or the algebraic formulas of the statistician. Nor can we pretend to feel so sanguine as our author in respect to the applicability of his system to intellectual and moral qualities in man, which must needs be subject to the same laws of geometrical or analytical expression if the science of anthropometry is to be complete. Much may be done to tabulate the results of human will and passion. The number and nature of crimes, the averages and dates of marriage, the proportions of legitimate and illegitimate births, the ratio of madness or suicide to the normal condition of sanity, full as they are of meaning and value to the jurist, the legislator, the social hygienist, or the philosophical observer of man's nature, are yet even in their furthest development and closest combination infinitely short of giving us that profound science of humanity which is to be, we are told, if not as exact as pure mathematics, at least equal in rigour with chemistry or astronomy, competent to analyse and to anticipate moral or political action with the same certainty which extends to eclipses, or to the combination of an alkali with an acid. In our author's view there are no limits to the predictions which he is prepared to assign to his new or more expanded calculus. He ends with the securing promise of a further advance, which is to co-ordinate in one the several spheres of vital or organic force, whether manifested in man, the animal, or the plant:—

Dans la cinquième et dernière section de cet ouvrage, j'ai essayé de faire voir que les mêmes formules, qui m'ont servi à déterminer la partie physique chez l'homme, peuvent servir également à déterminer ses qualités intellectuelles et morales, malgré la difficulté qu'on rencontre, ici, à faire l'application des nombres.

Il y a plus, les hommes ne sont pas seuls liés entre eux par des lois communes: il en est de même des animaux, il en est de même des végétaux. Tout être qui vit est soumis à des lois appropriées à son espèce; et ces lois ont plus de principes communs qu'on ne le suppose. Si l'attention se fixe sur elles, et dans l'état de progrès où se trouve l'intelligence humaine, le moment n'est pas éloigné où l'on concevra mieux les rapports qui existent entre les différents corps vivants de la nature. On les étudiera plus intimement; on ne se bornera plus à reconnaître les principales phases qui les représentent et qui jusqu'ici avaient échappé à l'attention des observateurs. On voudra en connaître le mode d'action, les forces qui les développent, et spécialement les grandes lois qui, à son usage, concernent l'homme et régissent son développement physique, en même temps que son développement moral et intellectuel.

The vision of an ascending scale in which the individual of a race is lost in the mean or average man of that race, the race itself absorbed in man or total humanity, and the being of man himself sublimated by a common process to a condition in which all differences among living things ultimately disappear—a unity harmonious and grandly simple, in which all minor components or individual factors are swept into geometrical curves or algebraical series—must remain, we fear, little more than an utopian ideal. While sketching, as he seeks to do, the main outlines of such a scheme, and laying down in the science of number and figure the principles on which alone it must ultimately rest, M. Quetelet seems thoroughly alive to the difficulties and complexities which must leave it to the most subtle or daring of existing philosophers a golden dream. He has nevertheless, in the abstract statement of those principles, and in their application to such portions of the problem as lie within tangible limits and are capable of an approximate solution, made a contribution of real and abiding value to the literature of philosophy.

THE LIFE OF THOMAS COOPER.*

MR. THOMAS COOPER has in turn been a shoemaker, a schoolmaster, a newspaper writer, editor, and proprietor, the manager of a choral society, a Chartist lecturer, a Chartist prisoner, copying clerk in a Government office, a poet, a novelist, a two days actor, a Methodist preacher, a Unitarian lecturer, a Baptist lecturer, and the writer of his own biography. There is scarcely any subject which he has not studied, and there is no subject on which he has not lectured, from "Pythagoras and Beau Brummell"—this association of names is none of ours—to aristocracy and the vegetable kingdom. In eight years and a half he had delivered, as he tells us, 3,373 discourses, but overcome with fatigue he has been forced to practise moderation, and of late has "never dared to preach more than twice on Sunday, and has limited himself to three or four lectures in each week." It is some satisfaction, by the way, to find that when a sermon is delivered, it is not only the congregation that suffers fatigue, but that the preacher, while wearying others, gets also occasionally wearied himself. Mr. Cooper, being thus cut off from his usual occupations, and finding, no doubt, time hanging heavily on his hands with only six discourses to deliver a week, has varied the monotony of his old age by composing his own biography. He says, with a charming frankness, "I have written the book chiefly to please myself," and he goes on to add, "Most likely I shall become tedious to some readers when I am gratifying myself most fully. But any reader who is displeased with my narrative can pass over the pages in which he feels no interest." Who, as he passes over Mr. Cooper's pages, and finds how tedious he can at times be, but must think of the 3,373 sermons and lectures, where the listeners could not pass over the tedious passages? If we allow him on the average an audience of only three hundred at each discourse, and assume that, as in his book so also in his discourses, Mr. Cooper was apt to gratify himself most fully at the expense of his audience, we must picture to ourselves more than a million of our fellow-creatures who have in less than nine years had all his tediousness inflicted on them, with scarce a chance of escape. After all, the suffering of a battle-field is certainly great enough, but even the worst of conquerors has scarcely more to answer for than a man who preaches six sermons a week, and, when decency would allow him to stop in half-an-hour, drags on for half-an-hour more. We do not mean to say that Mr. Cooper, in the work before us, is tedious throughout. On the contrary, he is at times interesting enough, but whether he is dull or whether he is lively is merely a matter of accident, and so far as we can see is altogether out of his own control. Many parts of his autobiography seem to us to be formed on the model of those chapters in the Books of Chronicles where we find given long lists of names of people and places of which we know nothing. Just as these passages are chosen by the proud dame of some village school wherein to display before the squire's or the parson's wife the precocity of some favourite scholar, who from words of one syllable has advanced to the longest Hebrew names, so might Mr. Cooper's pages supply to schools where the Bible is not allowed to be read lists of names, if not as difficult, still nearly as long. So fond indeed is he of stringing together names of people and of places, that his work combines much of the interest of the Post Office Directory and of the advertising board where we read the list of those happy spots where alone can be purchased Horniman's unadulterated tea. In one place we read how he—

Enlisted Bob Mason, and Tom Aram, and George Laister, and Joe Cawthrey, and Joe Carver, and Bill Tyson, and Jack Barton, and George Wimble.

In another place we are told how—

In addition to the lectures I delivered in 1858 at Sheffield, Norwich, York, Bradford, Leeds, Sunderland, North and South Shields, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Hexham, Stockton-on-Tees, the Hartlepoons, Nottingham, the Staffordshire Potteries, Barnsley, Halifax, Keighley, Darlington, Leicester, Bilston, Cardiff, Devonport, and Exeter, I entered Cornwall for the first time, and preached and lectured at Falmouth, Penryn, Penzance, Redruth, and Truro.

These long lists of names, however, are easily shunned, for the capital letters of which they are full, like so many tall beacons, give full warning of the dreary wastes into which the reader is drifting. If all its dull parts were equally well marked, we could honestly recommend this book, for it contains a good deal that is worth reading for those who can afford time to get at it. The life of a self-taught and self-raised man, who has gone through such varied experiences as have fallen to the lot of Mr. Cooper, must indeed be badly written if it fail to be here and there interesting. Then, too, Mr. Cooper has all that perfect confidence in himself, that complete feeling of self-satisfaction, that full conceit of his own powers and knowledge, which are so naturally found in a man who has raised himself far above his fellows, and which, when found, as much claim our indulgence as afford us amusement. He is proud of his memory of early days, as so many men are, and can boast that he remembers "how Mother Hundrell, the milk-woman, used to give me white bread thickly covered with cream," when he was not three years old. We, too, have our early memories, connected though with brown bread and treacle, which we shall be quite ready to impart to the world should we ever turn poet or get sent to prison. Mr. Cooper can boast how "at three years old I used to be set on a stool, in Dame Brown's school, to teach one Master Bodley, who was seven years old, his letters." Years later, when he had passed from Dame Brown's school to the Assize Court at Stafford, and had to defend himself against a charge of sedition and conspiracy, he tells us:—

I do not think that I ever spoke so powerfully in my life as during the last hour of that defence. The peroration, the Stafford papers said, would never be forgotten; and I remember, as I sat down, panting for breath and utterly exhausted, how Talfourd and Erskine and the Jury sat transfixed, gazing at me in silence; and the whole crowded place was breathless, as it should be, for a minute.

As Mr. Cooper's defence had lasted ten hours—a space of time, by the way, that is equal to ten Dissenting and twenty Church of England sermons—we do not wonder that counsel, judge, and jury sat transfixed. Our only wonder is to learn that apparently the speaker alone was "utterly exhausted," and that the jury were wide enough awake to gaze even in silence.

Proud as Mr. Cooper is of his memory, his precocity, and his oratory, still prouder is he of his poetry. We have not read his magnum opus, the Purgatory of Suicides, and do not know that we intend to read it, even though Serjeant Talfourd in the House of Commons said that "he did not yield to his friend, or to the honourable gentlemen opposite, in their intelligent admiration of that magnificent poem"; and even though Mr. Carlyle says, "I find indisputable traces of genius in it—a dark Titanic energy struggling there, for which we hope there will be clearer daylight by-and-by." Mr. Carlyle goes on, by the way, to give his usual advice to the poet whom he praises, and urges him "to try your next work in prose." But then we must remember that Mr. Carlyle had not yet read one of Mr. Cooper's prose works, or else he might have urged him to try his next in verse. The struggles of "a dark Titanic energy" are after all best confined within limits; and though the restraints of verse are not quite equal to those of a strait-waistcoat, yet they are better than the unbounded freedom afforded by prose. Not only can he quote Mr. Carlyle's approval, but also Mr. Wordsworth's, though with modesty he adds:—

What the great author of "The Excursion" said respecting my Prison Rhyme I shall not relate here; but, remembering what he said, I can also bear the remembrance that the Quarterly, Edinburgh, Westminster, and Times have hitherto, and alike, judged it fit to be silent as to there being such a poem in existence.

We would venture, in the Earl of Derby's words, to remind these exalted publications that "there is the responsibility of silence as well as of speech," and to warn them lest, as Dante placed those who injured him in Hell, so Mr. Cooper may place them in his own peculiar Purgatory. We, at all events, should not be sorry to free ourselves from the reproach, and if Mr. Cooper will send us the next edition of his works, perhaps we may find him a place among our Minor Poets.

If the Reviews neglected him, he had no cause to complain of some of the great politicians and writers. The "incoruptible and unsubduable Mr. P. A. Taylor" was his fellow-member in "The People's International League," and he can also frequently boast of "my Right Hon. friend, the Vice-President of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council," and testify at once to "his most pellucid conscientiousness and sterling political integrity," as well as to the liberality with which he subscribed 50*l.* towards a fund that was raised to purchase him an annuity. Mr. Disraeli also treated him with great distinction—with much more indeed than "the tall Hebrew who came to the door with a silver waiter in his hand" to answer Mr. Cooper's knock. Whether "the tall Hebrew" had brought the silver waiter in readiness for the manuscript of the Purgatory of Suicides, or merely in an excess of foresight with a view to Mr. Cooper's card, we are not told. At first, "in ceremonious style," he assured Mr. Cooper that Mr. Disraeli was not at home; but when, finding that his master would see the poet, he was going on to apologize, under the plea that "it was his business to say 'not at home,'" he was cut short by "a light silvery voice from above," that cried, "Why don't you bring the gentleman up?" We need scarcely say that "the light silvery voice" came from Mrs. Disraeli, who after this memorable speech "at the top of the staircase very gracefully bowed and withdrew." Kindly as he was received by Mr. Disraeli, still more kindly was he welcomed by Douglas Jerrold. "The man of genius," he tells us, "grasped my hand, and gazed on my face as I gazed on his, with unmistakable pleasure," and exclaiming, "Your poetry is noble—it's manly," offered him some bread and cheese, and rising to still greater heights of hospitality, added, "I think there is some ham—we shall see." After all, these little conceits are as pardonable as they are laughable. Much in the way of innocent vanity may be forgiven to a man who has pushed up his way from a shoemaker's stall to a Minister's library, and who, after a life of restless study, and still more restless work, finds men of no mean standing in the country gather round him to support his declining years. For many years in his youth Mr. Cooper lived on ten shillings a week, for which he had to labour hard and long at shoemaking, while all his leisure time he devoted to severe study. There are few men who have at one period of their life lived by the labour of their hands who can ever quite get over their pleased surprise at finding themselves the associates even of those who live by the labour of their brains, much more of those who can live without any labour at all. If they live to an advanced old age, they can still, when they reflect on what they once were and what they now are, whom they once knew and whom they now know, indulge in the "wonder how the devil they got there." It is impossible for us to tell what degree of accuracy Mr. Cooper attained in his studies of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, German, and Italian, not to mention mathematics, divinity, and sceptical literature. His method of studying English was at all events thoroughly sound, for he set to work to commit to memory passages from the great masters. In talking of his powers as a preacher he says, "I had become master of a vocabulary of no mean order by committing Milton and Shakespeare to memory and repeating them so often." We wish that not only preachers, but also novelists, could be made to go through a like training. It is refreshing to turn from that strangest of all tongues, the language of the so-called sensational novel, to Mr. Cooper's idiomatic English, even when his garrulity is at its flood. We know scores of popular writers whose style would be greatly improved if every morning before they began to write they were forced to learn off by heart a page even of the Life of Thomas Cooper.

(Second Notice.)

THE XIIIth Corps, the history of which in the field has been already noticed, found itself collected at Paris on the 6th September, the only regular force on which the city could rely. True, there were being hurried up from all quarters marines, sailors, and dépôts of the line which were to form a XIVth Corps; but these reinforcements existed as yet only in detachments unorganized for any combined operation, so that at the beginning of the investment the guardianship of Paris devolved chiefly on Vinoy's command. This had been diminished by only three hundred and fifty men during its late campaign. Many of the battalions, however, were still incomplete in their cadres of officers, and but few were properly equipped, so that the staff had a heavy task to face; and their chief gives his officers credit for the exertions they underwent, and his men for the readiness with which they fell into an unwonted discipline.

No one at this time knew how vast an amount of provisions had been accumulated for the coming siege. For their activity in this work the Government of the 4th September has never, as it seems to us, received the credit due to it. The duration of the blockade was not guessed at by any one, nor was the notion generally entertained that the Prussian staff from the first would rely chiefly on its effects, and on the final starvation of the place into surrender. More immediate perils, Vinoy tells us, occupied the minds of men of all classes. To arm effectively the ninety-four bastions of the enceinte, besides the seventeen forts that formed the outer circle of defence, seemed to be a more hopeless task even than to lay in stores that should maintain two millions of souls for months. The Prussians, it was thought, would on arriving attack some of the outer forts without delay: and Vinoy, like other regular officers who knew of the pusillanimity shown by the French troops at Sedan, formed the worst conclusions as to what would happen if an attack were made on the enceinte. For this must be largely garrisoned by battalions of the newly-armed populace, "who were much more ready for making political demonstrations, or chanting refrains more or less patriotic, than for serious fighting"—words which contain the moral of the events that followed, although the enemy proved less venturesome than was feared. Even the progress of the very works necessary for the completion of the defences felt the evil influence of the time. Doubts were traced out hastily at Montretout, Chatillon, and many other less important points, which, if completed, would have doubled the defensive power of the circle of forts; but the necessary work was hastily given out to contractors employing civilian labourers, and the latter were so absorbed in political visions that they could not be got to stick to their engagements. Hence the scandal of the incompleteness of these undertakings, which fell at once into Prussian hands, or, left unfinished by either side, remained monuments of shame against the administration of Trochu and his colleagues. The XIIIth Corps, however, was posted to the west of Paris, and gave some help to the labours on that side, though this was far from supplying the gap left by the remissness of the couriers, whom no wages could keep to their work.

In addition to provisioning and bringing into the capital such fragments of regular troops as were left to France, the Government of Defence resolved on ordering up all available battalions of the Garde Mobile from the districts still accessible. Including the levies of the Seine Department, ninety of these were introduced before the siege began; the object being, as Vinoy states, to raise the confidence of the inhabitants by letting them see what a mass of defenders their city had within it. Possibly, too, some provision of the soberer members of the Government already gave them uneasiness as to their own situation amid the myriads of armed citizens who were pleased to call themselves National Guards, and the Mobiles of the country districts were looked to as the counterbalance, which they actually became, to ultra-revolutionary attempts against the leaders of the revolution. Twenty-eight of these battalions came from the Western departments, and afforded every promise of soon becoming solid and useful troops. On the other hand, the Gardes Mobiles of the Seine Department, eighteen battalions strong, kept up from the first the evil reputation they had gained by their early mutiny at Châlons, and to the last day of the siege were a source of danger and weakness. Vinoy withholds the condemnation which Trochu so richly deserves for his share of their misconduct, condoned by his weakness at whose instance they had been brought back to the capital they disgraced; but history will not spare the ex-Governor of Paris. Nor can he in any way escape the responsibility which lies upon him as chief of the new Government for the ill-omened decree of the 17th of September, which deprived all the Mobile officers of their commissions, and ordered that each battalion should proceed to elect its own staff. Vinoy in vain remonstrated against this foolish edict. Happily the better-ordered provincial battalions rebuked the madness of their rulers by electing their former officers. But with those of the capital and suburbs this measure gave a fatal blow to all attempts at discipline. Their newly-chosen officers never seriously attempted to enforce powers which might disappear as suddenly as they were gained, and thenceforward this section of the Mobiles, like the mass of the newly-raised National Guards, became a greater terror to their chiefs than to the enemy outside.

Before this day the enemy was close upon the city, and the last fugitives who had the means of travelling had departed. Their places were more than filled up by the crowds of timid and helpless persons who left their lonely farms in the country to take refuge from the dreaded Prussians at the risk of being starved in the capital. Late on the 15th the enemy were reputed to be approaching Joinville, and Vinoy was moved with his corps at nightfall in the direction of Vincennes, towards Joinville-le-Pont upon the Marne; nor was it until the 16th that Trochu found that his messengers had misinformed him, and that Joinville on the Seine, many miles further to the South, was the point on which the Germans were marching. The two divisions of cavalry outside were now forced abruptly to retire before Prussian advanced guards, one entering Paris, and the other retreating on Versailles, whence it escaped, under General Reyau, to become part of the Army of the Loire. It was evident that matters were to become serious, and regular rationing of the mass of armed men commenced from this day. Trochu's Government had already taken the precaution of sending its delegates to Tours to organize the defence, and had taken all the proper measures for distributing the vast length of the enceinte and the forts into fit commands under general officers or admirals. On paper General Trochu's arrangements were excellent, only he was completely lacked the power or the will to breathe into the mixed forces under him the necessary spirit of subordination and discipline which would have given the more energetic officers the chances they never had.

On the 17th Vinoy left Paris with a division for Oretail to feel for the enemy, in fact to make a reconnaissance in force. He was not long in discovering that the country before him was full of German troops, and after a slight skirmish fell back before a considerable force which had been preparing to seize the Choisy passage over the Seine. But his cavalry had before this affair been engaged in dispersing a band of armed marauders—Frenchmen—who were plundering the deserted farms of their fellow-countrymen round Oretail; and his corps had a more disagreeable taste of the quality of their supporters after nightfall, when the stray shots of excited National Guards, firing wildly from the enceinte into the darkness, killed one and wounded several other soldiers of the corps in their bivouac.

Next day Trochu placed Vinoy's corps with the lately formed XIVth, led by General Renault, in one command under his friend Ducrot, just escaped by a device which is sufficiently well known from the Prussian lines on the Moselle. A verbose apology informed Vinoy of his practical supersession, and he was directed on the Villejuif plateau, outside the south-eastern angle of the enceinte, to support Ducrot's own movement of offence with the XIVth Corps—an endeavour to surprise the Bavarians near Chatillon as they followed the Crown Prince towards Versailles. The XIIIth were not engaged, and escaped all share in the disgraceful rout in which Ducrot's advance issued. Entering the city on the news of this disaster, Vinoy witnessed the shameful conduct of the fugitives, giving themselves up to the intoxication which soon became a recognized element in the defence of Paris, whilst he waited impatiently the arrival of his leading troops. It was 4 p.m. before these came up to line the threatened portion of the enceinte. Vinoy declines to enter fully into the question whether the Germans made proper use of their advantages on this day, giving it, however, as his own opinion that, had they followed up the fugitives from Chatillon boldly, they had fair chance of slipping between the forts and entering the enceinte unopposed in the general discouragement of the defenders. With the failure of Ducrot's first sortie all real thought of active resistance died away. The Prussians on their part took up a more attitude of observation, and the petty affairs which Vinoy daily chronicles up to the end of October made no change of importance in the general state of the investment. Such good service as was really done in these fell mostly to the share of the XIIIth Corps, and Vinoy could part from his old command with a sentiment of mutual respect when the decree of the 6th of November gave a new and more complete organization, too long delayed from personal or political motives, to the whole of the defending forces of Paris.

Vinoy now received command of the so-called Third Army, the history of which constitutes the second section of his work. This was a mass of 70,000 men in six scattered divisions, destined apparently to act as reserves to the fighting or Second Army of Ducrot, which numbered 105,000 men strong, and absorbed all the really trained soldiers of the infantry, including of course Vinoy's former command. The First Army, under poor Clément Thomas, was a mere mass of National Guards in separate battalions, estimated at 133,000 men, whilst detached forces of 80,000 men were distributed in special garrisons about the forts and ramparts, making a total of 388,000 men bearing arms in the defence. The real hopes of deliverance, so far as any can be said to have existed, lay in the efforts of Ducrot's command, which alone had any pretensions to act as a field force, and this fact reduces Vinoy's share in the after events to one of less significance than before, though his post was nominally higher.

The precious days of November passed by in that variety of inaction which was called the completion of the new organization. At its close Trochu, abandoning his favourite notion of a march on Normandy, made the celebrated attempt to burst the lines of investment at their south-eastern angle with the Second Army, which resulted in the hard-fought but useless actions before Brie and Champigny, and in the final retreat of Ducrot across the Marne, which his troops had crossed too late for any purpose of surprise. Vinoy's share in the enterprise was to co-operate by attacking the Germans just to the westward of the main sortie, on the other side of the Seine. Slightly successful at the outset, he was naturally recalled by Trochu on the first failure of the main operation; and his advice after the battle of the 30th, which was to march Ducrot's army secretly across Paris from the Marne, and utilize its possession of interior lines by pushing it suddenly on Versailles, was disregarded. Trochu preferred holding the villages gained across the Marne, from which his troops found it necessary to retreat three days later.

The most important episode in the history of the Third Army was its occupation of Mount Avron, which dates from this period, when the fire of some batteries from that commanding hill across the Marne was found to influence seriously the fortunes of the action at Brie. Vinoy was moved to this point with a part of his command, and held it until driven out by the concentrated German fire, which forced his troops fairly from the hill during the snows of that bitter Christmas. Here, then, for the first time is written the full story of the first occupation of the plateau; of the advance beyond it for part of a day into Ville Evrard, which so alarmed—if the word be not too strong—the Germans for the safety of their great Lagny dépôt beyond; of the surprise of the new French advanced posts by an inferior force of Saxons; and of the final bombardment of the hill, which forced Vinoy to retire within the lines of the forts behind. "Too late" is the moral of the tale throughout. Too late were begun the works upon the hill—here, again, fatally entrusted to the desultory labour of demoralized workmen from the city; and much too late the apparently bold advance beyond, which a few weeks earlier might have seriously influenced the investment. The troops also seem now to have lost their heart from constant inaction, varied only by ill success; and Vinoy is too honest a writer to disguise the fact that General Blaise's men behaved badly after their leader fell at Ville Evrard, and allowed themselves to be forced from their strong position by a mere handful of Saxons.

that issued thence in the last hopeless sortie on Montretout which preceded Trochu's resolve to surrender. Into the fall of the once popular Governor of Paris and his supersession by Vinoy the present work does not carry us, and we close our notice of it here. Our duty as critics compels us to notice that the book needs some revision. Such mistakes as those which omit all mention of the XIIth Corps in the army destroyed at Sedan, and enumerate but five of the six divisions which formed Vinoy's own Third Army in November, might have been avoided by a proper correction for the press. But the work is on the whole essentially an honest and painstaking one. The gallant writer does well in his appendix to give the most valuable proof of care—the insertion of such original documents as best illustrate and complete his text; and of the whole we may repeat what we said in our opening remarks, that it reflects credit on the author as a soldier and compiler of history, who thus offers to the world what serves at once as his own justification and as invaluable material to those who would study the military side of the greatest siege the world has ever seen.

SIDGWICK'S SCENES FROM EURIPIDES AND ARISTOPHANES.*

SOME time ago we welcomed a series of Latin and English texts, briefly annotated, and published by Messrs. Seeley, as an earnest of a cheaper supply of well edited school-books. The aim proposed was to furnish a half-year's reading at such a cost as would not be grudged even if the books were fairly worn out by the end of it. It is satisfactory to find that so excellent a notion does not limit itself to a single publishing firm, or to a couple of languages only. A schoolboy's first introduction to Greek plays begins, if he is tolerably forward, at an age when he has yet to learn that fondness for a bookshelf or a library which alone can save books from being thrown aside or got rid of as soon as they are done with. Moreover it is undesirable to encumber unadvanced pupils with whole plays at a point of progress at which the choruses are likely to be as dark to them as Hebrew or Coptic; and with the half-initiated a deterrent sense of difficulty is apt to attach to the very form and appearance of a Greek drama. At Rugby and other public schools it was an old custom to read a Greek play in certain forms with the omission of the choruses, which it was an article of boyish faith to suppose never were, and never were meant to be intelligible. Now, as far as we know, Mr. A. Sidgwick is the first to begin a great improvement in this state of things. Not professing to give whole dramas, with their customary admixture of iambs, trochees, and choral odes, as pabulum for learners who can barely digest the level speeches and dialogues commonly confined to the first-named metre, he has arranged extracted scenes with much tact and skill, and set them before the pupil with all needful information in the shape of notes at the end of the book; besides which he has added a somewhat novel, but highly commendable and valuable feature—namely, appropriate headings to the commencement of each scene, and appropriate stage directions during its progress. The bare and uninviting form of a Teubner or a Tauchnitz text is thus exchanged for an outward appearance which is at once suggestive and attractive; and in the interest of the studium juvenius, which it was the old fashion to leave to find out its meanings and bearings by the unassisted light of nature, we hail the kindly rays with which a sensible and successful teacher has seen fit to illuminate a path always more or less obscure. In truth, Mr. Sidgwick seems to have studied attractiveness in his whole scheme far more than the elder Orbilius would have considered it proper or wholesome to do. Whilst presenting his readers with specimens of the three distinct forms of Greek drama in vogue at Athens in her zenith of literary glory—the Tragedy, the Satyric drama, and the Comedy—he has chosen the very samples of each which are fittest to interest and to amuse, and, avoiding the hackneyed "Person's four," and "Monk's two," and the formerly inevitable Achærians, has given a taste of plays not a whit less characteristic, and certainly more uncommon. This applies in a special degree to the Euripidean works. The Iphigenia in Tauris is a play attractive in its plot and situations, and eminent amongst the dramas of its author for the moral worth of its characters, and the noble, though natural, tone of the sentiments they utter. Iphigenia, the humane priestess of a barbarous ritual; Orestes, interesting on the score of his sufferings and of his fabled friendship with Pylades; Pylades himself, impressive in his devotion to his "other self," though some might say that in yielding the point as to which should be Iphigenia's messenger, he recognized too easily the superior claims of "number one"—all these characters appeal to the sympathy of young readers as well by their energy and resource in action, which boys honour, as by their sentiments, which, if too gnomic and subtle, would be voted twaddle by such critics. But such is not the case with these dramatis personæ, nor do we know any more natural touches in Euripides than two with which he enhances his conception of Iphigenia. One is where, when Orestes and Pylades are brought first before her in manacles, she pities the handsome strangers, and wonders

τίς ἄρα μήτηρ ἢ τευκὺς ὅμῃς ποτὶ
παῖρ τ' ἀδελφὴ τ', εἰ γέγονα τυγχάνει;

οἷον στερῆσαι διππύχων νεανῶν
ἀνδράλφους ἱστῶν.—V. 215-18.

And as to you—what mother gave you birth?
Who was your father? and your sister, who—
If sister you possess? I pity her;
Bereaved of two such youths, she is bereaved.

(Cartwright's Translation.)

The other will be found in the messenger's narrative of the escape of the priestess and her new-found allies to Argos. He describes her on board the Greek galley, which a tempestuous sea forbade to get clear off from the inhospitable shores, as praying to Artemis, with the touching adjuration:—

φιλεῖς δὲ καὶ σὺ σὺν κασίγνητος, θεά·
φιλεῖν δὲ καὶ τὸς ὁμαίμονας δόκει.—V. 357-8.

Thou lovest thine own brother; oh! believe
That I love mine.—Ibid. v. 222.

Except in one line, where Mr. Sidgwick fails to note the ambiguity of Iphigenia's reply (v. 442) to the King's reluctant assent to the captives being purged of their blood-guiltiness by solemn ablutions (ἰσώτητον γούν τῷ θεῷ πείσσειν ἄν), and leaves the learner to divine that καὶ τὰμὰ γ' οὕτω μᾶλλον ἂν καλῶς ἔχοι

is susceptible of one interpretation by Thoms and of another by the speaker, we have come upon no place where all needful help is not rendered to the reader; and it is a surprise to us how wonderfully the coherence and consecutiveness of the plot has been preserved by means of "stage directions" and italicized hints, notwithstanding the very considerable omissions of Euripides' matter which the editor's plan necessitates. When we add that the titles of the seven scenes in this play are "the Dream," "the Arrival," "the Capture," "the Message," "the Recognition," "the Plot," and "the Finale," it will be seen by those who are familiar with the play how cleverly the chief situations have been preserved, and it will be understood by the uninitiated how lively a plot awaits their unravelling.

In the Cyclops, the sole extant specimen of the jocular satyric play which made a fourth part of each Greek tetralogy, and bore witness to the pre-existence of the rude old Dionysiac dramas, Mr. Sidgwick has provided a treat for even his involuntary readers. The action and the characters are sure to enlist the interest of boys. The gorged old Cyclops, the bibulous Silenus, those half-unconscious poltroons the chorus of Satyrs, and the resourceful Ulysses, with a touch of comedy thrown into his portraiture to accommodate him to his company and amuse the audience, make a dramatis personæ such as could not be met in Attic tragedy or comedy proper. There is plenty of "sensation" in the Cyclops, though its range is limited, and though, as Donaldson pointed out, the chorus does not leave the orchestra. But the open fun and the sly hits of the dialogue are most taking; as witness the allusion to a democracy, and the surely satirical definition of it contained in Odysseus's question and Silenus's answer as to the land upon which the former had been stranded:—

Οἷ. τίνας κλύοντες; ἢ δειδμενται κράτος;

Στ. νομίμεις· ἀκούει δ' οὐδὲν οὐδεὶς οὐδένος.—78-9.

The youthful readers of this latter line will hardly, after it, care to accept the programme of Citizen Dilke or Mr. Odger. The gnomic wisdom too of the chief interlocutors is very homely and practical. When Odysseus offers Silenus a taste of his wine-flask, the connoisseur satirically affirms the wisdom of whetting the appetite for a sale or barter with a drop of something, in his reply δικαίον. ἢ γὰρ γέυμα τὴν ἀνὴν καλεῖ.—109.

Right. 'Tis a taste that leads to purchasing.

And in a former line, in the matter of milk and cheese, Odysseus provokes a laugh by saying, "It's as well to see what you're going to buy." The funning of the devil-may-care Satyrs with their awkward customer Polyphemus is also exquisite when they have to answer his question, whether they have filled his milk bowls, and with what sort of milk? "Which you please," is their answer; "only don't gulp down us!" But the Cyclops has a retort for them, after this fashion:—

Certainly not, lest leaping in my stomach

Ye should upset it with your cursed capers.—164-5.

Not amiss, also, is the fawning suggestion of old Silenus to the Cyclops to do a little cannibalism for a change, because τὰ καὶ γ' ἐκ τῶν ἡλάδων—ἡδίων ἱστῶν (194-195)—"novelties in gourmanderie," that is, "are pleasanter than routine dishes." A survey of the editor's brief notes to this play will prove that he is quite as alive to the illustration of such points of humour—indeed of all quaint allusions, such as, e.g., the well known Greek proverb for putting another and one you hold cheap to bear the brunt, ἐν τῷ καπὶ ἐκδυσκόρου (511)—as he is to the needful explication of such elliptical forms as ὅτι μὴ with a subjunctive, or ὅπως with a future indicative. Appendix of this class of notes, Mr. Sidgwick has done well to append a very short grammatical index of them to each play, thus enabling a pupil to take stock of his acquisitions in this kind within a given time, and impressing upon him, as he is able to take it in, that insight into peculiarities of construction which goes furthest towards the making of a scholar.

Of the Aristophanic plays which Mr. Sidgwick has edited after the same fashion as those of Euripides on which we have been dwelling, and which we presume he intends for a not much more advanced form, as he considerably enlarges the characters, the same base, and indeed all, for the most part, save the iambic passages, we single out the Clouds for a hasty glance at his execution of it. It appears to have been the latest published of these cheap and handy drachmas, and, if there be a pin to choose, perhaps it has the most interest of the four. Socrates is a hero with boys very much for the comic side of his character; and here he is in a comedy, just a little caricatured no doubt, but not the less welcome, and not more discredited, because Aristophanes has designed to hold him up to ridicule. We should not wish for a livelier or more sensible guide to a young scholar over the new ground of Attic comedy than Mr. Sidgwick shows himself in a commentary which, though of the briefest, shirks no difficulty, and combines thorough knowledge of his subject with a rare insight into boys' modes of thought and capacity for receiving derived knowledge. He is very good, and this because he keeps within due bounds, at realizing in English the puns and surprises (παρά προδοκίαν) so common in Aristophanes. We have no occasion to interject "oh!" or "oh!" at forced hits which are only vivid to the translator's eye. Some recent editors and translators have marred more than they made of Aristophanes. But Mr. Sidgwick just indicates the style and point of a joke, and does not wear it threadbare. Thus when Strepsiades from under the bedclothes cries

ἢ ἀρνακίων γνῶμην ἀποστρηφίδα; (v. 319 = 729;

he is content with rendering it "who can give me from fleeces a device to fleece?" and refrains from the over-elaborateness of Walsh's version—"Alas! who'll cover me with the coarse rugged rugs of rogues?" Earlier in the play, where Strepsiades says of his son's love for horseflesh, ἀλλ' ἵππερον μου κατίχεν τῶν χρημάτων (v. 64), just enough light is thrown upon the point by noting the comic coinage, ἵππερον, "horse-plague," formed like ἵκτερον, "jaundice," and by suggesting that similarly "yellow-fever" might become "bay-fever." In like manner, a few lines further on, when Strepsiades, pointing across the street to Socrates's house, tells his son that yonder's the place where teachers will make you believe the sky's an oven—

κἄστιν περὶ ἡμῶς οὗτος, ἡμεῖς ὁ ἀνθρώπος (v. 87)—

our editor notices the unexpected use of ἀνθρώπος by a stroke of humour for ἀνθρώποι; "we're the young sparks inside." He might have illustrated this turn by the use of ἀλφίτων for χρημάτων, in v. 96 (ἀλλ' εἰ τι κήναι τῶν πατρίων ἀλφίτων), where the humour consists in substituting, as it were, "loaf" for "life."

Sometimes Mr. Sidgwick indulges in a little irony of his own, as where, upon Socrates's exhortation to his dull scholar to suspend his thought in the air—

λινδότερον ὡσπερ μελομένην τοῦ ποδός (v. 351 = 764)—

A.c. "like a cockchafer tied by a thread from its foot," he quietly notes that "this humane and exciting sport would seem to be ancient." To these plays, as well as to those of Euripides on which we have dwelt, are added, where there seems occasion, appropriate "stage directions," such as very materially conduce to the understanding of the dialogue, and throw a light on the mock mysteries of the basket, the phrontisterium, and the dark inner sanctum of the Socratic burlesque. There need be no fear of a schoolboy's study of Aristophanes suffering ὑπερβολῶς if he has Mr. Sidgwick, or his editions, to assist him in bringing his knowledge to the birth.

In just one or two places we have a doubt whether he has not elected the worst of two competing interpretations. Thus, in v. 29 it seems better to interpret ἐλαίας with Mr. Paley and Mr. Green, of "taking the horse out of his harness" (cf. Xenoph. Ecce. xi. 18) than, as the Scholiast does, of "rolling a horse in the sand after exercise." Going back to the Iphigenia in Tauris, we doubt whether he is right, in v. 510-11 (= 1351-2), in regarding πρυμνία as in apposition with ἐλπίδας. "Others," translates Paley, "were getting ready ladders and hauling in the cable by passing it through their hands"; and this seems to be the sense. In v. 550, too, he would have done well to adopt Hermann's emendation, πνίον, for νίος. At v. 125 it appears to us beside the question to translate ἄλινον πόντον the "homeless path"—i.e., "the sea"—when the words point distinctly to the "Euxine mendax cognomine pontus" of Ovid. In v. 145 ἀγάλας is for ἀγάλας rather than ἀγάλας.

But, independently of the praise due to Mr. Sidgwick for a bold thrust at the rotten old barrier to learning presented by dear school books, his general execution of his editorial task is just what we should have expected from his approved and finished scholarship.

MEN WERE DECEIVERS EVER.

ALTHOUGH Mr. Hamilton Marshall announces himself as the author of a previous story, For Very Life, we imagine that he must still be a novice in his art. We further learn from a dedication that he is an admirer and apparently a personal friend of Mr. Carlyle. We may frankly congratulate him on both circumstances. Youth is a blessing, and so is the friendship of a great writer. Such influences, however, are sometimes apt to produce literary results of questionable value. Carlyle considered as a persuasion is, for anything we have to say to the contrary, very excellent in its way, but its devotees are given to a disagreeable form of affectation. The style which in the hands of the master is perfectly spontaneous, or, if in any sense acquired, has been acquired so completely that it is now as good as spontaneous, degenerates in the hands of some of his disciples into the most offensive mannerism extant. We are glad to say that Mr. Marshall does not fall into this error. He does not talk about the eternal silences, or denounce shame and wind-lags—at least under those names—or even remark that speech is silvern and silence golden. The influence acts powerfully upon him, but in a different way; and he must certainly have the credit of possessing a style of his own. It is not in all respects a bad style; but certainly it is in a high degree jerky and spasmodic. One peculiarity which is easily defined is a profuse indulgence in full stops. If Mr. Marshall's writings were at all voluminous, he would speedily outrun the resources of any ordinary printing establishment. His pages bristle with full stops, which sometimes appear to have intruded themselves between the subject and predicate of a sentence. A relative pronoun is as scarce as it is in some of Mr. Browning's pages. Almost every sentence is constructed on the simplest possible model, so that reading him aloud would be something like cracking a whip or firing off a succession of pistol-shots. Take, for example, the opening sentences of the story:—"It was night in the valley. And yet not that huge grimy monster which makes heaven look like a coal-mine. But a soft summer night. A summer night seems the feminine, a winter night the masculine, of night." In this specimen it may be remarked that the peculiarity depends chiefly upon eccentricities of punctuation. The first two full stops are quite superfluous; but, as a rule, it enters more deeply into the structure of the sentences. Here is another example of a conglomeration of sentences, stuck together rather than combined:—

What could be more incongruous than this love? The love of George Bancroft for Euridice Gray. They were the very antipodes of one another. To name the boy and to name the woman was an antithesis. It was like naming night and day. The lad seemed to be the dawn, the woman a dreary sunset.

And so on; or, to take a final instance, here is a specimen of the author's style, and of his vein of reflection:—

It is often thus. Our reality lies like a stormy ocean about a peaceful, happy little island of dreams. Misery always seems more real than happiness. There is beneficence in the fact that even our waking hours have dreams. But we may waken from these. What a cold cheerless dawn that is in most cases. Horrible reentry of grim truth.

Perhaps it is scarcely worth while to attempt an analysis of the style of an inexperienced writer, whose book is not in the least likely to create an overpowering sensation in the world. We have said thus much because Mr. Marshall appears to us to have real talent, and it is a pity that he should fall into so provoking a mannerism. We should recommend him to try the experiment of re-writing some part of his book with only an average allowance of full stops. He would find the change as great as that between the old-fashioned paving-stones and the new asphalt. Instead of moving with a bump and a jerk, his readers would glide peacefully along, and would be much more ready to do him justice. The secret of this erroneous method is simply the effect of constant straining after emphasis. Mr. Marshall cannot be content unless he says something striking in every line, and therefore he kneads down each sentence, as it were, into a pellet, and fills it into our faces. Now it is a fault, instead of a merit, to write in a series of epigrams; and, amongst other reasons, because a good many of them are pretty sure to be bad ones. Mr. Marshall wants to tell us that a woman is looking old. He says that "time had made the tawse of the face past, for the face is like a verb." The likeness of the face to a verb consists in its expressing anticipations of the future in youth, and thoughts of the past in old age. Directly afterwards he tells us, of the same lady, that "her mouth had even yet those hinges of smiles—dimples—about it." The old poets of the "metaphysical school" could scarcely have indulged in more abstruse conceits than comparing the face to a verb, and calling a dimple the hinge of a smile. The last metaphor is, to our minds, decidedly unpleasant and very inaccurate, besides that the quaintness gives us a kind of jar in reading what ought to be a saddening description of worn-out beauty. Sometimes he is happier in his oddities. The following comparison strikes us as good, and the grotesqueness is not out of place:—"He took a few quiet steps from the path, and stood behind the stem of a huge oak tree that seemed to have been frozen in a fit, so straggling and so gnarled were its old branches."

It is in the general tendency of his opinions that Mr. Marshall seems to take most decidedly after his master. Like Mr. Carlyle, he has a strong sense of the generally unsatisfactory condition of the times in which we live; and occasionally he slides into an aphorism whose origin is easily traceable. "Men," he says, "wish they possessed the past; then, they imagine, they could do anything. Men are, for the most part, fools." There is a good deal of truth in the observation, but we all know whences it comes. Sometimes he preaches to us a bit of familiar doctrine. He tells us that any grand effort of nature is a miracle:—

We pass our days amidst miracles, and never raise our eyebrows. We live; that is a miracle to begin with. But we take all the miracles as if they were very simple things; we arrange them under heads and call this science. Science takes for data the existence of a million miracles, and then proves the non-existence of miracles. This is a clever trick; it deceives many.

The man of science would of course reply that he uses the word miracle in an entirely different sense from Mr. Marshall. We merely give the passage as a specimen of Mr. Marshall in the didactic moods which are so common with him as very materially to interrupt the progress of his story. He goes in with youthful ardour for expressing his intense contempt for the world in general, and especially for people who fancy that they are the wise men of the world, from the heights of his superior philosophy. He points out in a dozen epigrams, inserted between the incidents of a love story, the utter futility of British notions of law, of education, or of social reform. Mr. Charles Reade himself could hardly be more dogmatic; and the satire, if not unusually stinging, is occasionally a very fair sample of the article. He is virtuously indignant that men should become barristers in virtue of having eaten seventy-two dinners, or, if members of the University, fifty-six. "There is probably," he remarks ironically, "a reason for this"; and he goes on to show how a barrister thrives on the abundance of crime, or, as he puts it, "finds himself in a sort of partnership with the devil, who touts for him"; how the young barristers do not find enough employment in spite of this effective ally, and talk about their recent rubbers whilst criminals are being sentenced to penal servitude. This, we believe, is what is called "scathing satire"; we have no great love for it as a rule, but we think that, on the whole, that which Mr. Marshall supplies is rather better than the average quality, and liable only to one objection. It is irrelevant to the story, and when Mr. Marshall ought to be thinking of interesting us in his characters, he is trying to show us what a sharp insight he has into the absurdities of modern society, and how clearly he sees that eating dinners is not a rational mode of preparing oneself for a learned profession.

The remark reminds us that it is time to say a few words about the story in question. It is rather a singular production, and we have a suspicion that it has suffered from being regarded by its author as a thread from which epigrams may be hung, rather than as a source of interest in itself. The main plot is as follows. Mr. John Venner, heir to a large property, seduces a poor girl called Dicy Gray, and afterwards marries a rich girl, Linette Leyn. Both the women, in spite of the fault of the first, are approximately angels. Seth Marne, a virtuous young man, is intensely indignant at the seduction, and swears that he will be revenged. Here are all the elements of an exciting set of adventures. There is a cunning and spiteful shepherd, one Felix Grote, who goes creeping about behind hedges and gets hold of various secrets, by which he expects to extort money from Mr. Venner, or to deprive him of his rich wife and his property. In one way or another we expect the avenger of injured innocence to trip up Mr. Venner's heels and to set everything to rights. But, to our amazement, after every preparation has been made for awakening our interest in Seth Marne's virtuous indignation and Felix Grote's carefully planned treachery, everything breaks down. Seth Marne goes mad and wanders promiscuously about the country, sometimes knocking down unoffending people under the impression that they are conspiring against him, and sometimes living on charity and asking after his lost love. Poor Dicy Gray does not go mad; but she also wanders about the country in an aimless fashion, trying to pick up a living without a previous good character, and naturally getting into trouble. The wicked plotter, Felix Grote, is bought off at a handsome price by the rich villain, John Venner, and sent off to America. John Venner gets his rich wife and his estate, though the latter appears to be in danger of disappearing at the end of the novel; and in the last page or two the mad avenger of virtue meets injured innocence on the banks of a river in flood, and they both tumble into it and are drowned, after the precedent of Tom and Maggie Tulliver. There is no particular moral conveyed by the story, unless it be meant to signify that villainy generally succeeds in this world; and we should be the last to quarrel with this want of a moral. But the premature madness of the chief actor gives a kind of hopelessly vague and unintelligible character to the whole proceeding which rather destroys our interest in the book. If Mr. Marshall would be a little less anxious to express his contempt for the world, if he would condescend to construct his plot more carefully, and to write in a simple and steady-going style, he has enough talent to write a very interesting book; but he should make an effort to shake off some of his mannerism whilst there is yet time, and should remember that there is a great difference, as Mr. Carlyle would tell him, between spasmodic and vigorous writing.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE Bibliothèque universelle de Genève has long occupied a distinguished place among periodicals written in the French language. Founded seventy-six years ago*, it soon gathered around it the élite of Swiss men of letters, and obtained, by the wholesome style of its criticisms and the originality of its articles, a reputation which was equalled afterwards only by the Revue des Deux Mondes. The list of the contributors to the Bibliothèque universelle comprises the names of MM. de la Rive, Töpffer, Marc Dabrit, Neville, Charles Secrétan, and others, and it is at present the senior of all monthly periodicals. Whilst the Revue de Paris, the Revue Indépendante, the Revue Moderne, the Revue Française, have flourished for a short time and then disappeared, our Swiss journal has perseveringly held its ground, and takes a new lease of life with the present year. Transferred from Geneva to Lausanne, and having annexed the Revue Suisse, it combines the serious character of a review, strictly so-called, with the lighter style of a popular magazine. Thus the first three numbers for 1872, which we have just received, contain a very pretty tale by Madlle. Berthier, entitled "Mon Étoile," an interesting article by M. Paul Stapfer on Béranger's literary correspondence, and a valuable sketch in which M. Lambert compares the progress of democracy in France with the development of centralization on the other side of the Rhine. A review of new books, and a budget of causes from Paris, Italy, and Germany complete each number.

In 1828 three illustrious Professors thoroughly revolutionized the Sorbonne by their lectures, and gave to the higher branches of instruction an impetus the effects of which are still observable. The brilliancy of M. Villemain, M. Cousin's impassioned eloquence, and the dignified style so characteristic of M. Guizot's teaching, have never been surpassed since; but each of these accomplished masters formed disciples who are now carrying on the work with much deserved success. M. Nourrisson is one of these; he belongs to M. Cousin's group, and we have often already in these pages had an opportunity of noticing his contributions to the history of philosophy. Alexander Aphrodisiensis is the subject of his present sketch†, and M. Nourrisson may claim the twofold merit of drawing the attention of the public to a metaphysician who, though one of the most distinguished of Aristotle's commentators, is not well known, and also of discussing a propos of him a question which is just now more than ever interesting. The problem of man's free will comes before us with unusual force in times when political society seems to be thrown off its hinges, and it is rather curious that the two writers who in times past have devoted their thoughts to the works of Alexander Aphrodisiensis were Grotius and Daunou. The quarrels between the Arminians and the Gomarists had induced the former to seek in antiquity arguments against the fatalist doctrines which a certain school of theology openly professed; and two centuries later the apparent triumph of the baneful theory of accomplished facts, illustrated by the course of the Revolution and the startling progress of Napoleon I., led Daunou to meditate on the same subject. It is no matter of wonder that M. Nourrisson should from similar motives have been led to follow in a like direction. His able essay is not only a complete examination of the problem in question, but also an interesting history of the disputes which, during the middle ages and the Renaissance period, divided the followers of Aristotle according as they adopted the views of Averroes or of Alexander Aphrodisiensis. M. Nourrisson has added to his work a French translation of Alexander's treatise on Fate.

M. Berger's lectures on the history of Latin eloquence‡ form an agreeable instalment of a series which comprises M. Patin's studies on the Greek tragic poets, his history of Latin poetry, and M. Charpentier's sketches of the Latin writers of the Imperial period. The word "eloquence" is a very elastic one; in the present instance, it is made to embrace a variety of topics only remotely connected with oratory. Thus M. Berger gives his readers an account of Roman law, and of the origin of Roman history; he devotes several chapters to the influence of Greek culture upon the civilization of Rome, and he examines the state of society as it appears in the Satires of Lucilius. The special merit of M. Berger seems to have been, besides his deep knowledge of Latin literature, a considerable talent in bringing history, biography, philosophy, and even natural science to bear upon the subject of his more immediate studies. He was essentially thorough and painstaking; nor can we wonder at the popularity which he managed to preserve during the fifteen years of his teaching at the Sorbonne. The present lectures on the history of Latin eloquence, published by M. Victor Cucheval from the réductions of the Professor's pupils, are accompanied by an introduction; the notes placed at the end of each volume give a number of illustrative texts taken from books of comparatively difficult access.

In addition to his great work, "Colbert's Despatches and State Papers," the late M. P. Clément composed several interesting monographs on illustrious personages connected with the Court of Versailles during the reign of Louis XIV.; thus the two volumes which he devoted to Madame de Montespan, and to her gifted and accomplished sister, the Abbess of Fontevault, will hold a distinguished position next to M. Cousin's famous sketches of Mesdames de Chevreuse, de Hautefort, and de Longueville. In the pages of the present duodecimo¶ we are brought into contact with a totally different set of characters—the financiers of the eighteenth century. The state of the French Exchequer at the time of the Regency and under the government of Louis XV. was so deplorable that all sorts of means were devised in order to replenish it. M. de Silhouette's system of taxation applied with the utmost rigour, and his attempt to reduce the King's personal expenses, were not likely to make him popular either amongst the bourgeoisie or at Versailles, and after a tenure of office of eight months he was obliged to resign the post of contrôleur des finances. This is almost all that the majority of readers know about a man whose name has been in a manner immortalized in the figures cut out of black paper which still bear the name of silhouette. M. Clément's interesting essay throws considerable light upon the state of French finances during the eighteenth century; it is followed by an equally good sketch of the life of Étienne Michel Boret, a fermier général whose talents were matched only by his extravagance. M. Alfred Lemoine, the faithful coadjutor of M. P. Clément in his work on Colbert, has contributed to the volume before us a chapter on the last representatives of the financiers immediately before the meeting of the States General in 1789. Notes, appendices of State documents and anecdotes borrowed from contemporary sources add much value to these portraits.

M. Beq de Fouquières has undertaken* to plead the cause of the celebrated Aspasia at the bar of the nineteenth century, and to appeal against the judgment which has hitherto classed her amongst the well-known representatives of the classical démimonde. The chief evidence on which critics and historians have founded their opinions about Aspasia is that which is furnished by Aristophanes and the other comic poets—evidence which is very often far from trustworthy, being the result of party spirit and of political animosity. But, says M. de Fouquières, in endeavouring to form an estimate of the character and influence of women in the days of the Athenian democracy, we should place ourselves at the point of view of that society itself, and not merely consider the moral usages of our own times. If Aspasia was looked upon as a courtesan, it is simply, he contends, because, according to the Athenian law, no foreigner could marry a citizen of Athens, and therefore the union of Aspasia with Pericles, however legitimate it might be intrinsically, was legally only a case of concubinage. Such, in a few words, is the argument of M. Fouquières, which he maintains with much ability. The secret of Aspasia's undoubted power was, he urges, that she had a mind of superior elevation capable of grasping the highest problems of political and ethical science, and perfectly aware of the defects which even in the golden age of Pericles threatened to undermine Hellenic civilization. Whilst discussing the leading events of the life of Aspasia, M. Beq de Fouquières has necessarily touched upon questions of a purely literary character, such as the authenticity of the Menexenus, Xenophon's Memorabilia, &c. Whatever we may think of the soundness of M. de Fouquières's conclusions, it is impossible to deny the scholarship which he has displayed in his interesting monograph.

The duty of compulsory education is energetically maintained by M. Charles Robert in a pamphlet† in which a mass of facts chronologically arranged serves to show the progress which has been continually going on in that direction during the last fifty years, and to prove that the very existence of society is closely connected with educational reform. Fas est et ab hoste doceri: M. Robert points to Germany as the best proof of the argument he endeavours to establish. It was almost the day after the battles of Jena and Auerstadt that Fichte urged the necessity of regenerating Germany through the application of Pestalozzi's pedagogic doctrines, combined with the principle of compulsory education. The recent disasters which France has experienced are, says our author, a further confirmation of the same truth, and it behoves all true patriots to bring public opinion to bear upon the French Government in order that the matter may be settled at once and for ever. After having given us in a series of interesting chapters the history of the whole subject from the year 1853 to the present time, M. Robert prints a projet de loi on elementary education, drawn up by him in 1865 from the conclusions of the Report which M. Duruy, the Minister of Public Instruction, had submitted to the Emperor.

M. Michel Bréal‡, like M. Robert, asks his fellow-countrymen to break through their favourite habit of considering themselves the first nation in Europe; let them look at Germany, and read the causes of Prussia's success in the superiority of the system of education which prevails on the other bank of the Rhine. M. Bréal examines in detail the working of the French elementary schools, the lycées and the facultés; he discusses the teaching, the books, the administration, the discipline; and he has no difficulty in proving that the whole edifice of the University requires immediate reconstruction from top to bottom. The starting point of his work deserves attention, because it has usually been neglected by careless observers; it is that, in spite of appearances, France is the country in Europe the most afraid of true reforms, the most enervated by obsolete traditions. The Revolution may have extended the advantages of education over a wider surface, but the system has remained very much the same as it was in the days of Bossuet and Rollin. It is further to be observed that in France, unfortunately, all questions are uniformly treated in a too absolute and sweeping manner. For example, if the subject of classical studies happens to be mooted, it seldom occurs to the disputants that reforms judiciously introduced might make the teaching of Latin and Greek as useful as it is now useless. Absolute destruction is the only alternative which is thought to meet the exigencies of the case, and the cry Detenda Carthago is immediately raised. This serious mistake applies, M. Bréal observes, to every branch of education in France without exception. The true policy of the Government is, he contends, to employ the materials which it has at hand, to begin at once with the reform of the higher instruction, and not persist in retaining an antiquated system which was already considered defective a century ago.

M. Reynald begins his preface* by showing that, although the history of the French Revolution has often been studied, it must nevertheless for a long time yet be a subject of eager curiosity and attentive investigation. At the present moment, when questions connected with the very existence of society are once more under discussion, we naturally turn back to the short period during which the Constituent Assembly was at work attempting to establish a really free government, and to construct the edifice of modern France upon a solid basis. With the labours of that Assembly Mirabeau is closely identified, and therefore it is that M. Reynald has taken him as the subject of his new work. A short introduction on political eloquence, in which the names of Pitt, Fox, Burke, and Royer-Collard serve as terms of comparison, opens the volume; next comes an account of the Mirabeaus during the epoch which preceded the Revolution, and a sketch of those petty squabbles and family differences which contributed so much to injure the reputation of the great statesman. Mirabeau's political career occupies Books II.-IV. of the volume; it is related, of course, from a favourable point of view, but M. Reynald is generally an impartial historian.

The subject which M. Havet has discussed in his learned work† is one of the highest interest; unfortunately, however, he has thought fit to mix up with it a question of a totally different kind, and he has consequently produced two volumes which we have no hesitation in pronouncing fundamentally erroneous and illogical. M. Havet, like most writers of his school (the school of scientific doism), is very loud on the necessity of cultivating amongst the French people a strong sense of duty, respect for the law, habits of industry and of temperance; but the body of his work is an elaborate attempt to upset the very foundations upon which any society, even a Republican one, can alone exist. We have already more than once said that, in studying the origin of Christianity, the historian must take into account all the circumstances amidst which Christianity manifested itself, must consider how far it was modified by Greek and Latin civilization, by Judaism, &c.; but such questions do not affect in the least the divine origin of the religion, and the error into which M. Havet falls is that of confounding two orders of ideas which are totally distinct from each other. His remarks on Plato, Cicero, Lucian, and Aristotle, in fact on the whole of classical antiquity, show deep study, and an intimate acquaintance with the authors he passes in review, but the conclusions he draws from these remarks are, in our opinion, entirely unsound.

Two treatises of philosophy have lately reached us; one is a short book on logic, the other is a large volume in which M. Delaperche endeavours to discuss from a fresh point of view all the great questions of ontology. M. Delaperche's work‡ is, strictly speaking, an original production; he quotes from no writer, he appeals to no anterior system, and remains constantly and exclusively in communion with his own thoughts. The algebraical notation which he uses gives his volume a severe character, and must necessarily limit the circle of his readers; but the Essai de Philosophie analytique nevertheless deserves attention, and we can recommend its perusal to persons who wish to discuss once more the often discussed subjects—What is matter? What is time? What is space? What is the world in its principle and its manifestations?

The treatise on logic§ for which we are indebted to Dr. Hartzen is, as the author states in his preface, rather a sketch than a complete work; it is, however, a valuable contribution to that particular study, because Dr. Hartzen strikes out a new path, and presents to us observations which we are not accustomed to find in the usual manuals. Thus he does not discuss as two separate subjects inductive logic and what he calls logique rationnelle; and, considering science not as an end, but as the means towards a certain end, he defines it as "an ensemble of ideas which enables man to modify the world, and to realize a determined ideal given to us by the ensemble of our inclinations or our desires." Besides insisting upon the relations existing between logic on the one side, and metaphysics, psychology, noëtics, and dialectics on the other, Dr. Hartzen has appended to his volume an interesting treatise on the principles of aesthetics.

The twenty-sixth livraison of M. Littré's Dictionary|| gives us an opportunity of remarking that no work of the same importance has ever been conducted through the press with a greater amount of care, each sheet undergoing no less than seventy-two different revisions before it is printed off; this we know to be a fact. It would nevertheless be little short of a miracle if a typographical blunder did not sometimes occur amongst so formidable an array of quotations; and we have actually discovered one. In the paragraph headed semblablement M. Littré introduces three well-known lines from Villon's Ballade des Dames du temps jadis:—

GERMANY.

THE German EMPEROR either had, or was determined to have, a very pleasant state of things to describe to his Parliament on opening the Session last Monday. The measures he had to recommend were of the most unexciting and harmless kind. Something is to be done towards putting that great subject of German interest, the consumption of beer, on a sounder footing, and a reform is to be made in the code of military criminal law. The revenue is so flourishing that, although the expenditure is to be increased, no new taxes need be imposed. Portugal has bound herself to Germany by a new commercial treaty, and France has been obliging enough to ratify a Postal Convention as rapidly as was wished. Proper measures will be taken to determine how the great windfall of the French indemnity is to be distributed, and an elaborate system of statistical records will show under every requisite head the wants, the progress, and the possessions of the Fatherland. In the ceded provinces everything was represented by the EMPEROR as going on perfectly well. The University of Strasburg is to kindle the lamp of learning in districts hitherto lying in French darkness, and a perfect system of German administration has been bestowed as the greatest of boons on a delighted population. Moreover, the unity and strength of Germany is not only most satisfactory to Germans, but is equally so to the rest of the world, who see in it the surest guarantee of peace. Of disagreeable topics not a word was said. The fight against the Ultramontanes, the signs of religious strife, the prosecutions of Socialists, the menacing attitude of France, were all discreetly ignored. An EMPEROR and a Government are not bound to be always dwelling on the dark side of the national picture, and on certain occasions to create the conviction of prosperity is to make a nation prosperous. The Germans have taken a great leap forwards since the war in every respect. They are getting more energetic, richer, more ambitious. They have begun to feel an unbounded faith in their country which has done so much and won so much in so short a time. New enterprises are started every day. Money long hoarded, or only employed timidly and sparingly for local objects, is being freely produced and devoted to the commencement of undertakings destined to promote the general prosperity of the country. Berlin cannot contain the thousands who long to come and settle in that chief centre of German power and life. It is true that Germans are far too shrewd to bury themselves in a fool's paradise. They know that there are thorns on most rose-trees, and although they admire and gather freely the pretty flowers spread before them, they are not likely to be lulled into a false security. They are not blind to the fact that France would dearly enjoy to be revenged, or to the fact that the guiding spirits of Catholicism are eager to bow down their heads in the dust. But they trust in themselves and in their Government. They beat France a short time ago, and think they could, if necessary, do it again. They confide in the foresight and resolution of the CHANCELLOR, and believe that he knows exactly what France can do and would like to do, and that the moment he plants danger he will take without delay and without scruple every possible precaution. They cannot persuade themselves that the strength of the German laity is inferior to the strength of priests and of priestly coteries, and they have just enjoyed the spectacle of Prince BISMARCK's triumph over his clerical enemies. They therefore are setting themselves, without much anxiety for the future, to the supreme task of getting rich in a wider and quicker and bolder manner than they ever dreamt of before the war. The EMPEROR's speech was evidently designed to foster the spirit of national confidence, and to use the present stage of national hope and excitement to make the whole country go forward in every path of material improvement. If Germany is not really in any danger which wise men do not see their way to surmounting, there is certainly much good sense in this profiting by good fortune, and in using advantageously a golden opportunity which, if neglected, might never return.

But the real question must be whether Germany is free from the necessity of apprehending serious danger; for the prosperity which is created by sudden confidence may easily be turned into adversity if this confidence is mistaken. As to the religious difficulty, there does not as yet seem to be any serious reason for apprehension. Prince BISMARCK has judged, and probably has judged wisely, that the plottings and intrigues which bewilder and disturb a nation are best confronted with a bold face. If the religious movement were one springing from a deep change in the mental habits of men and in popular ideas, it is impossible to say to what new revolutions of social and individual life, and even of political existence, it might give rise. But the religious movement with which Germany is concerned is mainly a political movement, and it is mainly a political movement connected with the revenge of France. Its present effects are not unfavourable to Germany; for the tendency of France to link herself with the Ultramontanes, even if it exists as strongly as is represented, which is rather doubtful, keeps Italy firmly on the side of Germany; and the union of Germany has been rather cemented than shaken by the popular belief, which has gained ground under the auspices of the CHANCELLOR, that the priests and their friends are trying to pull Germany to pieces. Anything may of course happen in the future; but so far as can now be seen, Germany has not any pressing need to fear that France will start with the advantage of a strong alliance if she renews the war. Nor is there any great reason to fear lest France should, with the aid of her clerical friends, sap German unity, sow discord between one German State and another, and so paralyse the strength of the nation. A short time ago it seemed as if France might try to wait patiently for events, and win support here and there until she got some one to help her if she went to war. It also seemed as if this patience might be exercised till some steps towards the disintegration of Germany by ecclesiastical influence had been successfully accomplished. These dangers do not seem so pressing as they did. The danger that now threatens Germany is that France, unaided, and trusting only to the secular arm, may renew the war. A year ago the French Government was buying up, arming, and clothing with great difficulty small bodies of troops on whom little reliance could be placed, in order to take Paris out of the hands of rebels. Now France is spending nearly thirty millions sterling for this year's military outlay; she has got almost as many men moderately fit to fight as the EMPEROR NAPOLEON had when he declared war; she is fast accumulating artillery and rifles, and is straining every nerve to create and discipline a vast reserve force. M. THIERS openly announces that this enormous military preparation is absolutely necessary. Without it the French nation could not be comfortable, nor could it respect itself, or hope that any one would respect it. This is a frankness worthy of Prince BISMARCK himself. He said plainly enough that he meant to cripple France so that she should not think of war for a generation. M. THIERS replies with equal plainness that he may have wished to do this, but that he has not done it. France will very soon be a great military Power, and the announcement is said to have caused much anxiety and irritation at Berlin. It is not to be supposed that the French Government will give Germany any ground for open quarrel. M. THIERS is stated to be almost ready with his plan for paying off the whole indemnity at once, and freeing French soil from the invader. The Germans will get their money, and will then be bound to go away. When they are gone France will set to work to drill and arm itself, and to protect its Eastern frontiers. Belfort will be French again, and strong positions will be chosen to arrest the progress of an invading German army. This is the programme of M. THIERS. He never speaks of immediate war, or of war at all. He merely says that he will pay the Germans to go away, and when they are gone away he will try whether he cannot devise fortifications which would make it difficult for them to come back again; and he will get together an army of a million and a quarter of soldiers, and he will arm them and train them and officer them well, and then—why then he or his successor will have the pleasure of being able to talk as becomes the representative of a first-rate military Power.

But it is by no means easy to estimate how far the danger of a war of revenge on the part of France is a serious one for Germany. What would be the probable issue of such a war is a matter beyond all present range of speculation, but the point of interest is to consider whether the French are likely, in the immediate future, to embark on a war of revenge. In the first place it may be observed that, however much France may wish to embark on such a war, the time for it cannot be very near. No doubt M. THIERS may in twelve months have a very respectable army, and it is just possible, although it is not very likely, that he will in twelve months have got the Germans out of France. To pay off the Germans, and to put the finances of France straight, he will want at least one hundred and fifty millions sterling. France is rich and full of resources, and anxious to be honest, and has good credit, but a hundred and fifty millions sterling is a very large sum. It cannot be borrowed without a great deal of preparation and trouble, and it must necessarily be paid in instalments extending over a considerable period. It would be a wonderful, though perhaps not an impossible financial feat for the French Government to pay a hundred and twenty millions in a year hence to Germany, and also to have got, or to have made sure of getting, enough to fill up the enormous deficit in the French Treasury. At the end of a year the Government would have to begin its serious preparations for war with Germany by fortifying itself on its Eastern frontier. M. THIERS has always dwelt strongly on the necessity of this, and has sedulously discouraged the notion that France could venture to attack Germany while it lay perfectly open to a counter attack. He has repeatedly spoken of the absolute necessity of making new fortifications at Paris, and of fortifying the frontier. He will also have to organize an army of reserve, and this costs much time and patience. Lastly, he will have to get a little money to go to war with. It has certainly been said that no nation is ever stopped from making a war on which it is bent by want of money, and this is true if a nation does not think of how it is to pay its way if it fails, or feels confident that it will pay its way in any case. But France will be obliged to think of paying its way; for it is a nation too advanced, too rich, too highly complex, not to regard national bankruptcy with dismay, and it cannot feel confident of paying its way very easily in case of a second disastrous war. France, in short, cannot help having much time and occasion to reflect before she really commits herself to the war of revenge which it is so easy to talk of. No sensible Frenchman can fail to see that it will be difficult to make much out of a war of revenge, even if it is undertaken. Germany is taking every possible precaution; Prince BISMARCK has kindly undertaken to work the Luxemburg Railway, so as to save every one else the trouble of doing so; the German reserves are being increased; even the impregnable fortifications of Metz are being improved, so as to come up to the German standard of perfection. Germany will be made richer by all the money France pays her, by the stimulus given to industry and adventure, and by the influence of a liberal commercial policy; while France, during the interval of preparation, will be feeling the pressure of new and very heavy taxation, and will be cramped by a policy of Protection. The more it is looked into, the more it will be seen by the French that a war of revenge is not a thing to be quickly or lightly taken up; and though this does not at all show that the French will not run the risk, it shows that they cannot act at once; and if time is gained, the wish for a war with Germany may possibly die away.

AMERICA.

THE answer of the Government to Mr. DISRAELI's question of last night will have probably supplied the latest information on the state of the Alabama controversy. One member of the House of Representatives has had the courage to propose a Resolution recommending the abandonment of the indirect claims, and disapproving the doctrines of international law which are propounded in the Case. Mr. PETERS might have quoted in support of his motion the unanimous vote by which, in the Thirty-ninth Congress, the House of Representatives affirmed the expediency of largely extending the liberties of neutrals at the expense of belligerents. The Resolution was, as might have been expected, formally referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and there can be no doubt that both Houses of Congress will concur with the Government in waiting for the presentation at Geneva of the English counter Case. No censure could be too strong for any blunder or ambiguity which should give the Geneva Tribunal an opportunity of deciding directly or indirectly on the admissibility of the disputed claims. In ordinary cases Englishmen are accustomed to trust their Government to protect the national honour and safety, and in this instance they have no choice. Experience has shown the readiness of an astute adversary to profit by excess of confidence; and up to the present time the American Government adheres to its extreme pretensions, with the support of a popular opinion which is directly opposed to the expressed conviction of the most intelligent politicians. The audacious assertion of a violent Republican partisan residing in England, that his countrymen generally believed that the Treaty covered the indirect claims, has been repeatedly and indignantly contradicted in America; though it was scarcely necessary to expose the inaccuracy of a writer who had at the same time attributed to the English Commissioners a complicity with the supposed interpretation of the Treaty which would on their part have been utterly fraudulent. Evidence has been unexpectedly furnished that the understanding of the American Government itself agreed on the most important point with the explanations given to the House of Lords by Lord GRANVILLE and Lord RUSSELL. The Nation has published the "Confidential Memorandum of Instructions" addressed by the Government of the United States to the counsel who were employed to draw the Case. In addition to the claims of individuals, estimated at 2,600,000*l.*, the framers of the Case are directed to claim reimbursement of the outlay on the pursuit and capture of the Confederate cruisers, and also reimbursement of "the outlay caused by the increased premium and enhanced freights resulting from the special risk growing out of the operations of rebel cruisers fitted out in English ports." The monstrous demand of damages for the pretended prolongation of the war either had not then occurred to the mind of the SECRETARY OF STATE, or it had been deliberately rejected. It seems that the preparation of the Case was entrusted exclusively to Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS, who may possibly have consulted the wishes of his employers in the rude and offensive tone of his indictment or invective against England. When he inserted the claims for the expenses of a year and a half of war, he appears to have exceeded his instructions, though his expectation that any demand, however outrageous, would be ratified and adopted by the Government has been justified by the result. It has indeed often been pointed out that the claim has the appearance both of an afterthought and of an empty rhetorical flourish; but, if the Nation has been correctly informed, the Treaty has been rendered nugatory by the voluntary proceeding of an unauthorised agent. It is not altogether a cause for regret that the draughtsman over-reached himself, and baffled the design of his employers. The claim for the expenses of pursuing the cruisers is countenanced by the language of the Protocol of the 8th of May, though it is not included in the provisions of the Treaty. The demand for indirect damages on account of freight and premiums is wholly unwarranted either by the terms of the Treaty or by the less formal transactions of the Commission. According to one American estimate, the claim for increased freight and insurance would have amounted to 20,000,000*l.*; and yet it may be feared that, in its deferential anxiety for conciliation, the English Government might perhaps have committed the grievous error of submitting the claim to arbitration if it had not been accompanied by Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS's wild demand of 300,000,000*l.* for the prolongation of the war. The writer in the Nation asks the reasonable question, "Whether the people of the United States, if they had been consulted beforehand, would have consented to back up, even at the sword's point, everything which Mr. Bancroft Davis might say in a controversy with a foreign Power, and to abide absolutely by any statement which he was pleased to make?" Not having been consulted beforehand, the people of the United States through their Government answer the position in the affirmative. Omnis ratihabitio retrotrahitur, et mandata aqueparatur. Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS may or may not have understood the meaning of the Treaty. It is evident that he fully understood the temper of the American Government.

For the present the question of the maintenance or abandonment of the Treaty occupies a smaller share of attention in the United States than the prospects of the Presidential election. Englishmen have no reason to prefer one party or one candidate to another; but a contest which absorbs the interest of a powerful nation is always worth attentive notice. The State elections of the last two months have proved that the Republican ascendancy in the Northern States is maintained or confirmed; but it is suggested that the triumphs of the party are not a cause of unmixed satisfaction to the supporters of General GRANT, who will almost certainly be nominated by the regular Republican Convention at Philadelphia. If the Democrats had carried Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, the Republicans would have had a strong motive for suppressing or adjourning their internal dissensions. The considerable section of the party which distrusts General GRANT and disapproves of his policy may probably not be prepared to promote or to permit the defeat of his pretensions by a Democratic candidate. As it becomes more and more evident that a professed Democrat has no chance of success, the Republican malcontents may reasonably expect to carry a candidate of their own by the aid of Democratic votes which would otherwise be thrown away. Some of their leaders have determined to hold a separate Convention at Cincinnati, which will be attended by a powerful Republican minority. Those who, like Mr. SUMNER, are personally hostile to the PRESIDENT, will co-operate with the advocates of political purity and of Civil Service Reform. General GRANT has been unlucky in the connexion of several of his family and friends with corrupt transactions, and he has himself deliberately used his patronage for election purposes, without regard to the fitness or character of his nominees. One of the most disreputable election managers in the United States was for a long time maintained in the office of Collector of the Customs at New York, and in that capacity he perpetrated a scandalous job for the benefit of one of the PRESIDENT's military dependents. A brother of General BUTLER, also of doubtful reputation, has recently been appointed to a corresponding post at New Orleans, where a brother of General GRANT's has already made himself conspicuous by abuse of his official powers for political purposes. If the Cincinnati Convention can select a candidate agreeable to a numerous section of the Republican party, and not obnoxious to the Democrats, the hopes of General GRANT and his friends may possibly be disappointed.

There is no reason to suppose that the foreign policy of the Union will be affected either by the re-election of General GRANT or by the success of any fortunate rival; but it is barely possible that the Government may be less indisposed to retract a preposterous demand when its fate is beyond the immediate reach of hostile criticism or misrepresentation. Some scrupulous voters may perhaps be alienated from the cause of General GRANT by the perverse conduct of his Government in rendering useless the Treaty on which a part of its reputation rested; but a far more numerous section of the community would resent any acknowledgment of error which might be supposed to involve national humiliation. For the present the Alabama question exercises no influence on the progress of the contest. The division in the Republican ranks is mainly caused by the general reaction against the corrupt practices which had till lately been regarded as something between a permissible anomaly and a joke. The fall of TWEED and SWEENEY was the first result of the just and tardy indignation of the respectable citizens of New York; and it has not been forgotten that MURRAY, the late Collector, was a partner with TWEED in some of his speculations. The transfer of the direction of the Erie Railway from GOULD and his associates to a more creditable body is regarded as another discouragement of fraud, though it was effected by questionable and irregular means. It is interesting to learn that GOULD had discounted his own fall, by buying largely for the rise which was certain to ensue on the ejection of himself and his accomplices. The best proof of the strength of the agitation against corrupt practices has been the acceptance, by the PRESIDENT himself, of the Civil Service Reform Bill. It is not to be supposed that he would approve of a law which would interfere with the MURREYS and BUTLERs whom he favours, unless it were evident that the cause of purity was becoming temporarily, and perhaps permanently, popular.

The scandalous misgovernment of some of the Southern States is intimately connected with the political dishonesty of New York and Pennsylvania. The Northern adventurers who were known by the nicknames of "carpet-baggers" have in several States profited by the incapacity of the coloured voters to occupy the principal offices, and, as a natural consequence, to plunder the public property. Some of the Republican seceders, and especially Mr. SUMNER, are more violently hostile than the PRESIDENT to the white population of the Southern States; but many members of the Convention at Cincinnati will disapprove of embezzlement in South Carolina as strongly as if it were perpetrated in New York. The English spectator has no difficulty in observing the strictest neutrality in the contest. The PRESIDENT and his SECRETARY OF STATE are responsible for the insulting and iniquitous Alabama Case; and two of the bitterest opponents of General GRANT, Mr. SUMNER and Mr. GREELEY, are among the most implacable enemies of England. At present the chances incline to the candidate who will command the services of the regular Republican organization, including the professional politicians and managers of the party. The nomination at Philadelphia will probably be unanimous; and the seceders have not yet fixed on their candidate. It will be useless for the minority of the party to provoke a contest, unless they are assured of the united support of the Democratic voters. At the last election the Democrats formed two-fifths of the entire constituency, and perhaps they may still be equally numerous; while, in default of a policy or a candidate of their own, they may join in the attack of the Liberal Republicans on General GRANT; but the section of dissidents which follows Mr. GREELEY will perhaps be repelled by the free-trade doctrines which are likely to find acceptance at Cincinnati.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE BALLOT BILL.

THE Government is getting into a mess with the Ballot Bill, and the fault is entirely its own. Its supporters are as steady as ever. They are ready to vote, and do vote punctually and strongly whenever they are asked. The Opposition make scarcely any but fair criticisms. But the Ministers do not know and cannot conduct their own Bill. They have not thought over the details of a measure the very nature of which is such that its merits must lie in its details. They receive suggestions and discuss them as men would do who had never thought over the working of the Ballot Bill at all. They cannot see their way to rejecting the views of others or to defending their own, because they have really no opinion one way or the other. Two examples from the debates of this week will show the way in which they conduct their business, and how they waste the time of the House and the country, and nullify the strength of the Liberal party, by their extraordinary want of painstaking and decision. On Monday night Sir CHARLES DILKE proposed that the hours of voting should be from eight to eight. This was a point to which public attention has been repeatedly directed, and as to which it might have been expected that the Government would have come to a distinct conclusion by which they were prepared to abide; but it soon appeared that they were in a very vague and hazy state of mind on the whole subject. Mr. FORSTER opposed Sir CHARLES DILKE's proposal on the ground that to vote after four o'clock would be to vote when it was dark, and that to vote in the dark would encourage personation and popular tumult. The Ballot was, he said, an experiment, and no one could say exactly how it would work, and it would be very unwise to complicate the first trial of its provisions by extending the hours so as to admit new causes of doubt and disturbance. There was much to be said for and against this view, but at any rate it was a view which the Government might reasonably take, and which, if adhered to, would have closed its discussion. The House only wished to support the Government in any reasonable view, and to get on with business. A proposal to extend the hour of polling in boroughs to five o'clock was rejected, although, as five is the hour in counties, this seemed a not unreasonable proposal, except that it would not have been of the slightest benefit to the workman. Another proposal to make six the hour of closing was as speedily rejected, and the Government would not have had any difficulty whatever in keeping the hours as they are now, only that most unfortunately Mr. WHITBREAD suggested that it was not always dark at four, and that the polling might be allowed to go on to sunset. This took the fancy of Mr. FORSTER, and he suddenly said that he was all for sunset fixing the limit. But it was pointed out that the sun sets at very different hours on the same day in different parts of the United Kingdom, and that if the object of keeping the poll open as long as possible was to let the working people vote after their hours of work are over, the time of the year when an election was held would decide whether workmen should be able to vote or not. A man who could vote in summer could not vote in winter. This objection seems to us fatal to the proposal. The prerogative of dissolution, which is one of the most valuable the Crown retains, would be seriously crippled if a popular cry were raised and listened to, as it would almost certainly be listened to, that elections when the days are short are unfair to the poor. Mr. FORSTER was puzzled, and he finally ended by saying that he could not make up his mind at all. He did not know whether sunset ought to be the limit, and if it was to be the limit, he did not know how to frame the clause making it the limit. All he could do was to ask the House to go on with something else, and then he promised to think the matter over, and make up his mind if he could.

On Thursday night Mr. LEATHAM moved an amendment to the third clause, making it penal on the part of the voter to display his voting-paper in such a manner as to show to any person the name of any candidate for whom he has or has not voted; and he supported his proposal on the ground that it was necessary to prevent papers being shown, or else the electioneering agent might know how the voter had voted, and thus bribery would be as rampant as ever. Mr. FORSTER said that the provision had been "inadvertently omitted" in the Bill, and immediately accepted the amendment. But he was not to be let off so easily as he may have hoped. The punishment which was to be attached to wilfully showing the paper was two years' imprisonment. The objection was at once raised that this was a very severe punishment, and that, as a new criminal offence was being created, the words creating it should be perfectly clear. The SOLICITOR-GENERAL on the spot offered words which he said would remove all doubt; but an ingenious critic at once showed that they made an offence of what might be a perfectly harmless act. This led to a further consideration of the amount of penalty to be inflicted, and Mr. M'CULLAGH TORRENS suggested that the only penalty should be that the vote should be rejected. On this Mr. FORSTER, who a few moments previously had accepted without the slightest demur the proposal to make the penalty two years' imprisonment, now turned round and suggested that the penalty should be a pecuniary one. It had, he said, been a pecuniary one in the Bill of last year, and the clause of last year's Bill would have been, he added, repeated in this year's Bill had it not been for the inadvertent omission of which he had spoken. Mr. LEATHAM declined to accede to this, on the ground that a fine of ten shillings, the amount proposed, would not deter the voter at all, as it would be paid for him by those who were bribing him. The Government was evidently utterly at sea, and on Mr. LIDDELL moving that progress should be reported, "in order to enable the Government to consider what course they would really advise," Mr. GLADSTONE rose, and said that he was disposed to accept the motion to report progress. He thought that the objection to the penalty proposed by Mr. LEATHAM, and adopted in the first instance by Mr. FORSTER, was sound, but the Government could not at once make up its mind whether to recommend that a pecuniary fine should be inflicted, as Mr. FORSTER had on behalf of the Government proposed during the discussion, or that the punishment should be imprisonment, but limited to three months. This was the end of the discussion, and what had happened deserves careful notice. A provision essential, as the Government owned, to the working of the Bill had been inadvertently omitted. Then the Government blindly accepted an amendment, creating an offence and punishing it most severely. Then they had to acknowledge that the offence was not properly defined, and that the punishment was too severe. Then they proposed a punishment. They were immediately brought to confess that the punishment would be totally inadequate; and at last they had to throw themselves on the mercy of the House, to avow that they had not the slightest idea what they meant or what they could recommend, and begged to be allowed to think over the matter, and see what course they could, after reflection, advise to be pursued.

This is all very serious. The position of the Ministry is lowered, their command over the House is lost, personal respect for them dies away, when it is found that they cannot lead and guide because they themselves are wilfully blind. They have not set themselves to see. They do not know what the chief Bill of the Session has or has not got in it, and they have never considered the most obvious points of discussion. The subject of the penalties to be inflicted for transgressions against the Act was discussed at length last Session, and yet an essential clause which appeared in last year's Bill is now discovered to have been inadvertently omitted. They have not dwelt enough upon the consequences of their measure to be able to decide whether a transgressor shall pay ten shillings or be imprisoned for two years. They want time to consider points now, in the middle of the discussion of the Bill, which ought to have been carefully considered and finally settled before the Bill was brought on. There is something ridiculous and humiliating in the discovery that a Ministry, which for two years has had the subject of the Ballot before it has not even considered what should be the limit of the hours of polling, and how attempts to make bribery possible by getting the elector to show to the candidate's agent how he votes shall be frustrated. Why is this? It is simply because the Minister who has charge of the Bill has not given his mind to the subject, and because the PRIME MINISTER has not taken care to see that proper attention should be given to the construction of the details of the Bill. Mr. FORSTER is an able man, and perfectly competent to understand and work out the details of a Ballot Bill, if only he would take the trouble and give himself enough time. But he has his own department to attend to, and it is a department which requires of him incessant labour and attention. Consequently he takes up the Ballot Bill exactly as a fashionable leader at the Bar takes up his brief in one of the many cases in which he deigns to make his appearance for an hour or so. He skims through his instructions, and trusts to his junior, and to his own sharpness and audacity to pull him through. But the House of Commons cannot be led as a skilful barrister hopes to lead a Court or a jury. It insists on having every detail explained and defended. It wants to be under the guidance of a Minister who has evidently thought over every point, who has made up his mind, and who can explain and insist on the conclusions at which he has arrived. The Ministry had fair warning. They suffered last Session severely enough from exactly the same negligence they are displaying this Session, and then they turn round and complain of the House of Commons for wantonly obstructing the despatch of public business. Nothing can be more unfair, and the Opposition, which is not tongue-tied, quickly and pointedly shows that it is unfair. Unless Mr. GLADSTONE wishes to see his Ministry fall to pieces entirely through its own fault, it is time for him to set to work earnestly to repair the mischief that has already been done. He knows well enough how a Bill should be prepared and advocated. There was none of the uncertainty, the vacillation, and the negligence in the conduct of his two great Irish measures which are now killing the Ballot Bill. Of course a Prime Minister cannot be always doing the work of other people. He must leave much to his subordinates, and cannot be always prompting, advising, and controlling them. But there are occasions when he must come to the rescue and strive earnestly to restore the credit of his Government; and such a crisis has now come. A few more incidents such as those of Monday and Thursday, and the discredit of the Ministry would be irretrievable.

THE LAST OF THE COMMERCIAL TREATY.

THE Correspondence between the English and French Governments which has resulted in the denunciation of the Commercial Treaty represented throughout its course a wide difference of opinion which is on both sides suitably veiled in phrases of diplomatic courtesy. When the negotiations commenced in the course of last summer, it was uncertain whether the proposed modifications of the tariff would be sufficiently important to be resisted; and some irritation would probably have been caused by an absolute refusal on the part of the English Government to enter on the discussion. It was impossible to dispute the assertion that a great increase of revenue had been rendered indispensable to France by the German war and its consequences; and, although Customs duties imposed for fiscal purposes have often a protective effect, it was possible that taxes might be suggested which would cause comparatively little interference with commercial intercourse. Accordingly, Lord GRANVILLE, after proper reservations, expressed his willingness to consider any plan for the alteration of the Treaty which might be proposed; and on several occasions he requested that the project might be reduced into the form of a draught Treaty. When at a later period he raised objections of principle to the proposed increase of rates, the French Government not unnaturally professed surprise at a kind of objection which might have been raised in the first instance. It would perhaps have been more consistent to insist from the beginning on the alternative of maintaining or abandoning the Treaty of 1860; but it would have been difficult to avoid a collision at some point with the susceptibility of the French Government, and it was necessary to ascertain and consult the wishes of the trading community in England. It might have been expected that some of the manufacturers who have hitherto supplied the French market would prefer a limited advance in the rates to a possible abolition of their trade; but Lord GRANVILLE appears not to have been subjected to any domestic pressure; and the great preponderance of English opinion was opposed to any attempt to tamper with Free-trade. In one of his later despatches Lord LYONS hints to Lord GRANVILLE an opinion that the Treaty should, if possible, be renewed for political reasons. It is right that Ambassadors should favour the conclusion or maintenance of diplomatic contracts; and they are better qualified than statesmen at home to estimate the feeling of the countries in which they reside. On the other hand, the English Government was well advised in regulating its decision by economic considerations. An approval of new protective duties would probably have postponed the conversion of the French nation to doctrines which seem to Englishmen demonstrably true; and probably it might have disappointed the intelligent minority which even in France understands the expediency of leaving trade and industry to take their natural course. The bargain of 1860 was on Protectionist principles absurdly one-sided; and although the imposition of retaliatory duties is not likely to be contemplated, there is an advantage in recovering fiscal independence.

While the PRESIDENT of the Republic constantly avowed himself a Protectionist, his Foreign Minister repeatedly professed to be a Free-trader. M. DE RÉMUSAT plausibly contended that it was better that England should make partial concessions, which might perhaps be only temporary, than that the continuance of the commercial relations which have grown up in the last twelve years should be endangered or rendered impossible. M. THIERS interposed an additional difficulty in the way of modification by declaring his own preference for the abolition of the Treaty, both as injurious in itself and as inconsistent with legislative independence. He announced his readiness to waive his own objections for the political object of conciliating English feeling; but he regarded foreign competition in trade as intrinsically objectionable. On one occasion he betrayed the opinion that it would be prudent to adopt an exceptionally illiberal policy in dealing with England. Concessions could, in his opinion, be more safely made to countries which were more distant, or less advanced in industry and commerce. Lord GRANVILLE prudently declined to accept as a boon a compromise which was erroneously supposed to be onerous to France. Future misunderstandings would almost certainly have arisen from the establishment by treaty of a tariff which, in the judgment of the French Government itself, was both fiscally unprofitable and commercially oppressive. A moderate system of Protection is essentially untenable; for if the use of foreign commodities is pernicious, it ought to be wholly prohibited. It was not desirable to aggravate the anomaly which was for special reasons created by Mr. CORDEN's Treaty. In his speeches in the Assembly, and in some of his communications with Lord LYONS, the PRESIDENT entirely abandoned the ground on which he had originally founded his appeal to the liberal consideration of the English Government. The alleged destruction of the French mercantile marine and the supposed ruin of the industry of Roubaix would, even if both statements had not been entirely imaginary, have had no connexion with the deficiency of the revenue. It was not the business of the English Government to express an opinion on the fiscal policy of France; but it might be reasonably inferred from the PRESIDENT's Protectionist speeches that the augmentation of the revenue by increased Customs duties was neither his sole nor his primary object. There was, in truth, no occasion to meddle with the Treaty, if the Government and the Assembly found it necessary to increase the taxes on consumption. By the Ninth Article of the Treaty, either of the Contracting parties might at his own discretion levy or increase excise duties on the articles mentioned in the Treaty, and at the same time make a corresponding addition to the duties on imports. The increased rates to which M. THIERS proposed to subject threads and mixed fabrics would evidently have been more productive if they had been extended to domestic manufactures than when they were levied exclusively on imports; and it was also obvious that, if the modified Treaty gave additional protection to French industry, it would at the same time discourage the importations which were to provide an increased revenue. When the details of the proposed changes were, after long delay, communicated to the English Government, Lord GRANVILLE satisfied himself that their operation would be chiefly protective. He had never undertaken to abet a mistaken economic policy, though he had expressed the readiness of his Government to give, if possible, assistance to France in the removal of financial difficulties.

The tax on raw materials which has been so obstinately forced through the Assembly would in itself almost have rendered necessary the termination of the Treaty. Lord LYONS was again and again instructed to call the attention of the French Minister to a necessary consequence of the measure which appears not to have been fully understood by the PRESIDENT. The duty will operate as a protection to all raw materials which are produced in France, and to the fabrics in which they are used. M. DE RÉMUSAT affected to regard the objection as trifling and vexatious, probably because he perceived its force. M. THIERS has since discovered that all the States which have commercial treaties with France protest against the direct violation of existing compacts. The interest of England in the matter is limited to the time which will intervene before the termination of the Treaty. If the French proposals had been accepted, the scheme of taxing raw materials would still have been tried or attempted. The discriminating duties which are to be imposed on English shipping as soon as it ceases to be protected by the Treaty constitute a serious grievance. As France will for several years be prevented from imposing similar duties on the vessels of the chief maritime States, an unequal burden will be imposed on England without the possibility that, during the continuance of the treaties, even the shadow of a benefit can accrue to France. In a conversation with Lord LYONS M. THIERS stated that the most formidable competition with French shipping was that of Norway and some of the other minor States. To all complaints of the unaccommodating policy of the English Government it is a sufficient answer that France may at her pleasure adopt precisely the same tariff as that which would have been embodied in a modified treaty. Both countries will have recovered their freedom of action, and there is no reason why either should misuse the opportunity. If M. THIERS remains in power, there can be little doubt that he will to the utmost of his power discourage foreign trade. His obstinate love of all the abuses which prevailed in his prime will not be shaken by the most conclusive argument. He has up to this time gratified his feelings by labelling and ticketing and fining every passenger who crosses the French frontier, and though he seems to intend to mitigate the nuisance which he has created, it is not certain from the statements of Mr. GLADSTONE and Lord GRANVILLE that passports are to be definitively abolished. M. THIERS is also determined to indulge himself in the pleasure of preventing his countrymen from purchasing in the best and cheapest market the commodities which they require for consumption. His younger and more enlightened colleagues or successors may hereafter reverse or amend his policy without any assistance from England, nor indeed is it easy to understand the annoyance which seems to have been caused by the acquiescence of the English Government in the denunciation of the Treaty. A strong argument has been furnished in favour of strict conformity to sound economic doctrines. Mr. CORDEN's deviation was plausible and temporarily advantageous, but it is probable that his Commercial Treaty will be the last of its kind. If a shopkeeper and a customer find it convenient to make a bargain, it is quite unnecessary that they should bind themselves to buy and sell by executing a preliminary deed, instead of proceeding at once to business.

ENTAIL AND SETTLEMENT.

THE desultory character of the debate on Mr. W. FOWLER's motion, as well as the thinness of the attendance, showed that in the opinion of the House of Commons no practical object was to be attained by the discussion. The question is nevertheless important in itself, and the short debate gave an opportunity for the expression of a great variety of opinion. It is possible that the existence of limited estates in land may in some instances account for the badness of cottages, and more rarely for inferior cultivation; but the best cottages are to be found on great settled estates; and there is little doubt that land is more profitably, if not more productively, employed in England and Scotland than in any other part of the world. It matters little or nothing to a great farmer in Norfolk or the Lothians whether his landlord holds his property in fee or under settlement or entail. In less flourishing districts and on small estates a life tenant may frequently be unable to lay out capital in improvements; but it would be a great mistake to assume that owners in fee have, as a general rule, spare money to dispose of. Mr. DISRAELI enjoyed an opportunity of answering a newspaper reporter who had from amiable motives published an account of the discreditable condition of certain cottages at Hingenden. It appeared that the houses had been erected by a speculative tradesman, who owned no other property in the neighbourhood, and who was wholly untrammelled by entails. Much stress was laid in the debate on a recent statement of Lord DERBY's, to the effect that with skilful cultivation the produce of the land might be doubled. But, as Mr. READ remarked, the question is not whether larger crops could be raised, but whether the necessary outlay would yield an adequate return. As the friction of a carriage and the resistance of water to a vessel increases in a progressive ratio with the speed, it may possibly be found that still higher farming would return a reduced percentage on capital. The small Flemish farms which produce larger crops than any other cultivated land employ a far greater proportionate amount of labour than the large English holdings. Mr. FOWLER complained that in England only two millions of persons are engaged in agriculture; but he could scarcely have contended that it would be desirable to double the number of labourers for the purpose of increasing the produce of the land by a third or a fourth. In any other branch of industry the highest proportion of results to expenditure, either of money or labour, would be regarded as the most satisfactory economic condition. The rapid progress of manufacturing industry has not increased the number of workmen in the same proportion with profits, or even with the total amount of wages. The tenure of land by owners has little or no connexion with the claims for tenant-right which were preferred by some of the speakers. Under the Irish Land Act the landlord has become little more than an encumbrancer or annuitant; and if the same system were adopted in England, property in land would become assimilated to personalty, in the distribution of which, according to Mr. FOWLER, no public interest is concerned. It is indeed scarcely probable that settlements of personalty will be permitted by law when life estates in land are abolished; but there is fortunately no lessee to claim a share in the ownership of stocks or shares.

Some of the opponents of Mr. FOWLER's motion dwelt on the well-known fact that settlements and wills almost always include a power of sale; but where the trustees are required to invest the proceeds in land, the effect of the instrument in tying up a part of the total land in the country is the same as if alienation were absolutely prohibited. It is undoubtedly true that a large acreage is constantly on sale; but, on the other hand, there are extensive districts, including many parts of the metropolis, in which it is almost impossible to purchase a freehold. The operations of Land and Building Societies are confined to comparatively small plots of land; and they offer no facilities to those who may wish to become freehold farmers, or to possess villas with fifty or a hundred acres of adjacent land. In all cases except that of an occupier of a house who is also the owner, land is an expensive luxury; and the main reason of the accumulation of great estates is the frequent inability of small proprietors to retain the least productive kind of investment; yet it must be remembered that more or less wealthy persons form a numerous class in England, and that a farm which would afford a scanty maintenance to an ordinary freeholder would often be a desirable possession for a thriving trader. It seems highly probable that a larger portion of land would be habitually bought and sold if the expenses of transfer were smaller, and if many large estates were not artificially protected from division. The strongest objection to the present law is derived from the uncertainty of title, which is not only an evil in itself, but an inevitable cause of expense to vendors and purchasers. Mr. GREGORY, who is well acquainted with the subject, stated with perfect truth that the costliness of transfer affects estates in fee as well as settled properties; but it is only because limited and complicated estates are allowed by law to exist that it becomes necessary to enter into a minute investigation of a title which cannot be known, until it is examined, to convey absolute ownership. In France, and in many other Continental countries, the transfer of land is effected as cheaply as the sale of a railway share, because the purchaser has no need to look beyond the ostensible and immediate owner. In England, on the contrary, it is ordinarily necessary to deduce the title through two or three generations, and to prove that the ownership in fee is not burdened with any limited estate. It may be confidently asserted that sales would be much more easily and cheaply effected if trusts and reversions and life estates were abolished, or consolidated into simple ownership; but there are different opinions as to the effect of increased facility of transfer on the distribution of land. The great proprietors, who are at present the most eager purchasers, might perhaps extend their monopoly if their less wealthy neighbours were always at liberty to accept tempting offers. It is seldom advantageous to struggle against economic tendencies, but those who object to entails use a doubtful argument when they demand additional facilities for the subdivision of land.

Mr. WREN HOSKINS and some other opponents of the existing system would draw the line of estates in remainder at lives in being, to the exclusion of unborn children. Although there may be something to be said for this proposal, the prohibition of marriage settlements except as far as they provide for jointure would be a shock to the habits and feelings of the upper and middle classes. The great majority of settlements relate to personalty, with which it is not at present intended to meddle; and it would be difficult to prevent a landowner from making a provision for his daughter's children while the capitalist was at liberty to found a family. It may possibly hereafter be thought expedient to recognize no claim to any kind of property except that of the owner in possession; but if so harsh and violent a change in the present law and practice is ever to be effected, it can only be after long preparation. It might be more practicable to assimilate land to personalty by a method which would largely promote simplicity of title and cheapness of transfer. When a testator or settlor wishes to secure the transmission of personal property to his unborn descendants, he is compelled to rely on the integrity of trustees or perhaps on the authority of the Court of Chancery. The purchaser of stocks or shares which may form a part of the settled property is content with the execution of the transfer by the registered owner. Nearly all Companies decline to notice a trust or to register any holder except as absolute owner. If the trustee has committed a fraud, or exceeded his powers, the beneficial owner has no remedy except against the defaulter. The presumption that the possessor of personal property is also the lawful owner is not applied to realty. The beneficial owner is entitled, not to an equivalent for land which may have been wrongfully alienated by his trustee, but to the land itself, in whatever hands it may be found; and consequently a purchaser must satisfy himself in every instance that the vendor has power to sell. If the legal owner, as he is called, were in all cases authorised to make a complete title, it may be hoped that fraudulent transfers by trustees would rarely occur. Except where fraud or error was committed, settled and entailed estates would, as at present, be withheld from the market; but in the meantime the large number of owners who can already make a good title would be able to sell the whole or part at their pleasure without incurring the cost of an elaborate investigation.

Mr. DISRAELI, according to his custom, and with better reason than on some other occasions, opposed Mr. FOWLER's motion on incidental grounds. Mr. GLADSTONE, with due official propriety, showed that the motion was unreasonable, inasmuch as it related to a part of a larger question. It was necessary, he said, to dispose of the law of intestate property, with which the Government has promised to deal, before meddling with the powers of making settlements and entails; and on the whole it would be desirable that Mr. FOWLER should withdraw his motion, on the assurance that the importance of the subject was duly appreciated. It is satisfactory to observe that Mr. GLADSTONE is gradually learning the inconvenience of hasty and unnecessary pledges. Extinct or semi-extinct volcanoes are much less mischievous than in their former state of periodical eruption. By declaring itself against settlements the Government would have made few friends, and would have alarmed a large and powerful class of the community. It is much better that landed property and property in general should not be meddled with, except when the Government of the day thinks it necessary and feasible to propose definite legislation. If only one kind of ownership were recognised by the law as affecting the rights of a purchaser, there would be little difficulty in at last establishing a system of registration, and landowners would find, in the increase of the saleable value of their estates, some compensation for the dis-influence of their prejudices or habits of thought. The present system is certainly not perfect, and it is entirely exceptional.

M. THIERS AT THE ÉLYSÉE.

M. THIERS has turned the Easter vacation to account by paying a visit to Paris. English criticism is often and naturally severe on the author of the prose version of the Napoleonic legend and the latest exponent of the Protectionist fallacy. But, mistaken as the ideas and policy of M. THIERS in some respects are, it is only just to admit that he had good ground for pride when he entered the Élysée as President of the French Republic. If he has defended some bad causes in his lifetime, he has in some degree atoned for his error by the pertinacity with which he assailed the particular bad cause with which his name will in future be chiefly associated. NAPOLEON III. showed a true instinct as to character when he singled out M. THIERS as the man whom it was of most moment to keep out of the Corps Législatif. Politicians whose Republicanism was not even disguised might find their way thither without the authorities thinking it worth while to offer any very active opposition. But at successive elections the whole power of the Government was strained to prevent M. THIERS's return for Paris. Events have justified the estimate which was then taken of him. His was not the hand that dragged the Empire down—NAPOLEON III. had at least the privilege of being his own executioner—but his was the head that saw its real weakness, and the voice that most consistently proclaimed that weakness to the French people. The Parliamentary resurrection which distinguished the last years of Cæsarism was mainly his work, and the EMPEROR's dislike, or his own superior foresight, kept him clear of all complicity with the useless efforts of M. ÉMILE OLLIVIER. M. THIERS bided his time, and when his time came it brought his long delayed reward with it. After the capitulation of Paris it was to M. THIERS that the nation turned by common consent, as to the sole deposit of Parliamentary traditions. Upon questions of war or finance M. THIERS is narrow and old-fashioned, but where constitutional policy is concerned he has shown himself singularly apt at learning a new lesson. He determined by a sort of intuition that the best chance for Parliamentary government was to clothe it with Republican forms, and for more than a year the old Orleanist statesman has ruled a French Republic by means, and in spite, of a strongly monarchical Assembly. He has had a hard fight of it, and he has made not a few mistakes in the course of the conflict. But as yet he has come off conqueror, and his first entry into the Élysée was of the nature of a conqueror's triumph. In the palace where the order was signed which sent him to a prison and condemned France to a political slumber of twenty years he appeared as the PRESIDENT of a Republic which has at least, as it seems, been taught not to put its trust in BONAPARTES. In the midst of men who are scheming to bring back monarchy in whatever shape they can get it soonest, he represented a power stronger than that of the sovereign Assembly—the power of a public opinion which he alone estimated rightly in the first instance, and which has continually been justifying his clearness of vision from that day to this. Even among the Republicans who most dislike the mode in which he exercises his authority there is no longer any distrust of his faithfulness to the Republic. Those who believed—and there were many of them in all sections of French opinion—that he was only using Republican institutions as a machine with which to level the road for a restoration, have by this time seen their mistake. The growing hostility of the majority of the Assembly, curiously shown in the discussion in the Committee of Permanence, upon this very visit to Paris, is a tribute the meaning of which can hardly be mistaken. The Right know their friends, and are willing to leave the choice of means by which to prove their friendliness very much to their own discretion. But M. THIERS does not conform even to this conveniently elastic standard. That he occupies the position of a ruler controlling, in the interest of the nation, a Legislature which no longer represents the nation, has for some time been growing constantly clearer, and his appearance at Paris will make it still more evident. At Versailles the PRESIDENT is partly associated with, and partly overshadowed by, the Assembly. At Paris the PRESIDENT is seen alone, and the fact that he takes his place in a capital which the Assembly dare not enter, gives special prominence to the difference between the Republican Executive and the Monarchical Legislature.

It is not wonderful that some members of the Committee of Permanence should have objected to M. THIERS's visit. It does not compromise the Assembly in any technical sense, for the Assembly is master of its own movements, and can hold its sittings in a valley of the Pyrenees or on board a man-of-war, if either of these situations should suit the fancy of the majority better than Versailles. But though it does not commit the Deputies to any change of policy as regards the place of their meeting, it forebadows the inevitable change of policy which must sooner or later be forced upon it. It seemed possible at one time that the quarrel between the capital and the Legislature might prove to represent an equally hopeless breach between the capital and the country. If this had been so, the issue of the contest might long have remained doubtful. If the provinces had combined to punish Paris for its Republican excesses by solemnly degrading it to the level of one of their own towns, it would have been a conflict between numbers on the one side and physical advantages and long possession on the other. Probably nature and history would still have won; for France, with Paris sulking in the cold, would be very unlike the France to which Frenchmen have been accustomed, and they would in time have come to feel that, though a Court may be set up at Ghent or Antwerp, a capital is less easily moved. But they must have had time to cool before this simple truth would have become apparent to them, and in the interval now interests would have grown up, and a local preference might have been created in favour of the city on which the choice of the provinces had fallen. As it is, however, there is no sign that upon this question the Assembly represented anything but itself. The country accepts the decision of the majority to remain at Versailles, just as it accepts any other of their decisions—as knowing, that is, that they are of no permanent value. It is a striking testimony to the indifference with which the Assembly is regarded, that no one is troubled because the PRESIDENT has not the power of dissolving it. If the Assembly really expressed the opinion of France, the Republican minority would naturally be uneasy at the inability of the Republican PRESIDENT to challenge or obstruct the action of the majority by means of an appeal to the electors. This inability on the part of M. THIERS creates no anxiety, because the Assembly has no means of giving effect to its monarchical aspirations. In so far as it represents order and Parliamentary government it has weight and authority, for in this respect it is at one with its constituents. In so far as it represents anything beyond this, it is at issue with the great body of its constituents, as with the Executive Government, and against the two combined it is powerless, except for delay. And, being powerless except for delay, it is powerless except for good. Nothing would be gained by an over-hasty conversion of the Provisional Republic into a Republic with the provisional element left out. The stability of the country would not be increased, for experience has shown that in France permanent and temporary Governments are equally easy to overturn. On the other hand, much would be lost by setting up any Government as an object of definite attack until there has been time for the nation to recover a little from the moral and physical exhaustion into which it was reduced by the war, and to give shape and precision to its ideas and wishes. The existence of the present Assembly ensures this advantage to France. Nothing short of a coup d'état could enable it to play any other part than that of a stop-gap, and a coup d'état is not a weapon which a Legislature can well bring to bear against the Executive, unless it has ascertained beforehand that it has the nation at its back. The Right may be sure, therefore, that the formal appearance in Paris of the PRESIDENT of the Republic is only a prelude to the appearance of the Assembly on the same stage. Those of them who are fearful for their own safety may perhaps draw comfort from the reflection that, when that day comes, it is not likely that they will any longer make part of the Chamber whose return to the capital they so much deprecate.

MR. GLADSTONE'S SURRENDER.

IT is difficult to understand why the Government should have so long delayed the announcement with regard to the Royal Parks Bill which Mr. AXFORD was authorised to make last week. The opposition to the measure would probably have been disarmed at the outset if this explanation had been offered when the Bill was introduced; and the Government would have had the advantage of pursuing a distinct, deliberate, and consistent policy, instead of appearing to truckle to the insolent menaces of demagogues and rioters. On a former occasion the Monsieur Secretary, having prohibited a meeting in Trafalgar Square, precipitately withdrew his interdict when he heard it rumoured that one of the zealots of anarchy had proclaimed his intention of trying conclusions with the police; and it will be remembered that somewhat similar tactics were followed with regard to a Fenian meeting in the Phoenix Park at Dublin. In the case of the Royal Parks Bill Mr. GLADSTONE took care that an important statement should be reserved until he had received a threatening message from a body of notorious agitators; and as the subsequent proposals of the Government proved to be in the nature of concessions, it is not surprising that they should be regarded as a terrified surrender under the pressure of intimidation. It is not to be supposed that the Ministry were desirous of contriving a cheap triumph for Mr. ODGER and Mr. BRADLAUGH; but if this had been their object, they could hardly have devised a more ingenious or effectual method of promoting it. Mr. GLADSTONE protests that the Government has never changed its policy on this question, and that Mr. AYRTON's statement conveyed merely the ideas which had been entertained from the beginning. The Bill of last Session in its original form did not propose to deal with meetings in the Parks, and Mr. AYRTON withdrew it when he discovered that it was intended to press the amendment on this point which had been introduced by the Select Committee. The present measure, containing the amendment, was read a first time on February the 7th, and was the subject of repeated discussions; but it was not until April the 4th, after Mr. GLADSTONE had been informed that he had lost the confidence of the Friends of the People, and had ceased to be regarded as one of them, that the intention was disclosed of placing the principal Parks in the metropolis at the disposal of the blustering democrats who had publicly burned the Bill, and threatened the Government with defiance if they dared to attempt to carry it into effect. It is unfortunate, to say the least, that the Ministry did not think it necessary to take the House of Commons and the public into their confidence at an earlier period. It is not desirable that encouragement should be given to the idea that concessions can be extorted by noisy violence; and whatever may have been the designs of the Government in the first instance, it is certain that the proposal which they have now submitted will be regarded by the indiscriminating multitude as a tribute to successful intimidation, and that unscrupulous agitators will not fail to make the most of an apparent victory. Mr. GUEDALLA has lost no time in summoning a meeting to celebrate the result of his spirited conduct in sending an insulting message to the head of the Government; he considers himself entitled to boast that he told Mr. GLADSTONE that he would stand no nonsense, and Mr. GLADSTONE took the hint. Mr. ODGER, in addressing another meeting, has also pointed the moral of the transaction. "The only way," he says, "for working-men to get power is to embarrass those who have it." Mr. GLADSTONE can be firm, not to say obstinate, enough when he chooses, as, for example, in such cases as the Thames Embankment and the COLLIER appointment; but it is not surprising that his conduct towards the politicians of the taproom and the pavement should lead them to imagine that they have only to ask in order to get what they want.

Mr. AYRTON epigrammatically defined the right of meeting to be the right of expressing your opinions freely in a place where you have a right to meet; but he added that this did not entitle a mob to take possession of any place for which it might have a fancy. It is obvious that if the right were of this elastic nature, it might be discovered that Westminster Abbey, or the British Museum, or perhaps the South Kensington halls, afforded a more convenient and comfortable place of meeting than the open Parks. Mr. GLADSTONE said he was not aware that, "strictly speaking, there was any right of meeting in the Parks in the legal sense of the word," and he can hardly have been ignorant that it was the opinion of the legal advisers of a Government of which he was formerly a member that the Parks had never been surrendered to the public for this purpose. The usage which he thinks should now be formally recognized dates only from the miserable riots of 1866, but it has perhaps been countenanced by the weakness and vacillation of successive Ministries. If Mr. GLADSTONE could have brought himself to give a loyal support to Mr. HARDY's Bill, the disgraceful and dangerous incidents of the last six years might have been avoided; but it was not until the meetings began to pass resolutions against himself that he was impressed with the necessity of "regulating" them. It is now proposed that public meetings shall be allowed in Regent's Park, Victoria Park, Battersea Park, and Hyde Park, the four great Parks which represent the north, east, south, and west of the Metropolis; but two hostile meetings will not be permitted in a Park at the same time, and some notice will therefore, we suppose, be required of the intention to hold a meeting, so that precautions may be taken to avoid a collision. In the other Parks meetings will be strictly forbidden, and we hope it is not too much to presume that the prohibition will also be enforced in the case of attempted gatherings in Trafalgar Square and other streets or open spaces. Now that four Parks are open for public meetings, there can be no pretext for obstructing important thoroughfares for this purpose. Mr. HARCOURT complained that magistrates have refused to license houses in which democratic gatherings have been held; but it is necessary to observe that this was simply on the ground that the neighbours had protested against the uproar which attended these assemblies. Whether Sunday meetings shall be allowed, is a question which is still under the consideration of the Government.

It may be presumed that the Bill will now pass the House of Commons. Mr. HARCOURT, who had at first denounced the measure as an attack without precedent on the liberties of the subject, and who had stormed, in language borrowed from O'CONNELL, about this example of Algerine legislation, is now disposed to accept it as "tolerably satisfactory"—an admission which, coming from so critical a gentleman, may be regarded as almost approaching to enthusiasm. Mr. AUBERON HERBERT was left alone in a vain attempt to divide against the Bill, and there is evidently a general disposition to promote the settlement of a troublesome and unpleasant question. It was not to be expected, however, that the agitators to whom Mr. GLADSTONE has been so obsequious and conciliatory would resist the temptation to exhibit themselves as the masters of the Government, and to issue fresh orders to their subordinates in office. Mr. GLADSTONE, who has no time to make himself acquainted with the particulars of such a trifling question as the American Case, is never without leisure to carry on a correspondence with anybody who writes from a public-house, in the name of the People, to insult and threaten the authorities. Mr. LANGLEY insists, in a letter to the PREMIER, that "Mr. AYRTON's explanations, expressed in his usual bad taste and bad temper, ought to be expressed in the Bill itself"; but the result of introducing expressions of bad taste and bad temper into the Statute Book would probably be the reverse of soothing and agreeable. The imputation on the good faith of the Government is only what might be expected from their friends; and Mr. LANGLEY, who must be supposed to know the character and projects of his associates, adds significantly that it would be well to keep on good terms with them, as they are apt when roused to be "destructive to property." As Mr. LANGLEY asserts that the people have always conducted themselves with the greatest propriety at the meetings in the Parks, he is either not aware that the trees have been injured, and that the speeches of the orators are invariably accompanied by the blasphemous recitations of the mock litany men, or perhaps he is of opinion that these are only the playful ebullitions of recreative religion. The "delegates" who are represented by Mr. GUEDALLA have intimated to the Government that they will not tolerate any interference with Sunday meetings, and that they hope the Government will see "in time" the danger of attempting to preserve good order and decent behaviour in the Parks on that day. The history of this question is unfortunately a record of imbecile vacillation, factious malice, and pusillanimous concessions, but it is to be hoped that we have at last come to the end of this miserable and humiliating exhibition.

THE SUNDAY TRADING BILL.

SIR THOMAS CHAMBERS'S ill-considered attempt to amend the law in relation to Sunday trading has met its just fate at the hands of the House of Commons. The uncertainty felt by its promoters as to the character and effect of their own measure was shown by the preamble being inconsistent with fact, and the mover's speech being inconsistent with the preamble. "Whereas," the Bill begins, "the practice of unnecessary Sunday trading prevails extensively, and the law is insufficient to prevent the same." That is an intelligible reason at all events for amending the law, and it suggests the idea that the members whose names are at the back of the Bill wish to see the Act of CHARLES II. made more stringent than it is at present. But Mr. TALBOT gave a wholly different version of his intentions in introducing such a statute. The object of the Bill, he said, so far from restricting the liberty of the subject in the matter of Sunday trading was to give him additional liberties. In that case the law, instead of being insufficient to prevent Sunday trading, might be more correctly described as insufficient to give it proper encouragement. The truth of the matter is that the existing law, instead of being too easy, is too severe, and has consequently defeated its own object. The first thing, therefore, that any one who wishes to amend it effectually ought to do, is to repeal the Act of CHARLES II. The provisions of that statute have become obsolete by reason of their excessive stringency, and so long as it remains in the way the law about Sunday trading cannot possibly be placed on a satisfactory footing. But instead of abolishing the Act of CHARLES II. and then proceeding to impose certain modified restrictions in its stead, the framers of the Sunday Trading Bill inserted a saving clause to the effect that nothing contained in it should repeal or alter the earlier statute. Whatever may be thought of the merits of their Bill, this was clearly a mistake. To keep an obsolete statute in being by this indirect sort of re-enactment was to flaunt it in the face of all who have suffered from it. It was to condone all the irritating eccentricities of Mr. BEE WRIGHT and the fanatics by whom he was supported, and to proclaim that the only motive for passing a less severe Act when a more severe one was already on the statute-book was to catch offenders who have hitherto evaded the rusty machinery of the Lord's Day Observance Act, leaving that machinery still in being in the event of its hereafter proving possible to use it.

The provisions of the Bill were of a kind to make any lover of peace and order congratulate himself that he can hear no more of it for a year to come. Setting out with a clause imposing a fine of twenty shillings on any person who should hawk, cry, sell, expose for sale, or deliver any goods, or carry on his ordinary business on Sunday, within the metropolis, it went on to enumerate certain classes of exception. Meat, fish, poultry, and vegetables might be sold "without public cry" before ten o'clock in the morning. Fruit, pastry, and drinks, for the sale of which no licence is required, might be sold "on the premises and without public cry" before ten o'clock in the morning and after one o'clock in the afternoon. Milk or cream might be sold under the same limitations as fruit, as regards hours, but with no prohibition of public cry, and no restriction to particular premises. The result of these exceptions would have been, that all kinds of food might have been sold in the shops before ten o'clock, and fruit, pastry, and non-intoxicating drinks after one o'clock, but that these latter articles could not have been sold by costermongers at all, while meat, fish, poultry, and vegetables could not have been sold by them with public cry. It is not surprising therefore that the shopkeepers of the New Cut could be described by Mr. M'ARTHUR as "almost unanimous in favour of the measure." The only wonder is that they were not altogether unanimous. The Bill was nothing more nor less than a measure for the protection of shopkeepers in certain neighbourhoods against the competition of the costermonger. Throughout the Sunday afternoon cherries and ginger-beer, in the summer chestnuts, and coffee in the winter, were to be sold with impunity "on the premises," but the owner of any wandering barrow or intrusive stall might be handed over to the police and fined 20s. Even as regards meat, fish, and vegetables, the Bill would have placed the costermonger at a considerable disadvantage. He might have sold, indeed, down to the same hour in the morning, but he must have sold "without public cry," and a costermonger forbidden to use his lungs is a costermonger deprived of his favourite implement of trade. Whenever he had forgotten himself in the enthusiasm of praising his wares to a customer, and had gone on to praise them in tones which might be heard by the whole neighbourhood, he would have come under the penalties denounced against the sale of goods generally, and would have forfeited his claim to share in the exemption decreed in favour of sale without public cry; and the shopkeeper, mindful alike of his own profits and of the Fourth Commandment, would have invoked the aid of "CHAMBERS'S Act," and given him a practical lesson against making unlawful profits at his expense. We confess that in this matter our sympathies are with the costermongers. Their customers are usually taken from a still poorer class than that which frequents shops even on a Sunday afternoon, and they themselves have often no other means of getting a living but street-selling. It is natural enough that the Lambeth tradesmen should be irritated at seeing a barrow containing the very counterpart of their own stock drawn up opposite their shop-windows, and carrying off half the people who would otherwise have become customers. But there is no reason why Parliament should constitute itself their champion, and pass a law framed exclusively in their interest. This was what the House of Commons was asked to do on Wednesday. If the Bill had been passed, it would probably have soon become as obsolete as the Act of CHARLES II. A few prosecutions would have led to some street-rioting, and then the common sense of the community would have devised a way out of the difficulty, and either repealed the Act or extended to the costermonger equal privileges with the shopkeeper.

The main argument alleged in favour of this Bill and of several other similar essays at legislation is that, the value of the Sunday rest being acknowledged on all hands, it can only be secured to the smaller class of shopkeepers by making it penal to disregard it. Sir THOMAS CHAMBERS seems to have a theory of his own on this point, inasmuch as he proposed to secure the Sunday rest to the shopkeeper by making it penal for the costermongers to disregard it. But setting aside this peculiar mode of viewing the subject, it must be admitted that the question is not free from difficulty. If abstinence from work on the Sunday were simply a matter of religious observance, it might perhaps be contended that those who hold it to be a duty have no right to ask the Legislature to make the performance of their duty easier. But, besides being a religious observance, it is also a practice which greatly promotes the moral and physical welfare of the whole population. The lives of many Englishmen are too dull and sordid as it is, and if there were no change of thought or occupation even on the Sunday, the national health and the national character would grievously suffer. There is sufficient ground, therefore, for the intervention of Parliament, if it can be shown that Sunday work is not sufficiently discountenanced by public opinion. Even then, however, it would not be enough to pass a simple prohibition of all kinds of Sunday work. If the Sunday rest is to be anything more than mere sitting still at home, if any element of recreation and enjoyment is to enter into it, some people must work in order that others may play. The Lambeth shopkeeper who is anxious to have the costermonger warned off the pavement in order that he may shut his shop without fear of his customers finding other means of supplying their Sunday wants, would feel aggrieved if there were no trains to take him a few miles out of London, and no taverns open to give him dinner. Yet the railway servant or the tavern waiter is in every respect as worthy of protection as the shopkeeper. If simple prohibition is the right policy in the one case, it is equally the right policy in the other. And what the tavern is to the shopkeeper out for a holiday the fruit-stall or the ginger-beer barrow is to a humbler order of Sunday pleasure-takers. Take these away, and they will have nothing left to do but saunter along the thirsty streets and recall the happy days when oranges were to be had at every corner. The only solution of this difficulty is to be looked for in an application of the common sense principle, that those who work to give others pleasure on Sunday should have their lost holiday made up to them on some other day in the week. For the present, at all events, this principle is not capable of legislative recognition, and if it should ever become so, it may be hoped that such arrangements as might be needed to give effect to it would have been supplied by the advancing good sense of the classes immediately concerned. Meanwhile, the cause of reasonable Sunday rest can only be injured by such impracticable auxiliaries as the gentlemen whose names appeared on the back of the Sunday Trading Bill.

THE CASE OF O'CONNOR.

THE case of O'CONNOR is a burlesque at once of treason and of the current medical theories of insanity, and it may be useful as demonstrating the unsubstantiality of Republicanism in England, as well as of the doctrine which has of late been widely propagated of irresponsibility for crime. If O'CONNOR had been on trial for high treason, and liable on conviction to be hanged, it is by no means certain that Dr. TUCKER might not have induced the jury to find the prisoner insane. He described O'CONNOR as a delicate, weak boy, both in mind and body, subject to scrofulous disease, and suffering from a blow on the head; and he considered that these conjoint causes produced exacerbation of insanity about the time of the offence. He thought it a very dangerous form of reasoning insanity. On visiting the prisoner he had found an irregular formation of the head, an enlargement of the palate, and a remarkable dilation of the pupil of the eye. The head measured only 19 inches, instead of 22 or 23. The right lung was diseased, and the prisoner stated that he spat blood. He had suffered from a diseased bone of the great toe, which had been amputated. The prisoner told Dr. TUCKER freely the history of his outrage on the QUEEN. He was walking by the Serpentine on Sunday week before the event, when suddenly the idea came into his head to shoot the QUEEN. He thought of it all day, but finally abandoned the idea, because the Prince of WALES would succeed, and he should not thus liberate the prisoners in whom he was interested. He was very restless and unwell during the next ten days, and being quite determined to carry out his design and liberate the Fenians, he resolved to draw up a paper, to seize HER MAJESTY as she walked up the aisle of the Cathedral on Thanksgiving Day, to hold the pistol to her forehead, and compel her to sign the paper. Dr. TUKE objected that there would be difficulty about pen and ink, and the people around HER MAJESTY would seize O'CONNOR; to which he answered that they would be paralysed with horror, and that some one would bring pen and ink. Dr. TUKE asked him if he knew how great a crime this was; and he replied that his motive was good, and his act perfectly justifiable, and that even if killing the QUEEN would liberate the prisoners, he should think such a crime capable of justification.

Before Dr. TUKE made his visit he stated to the prisoner's father that he was afraid the prisoner's brain had become affected, as had been the case with his great-uncle and other relations. We have thus all the features that usually present themselves in cases where an attempt is made to obtain from a jury a verdict of insanity. But there is this important difference, that the consequence of acquittal on this ground would have been more serious in this case than that of conviction. It would be unfair to hold the doctors responsible for the variety of effect which the same doctrine produces under different circumstances on juries. But it seems correct to say that this doctrine has not yet assumed a shape in which it can be generally applied in the inquiries of courts of justice. We speak perhaps loosely of a medical theory of insanity, when the individual practitioner is responsible for no more of it than he has himself advanced. But still it is allowable to test the strength of a chain of argument at its weakest point, and we are therefore justified in dwelling on the manifest inapplicability of this theory to minor crimes. It may be safely said that if this theory were applied alike to all crimes it would render society impossible. We do not hold the medical profession responsible for all that its members may say under cross-examination, but surely nothing can be more absurd than Dr. TUKE's statement that the prisoner attempted to force his way into St. Paul's Cathedral under "a paroxysm of motive." It does not need to be pointed out that, if this expression means anything, it supplies an apology for every crime that can be committed. Even Dr. TUKE, however, was forced to admit that the prisoner might have recovered some degree of sanity since his visit. The prisoner, in fact, had been able in the meantime to see that it was better to be punished as a sane criminal than to be shut up in a lunatic asylum. His resolution to plead guilty was, therefore, an indisputable proof of sanity; and if he was sane at the time of his trial, it becomes highly improbable that he was insane when he committed the offence, unless indeed we are to adopt the extreme theory that crime always proves insanity; and even Dr. TUKE would hardly propose to go that length. It is perhaps fortunate that this case has happened so soon after other cases in which the plea of insanity was strongly urged, because it justifies all that was written in reference to these cases against the attempts made in the name of medical science to undermine the foundations of morality. However guarded may be the language in which really scientific physicians announce principles in connexion with this subject, that language is certain to be burlesqued by other physicians who pretend to science, and who desire what they perhaps would call eminence, and we should call notoriety. We should think that Dr. TUKE will attain a certain kind of fame by the introduction into a criminal trial of the expression "paroxysm of motive," and he may also congratulate himself on having done his client more harm than good by his interposition. "There is," said Mr. Baron CLEASBY, who tried the case, "the occasion when this took place; there are the manner, the contrivance, the cunning with which it was done; and there is still more the intention which entered the mind, though it was not harboured by the mind, of which we have heard the first to-day from those who were supposed to be your friends." By a curious infelicity Dr. TUKE has damaged at once his client and his own profession. It will for some time to come avail little that other physicians bring learning and observation to the discussion of this subject, because the public will remember the cases of WATSON and O'CONNOR, and will believe that all medical theories of insanity lead practically to irresponsibility for crime. We do not underrate the value of medical experience, and physicians who come into court to state the results of their examination of criminals are entitled to respectful hearing. But as regards principles they had better keep silence, unless they can enunciate something against which the common instinct of self-preservation in mankind does not rebel.

As regards the prisoner there is hardly anything to be said except that we regret that he could not be whipped and imprisoned without so great an effusion of solemn talk. We hope that when the whipping is inflicted, the Special Commissioners of the daily newspapers will not be present, or, if they are, that they will only moderately exert their descriptive powers on the occasion. But, for the prevention of similar acts of folly, it was desirable that such a sentence should be passed, and there will probably be a general concurrence of opinion that the prisoner has deserved what he will get. The mere enactment of the law under which he will be punished has for many years preserved HER MAJESTY from annoyance, and it may be expected that the enforcement of this law in the present instance will be equally efficacious for at least as long a period. It is intolerable that this kingdom and its colonies should be momentarily frightened from propriety by a burlesque of treason; but when the real character of the prisoner's act was understood, it was felt to be inexpedient to make too much fuss about the case, or to run the risk of qualifying the prevailing sentiment of contempt by any sympathy which might be excited by undue severity of punishment. Let him undergo the just and moderate sentence that has been passed, and then—

Thou wretched, rash, intruding fool, farewell.

We had hastily taken him, not for his better, but his worse. When the news of his attempt was first flashed through the country it looked like treason, but we now find that it was no more treasonable than Dr. TUKE's evidence was scientific. The prisoner has himself said that the scales had fallen from his eyes, and he saw the evil of what he had done. It were to be wished that the scales might fall from Dr. TUKE's eyes, and that he could see the evil which he tried to do. He and some other members of his profession are to blame if the public hastily confound science with quackery. To shut up O'CONNOR for life in an asylum might probably not have the same deterring effect on possible imitators as whipping him; and besides, no Government could undertake the custody for life of all the criminals whom it might please the doctors to declare insane. Sooner or later some shorter method would have to be taken with law-breakers; and if medical science, or what calls itself so, should be generally opposed to their punishment, medical science would have to give way. Society will never consent to give men or boys with small heads and diseased toes carte blanche to commit whatever outrages may occur to their foolish minds.

HOMINESS.

ENGLISH people are perhaps rather too apt to pride themselves on their unsentimental character. They look contemptuously on the French bachelor of fifty whose mind is kept in a flutter of excitement by some pending affaire de cœur; and turn away disgusted from the juvenile Fraulein fresh from the Institut, who gets into a fine frenzy about German Geist and Vaterland. So far from disowning the name of shopkeepers, they are particularly proud of the mental hardihood which they imagine it implies. The English girl learns to repeat the same strain, and feels grateful to that British common sense which saves her from the ridiculous affectation of her French or German governess. Meanwhile, some cosmopolitan onlooker might see in these rational islanders quite enough of another kind of sentimentality to be amused at their protestations. And were he disposed to philosophise, he would probably make a note of this new instance of self-unconsciousness. One can willingly admit that Englishmen are less outwardly emotional than many other races. Yet there are other kinds of sentiment that do not display themselves in violent gesticulation, or even in exuberant language. Any feeling may pass into sentimentality if it be excessively caressed and periodically professed. It would seem indeed that some form of this indulgence is inseparably connected with refined social life. People sustain a large quantity of pleasure from the mere contact of each other's sensibilities, that the habit of professing a common type of sentiment is naturally engendered. At first more or less a conscious process, it tends to become automatic; and then we have the true affection of sensibility. Should this be so, we may expect to find some specimen of the species lurking even in English society.

On comparing recent with older pictures of English life, with eagerness to discard all participation in sentiment appears to be a comparatively new characteristic. The young ladies condemned in the sketches of Goldsmith or of Sir Walter Scott were little concerned about a total disguise of emotion. Wealth and gentility, romance and adventure, were the objects of the most unrefined feelings. And even in the present generation of small and may have seen the devotee of Byron, the passionate peruser of Romeo and Juliet. We are led, then, to suppose that if sentiment has absolutely passed away, its departure is a very recent event. But has it really disappeared? There is much certainly to lend colour to the supposition. When one's ears are heavy with trumpetings which are to "inaugurate" a new era of women's rights, there is reason to fear that the decline of sentiment is far advanced. For are not women the main conservators of sentiment, and can they be supposed to be fulfilling this function when they clamour for the business of their rivals? There is another way of reaching the same conclusion. The strongest form of sentiment among women has generally been supposed to be love. But a study of present literature will continually disclose indications of a growing indifference and even contempt for the ancient forms of this passion. It is indeed a conspicuous feature of present society that all ardent enthusiasms are repressed. One has only to go from a perusal of one of Miss Austen's novels to listen to the kind of talk patronised by a genteel circle of our own decade, to be impressed with the apparent decline in range and force of the various sympathies and antipathies of society. By far the majority of the young women one meets are too active to be afflicted with much sentiment. Their great concern being to cut a figure in the world, they find themselves fully employed by the added competition of the men whom they are anxious to drive from the field. Love is to these only the liquid papulum of babes; nor do the ideas of duty, self-culture, or general beneficence attract a larger share of passionate regard. All this, and much more, gives support to the theory that English sentimentality has become obsolete.

If, however, we turn into the byways of English society, this assertion will appear frequently to be contradicted. Even at an evening party in London one may chance to light on a solitary instance of an emotional woman. She will perhaps succeed in engaging you, in a low-pitched tone, in conversation. Some desultory remarks with rather a moralizing tendency soon introduce disclosures of her special tastes and aspirations. She is disgusted with the hollowness of drawing-room society. She loves the retirement and liberty of the family. She always returns from her visit to town with a fresh zest for the comforts and amusements of her own home. As to those fast girls who care only to be free from the tedious restraints of home and mamma, they are unworthy of the name of Englishwomen. By such a stream of conversation your companion leads you to the reflection that one form of sentiment at least survives. You seem to catch a warm waft of air from some more temperate zone of society, lying beyond the arctic circle in which it is your fate to move. Away from the noisy capital, in a thousand snug little towns, you imagine you hear the sentimental fires still replenished which are destined to warm and cheer those favoured groups. Such occasional experiences remind one that, in spite of the unemotional character of superficial society, there may be deeper strata which manifest the phenomenon in a high degree. The old order of romantic sentiment may have grown unfashionable, but a new species, less brilliant perhaps, but equally warm, has taken its place. And if it is incapable of those imaginative flights in which the earlier feelings indulged, it has at least a theme ever ready to hand about which its more humble movements may play. Among the classes with which this quiet type of sentiment delights to dwell, it pervades every part of domestic life. If, for example, the papa brings home at dinner-time some story of an elopement and its disasters, the occasion is improved by mutual felicitation on the possession of pure home affections. Should a brother betray too strong a liking for a military life, he is watched with sorrowful anxiety, and repeatedly reminded of the blessings of domestic attachment. Even the youngest girls are supposed to need indoctrination; and any strong leanings to Shakespeare or the other undomestic poets are duly counteracted, a healthy partiality for Mr. Tupper being encouraged instead. The selection of novels for the common evening perusal illustrates the same principle at work; George Eliot is rejected as not striking the proper home chord, and the author of John Halifax welcomed as a priestess under whose direction they may renew their devotional rite at the altar of Home and Comfort. Such a systematic infusion of sentiment can scarcely be ineffective; and accordingly one finds, as a common rule, the children of these families at a very early period duly absorbing the element. One is amused perhaps at hearing the juvenile trio in Latin Grammar precociously fixing the details of his future domestic management; or his sister, still fresh in her teens, hinting at laudable plans of winning, and reconciling to the amenities of home, some refractory bachelor. The girlish ardour which usually takes a wilder direction at this imaginative age glows prudently, in her case, between the safe confines of the domestic bricks. She does not wish to triumph in the realm of fashion. To bring a dozen admirers to a humble posture at her feet would afford her no satisfaction. Not even the glitter of wealth and social status, or the select pleasures of intellect and taste, can divert her from the more solid enjoyment of home attachments. Nor do these lessons cease to be operative in later life. One can observe the stream of sentimental influence passing like a traditional belief from one generation to another. The children who have sung some home ditty at their elder sister's priming, come themselves to extract the seducing honey which the domestic idyll secretes, and in time begin in their turn to recommend the same machine gratification to others. The great advantage which this form of sensibility possesses is its pervading character. Unlike the feverish ambition to slay a dragon, or the fluttering expectation of some princely lover, it does not disappear with the lapse of youth. On the contrary, it fares all the better for the rude shocks of experience. For if the world proves hostile or cruel, the domestic felicities grow only the more cherished. The husband who returns weary and fretful from his profession or business is at once regaled by a sight of armchair and slippers, and the troubling recollections of the day speedily give place to peaceful oscillations of consciousness between the sight of his industrious Lucretia and the shadowy phantoms of sleep.

With all the mild excellences which this type of emotion possesses, it is unfortunately apt to become at times a little too bearish in antagonism. It makes large requisitions on the moral admiration of others, and when it fauces itself suffering an indignity, it very easily grows explosive. Should any bachelor friend from town speak in one of its circles a little too warmly in praise of his club, he is immediately assaulted as a misogynist and a hater of home and family. A dozen voices are ready to proclaim the Nemesis of the insulted Penates. To these innocent people a predilection for club and bachelor dinners is synonymous with gaiety, cynicism, and all the other ills which the male half of juvenile flesh in London is supposed to be heir to. Curious enough, these enthusiasts for domestic tranquillity may be found by chance straying, as if by mistake, in some remote part of the Continent. At a crowded table d'hôte at Interlaken or Lucerne one is burdened with a plaint from a party of this character. They are satiated, they will tell you, with this promiscuous and fugitive society; not even on Sunday can they have a sense of their cherished home-quiet; and they are eager to get back to their neglected domicile. You perhaps are bold enough to suggest, in reply, that an Alpine climb and a French cuisine are a pleasant diversion from stay-at-home life, and you are forthwith denounced as a traitor to the British love of ara et foci. Or you may be sauntering some fine evening at a Sommertheater in Berlin, or Kaffee-garten at Dresden, and be suddenly arrested by the genuine British grumble. You listen, and hear a worthy paterfamilias righteously denouncing this out-of-door life to his immature offspring as destructive of home associations.

One is strongly tempted, in view of all these professions of sentiment, to press the inquiry, how much of them is really honest? For is it not to be noticed that they are often heard in the houses where least attractiveness is to be found? The girl who, when at a distance from home, pours out most profusely in her letters her longings to return, is probably in possession of about as dismal an abode as one might find. It would certainly be on the whole most gratifying to believe that the larger number of these declarations are at least over-astounded. For one cannot help reflecting that, if such an amount of sentimental force is directed to so very ordinary an idea, it augurs ill, to say the least of it, for the quality of our emotions or of our intellects; and if the alternative to-day is either to assume this form of sentiment or to be the stout-hearted, even if reckless, girl of fast life, there is a good deal to be said for the latter choice. Cant is always offensive, as cant; but when the sentiment or belief feigned is of inferior value, it is doubly displeasing. If we must have affectations of feeling, cannot a common objective point of a little higher level than the parlour chimney-piece be hit upon? But possibly there is much to be said in explanation, if not in justification, of our sentimental proclivities for home. Our commercial activity is prone to make us unromantic; and the old ideas of courage, honour, and patriotism are in danger of growing archaic when Chambers of Commerce and Trade-unions decide for peace at any price or for the cheapening of royalty. It must be remembered, too, that the home type of sentiment is something which every mediocre mind can share in. Aesthetic preferences and political enthusiasms, when ventilated at an evening party, have the drawback of excluding many well-meaning but incapable people from the conversation; but a chat about home comforts has the advantage of civility, it tends to hide all inequalities among the guests, and gives ample scope for the least cultivated to air their ideas and contribute to the conversational din. With such palpable recommendations there seems every reason why this domesticity of feeling should long continue to be characteristic of our insular population; though it would very much reconcile us to this order of things to know that it was becoming less harsh in its prejudices, and more modest in its pretensions.

THE AGRICULTURAL LABOURER.

IT is related that in 1795 Mr. Curwen, member for Carlisle, being anxious to impress upon the House of Commons the inability of the labouring population to bear any further taxation, made his appearance in that assembly dressed as a Cumberland peasant, in a grey home-spun coat, with the wooden clogs or shoes of the country, bound with iron, carrying under one arm a brown "grouse," or loaf made of mixed barley and rye, and under the other arm a "whellmor," or skim-milk cheese. In his hand he held a "gully," or large knife, and placing the black loaf and the cheese on the table of the House, he cut into them with his knife, producing a sound which resembled, it is said, in the one case the clanking of cinders, and in the other the plaining of a deal board. Mr. Vernon Harcourt, who appears to be fond of getting up old parts, or Mr. Auberon Herbert, might perhaps make a hit by following Mr. Curwen's example, and pleading the cause of the agricultural labourer of our day in the garb of one of the Hughenden farm-servants as described by the Correspondent of a morning paper, in "a lengthy sloop, scarecrow billycock, and thick-soled highlows," slouching heavily, and scratching his head in a puzzled manner. In Buckinghamshire the labourer is, on the whole, better off than in many other parts of the country, and it is known that at Hughenden the lord of the manor takes a genuine and kindly interest in his welfare. Two or three years ago Mr. Disraeli delivered an eloquent address on the moral philosophy of tanks, porches, and ovens. Every cottage, he declared, ought to have a tank, a porch, and an oven; and, as far as his own estate is concerned, he has been as good as his word. In the neighbourhood, however, the Special Correspondent asserts that there are a number of villainous hovels, that the "truck" system is in force, that wages are only 11s. and 12s. a week, with deductions for wet weather, and that the prize labourer, to whom Mr. Disraeli once presented a guinea and a pair of breeches for exemplary conduct in bringing up a large family on little more than a shilling a day, is now in "Saunderton," as the Workhouse is locally designated. We have no doubt the Correspondent tells us honestly what he saw and heard; but his statements as to the condition of the labourer in other districts have been strongly impeached. The truth is that the eye of a Special Correspondent sees pretty much what it wants to see; and it is tolerably certain that a morbid passion for giving a rosy account of their circumstances is not the besetting weakness of agricultural labourers in Bucks or elsewhere. It appears, for example, that at Wellesbourne, where the Warwickshire strike originated, the weekly earnings were nearer 15s. than 12s., as had been alleged; and it is not improbable that the stories which the Correspondent brought back from Hughenden require to be corrected in a similar manner. Mr. Disraeli has confirmed his account of the disgraceful condition of certain cottages, but he explained that they are the speculation of a Radical shopkeeper on a piece of waste ground. After making every allowance for the loose statements of labourers, the exaggerations of agitators, and the misconceptions of Correspondents, it cannot be denied that the wages of agricultural labourers, which vary in different districts and even on different estates in the same district, are on an average miserably low in the Southern and Midland parts of England. It also appears that, for the moment at least, the strike has had the effect of raising wages by 2s. or 3s. a week; but it remains to be seen whether this rise will not be counterbalanced by a withdrawal of any extra payments or allowances in kind which have hitherto been customary.

The question of wages will ultimately be determined by the quality of the work which the men are capable of doing, the quantity of similar labour in the market, and the demand for it in this and other trades. Railway contractors and other large employers of labour are making tempting offers, but it is doubtful whether the employment offered will be permanent, and whether agricultural labourers are fit for it. It may perhaps be found that, as far as the general body of adult labourers are concerned, they are not promoting their own personal interests; that they cannot compete with the regular navvies; that they are unfit for industrial employment, and that they have not the habits of independence and self-restraint which are required for a town life. The better class of men may succeed, but the ruck will be swept aside. For the boys and younger men the change will possibly be the beginning of a higher and better existence than they could otherwise have hoped for. Hitherto farm labour has been organized like a caste. The labourer was born into a district within which he was practically confined, and to an occupation which was his because it had been his father's, and from which there was no escape. He was expected to marry early, and to have a numerous family; and although his own wages were reduced by the competition of his children, still the latter made him sure of a situation, and increased the total earnings of the household. And so it went on from generation to generation. The introduction of railways broke in upon the isolation of the agricultural communities; the spread of manufactures not only created a demand for all kinds of labour, but raised the value of agricultural produce, and the scale of agricultural profits and wages in and near the manufacturing districts. The reform of the law of pauper settlements also helped to set the labourer free. These are the influences which have been for some time silently and gradually at work, and the strike is rather an effect than a cause. On the whole we are disposed to believe that the labourers who receive such poor pay are, from a commercial point of view, paid rather more than they are worth. Professor Beesly, in his hatred of the solid classes who stand in the way of revolutionary projects, is in great glee because he thinks that the strike will bring down rents. As the farmers cannot afford to pay higher wages, the difference, he argues, must come out of the landlord's pocket. We are very sorry for Professor Beesly, but we believe the result is more likely to be the other way. In order to be able to pay better wages, the farmers must farm more skilfully and energetically, and in return for higher wages they will demand a superior kind of labour. The agriculture of at least the southern half of England is still comparatively backward. The condition of the labourer and the quality of his work are a proof of the incompetence of a large number of farmers; but when agriculture is carried on with the same enterprise and ability as other trades, rents and wages will equally improve.

With respect to food the labourers are not so badly off as is supposed. Except as regards milk, of which there is a diminished allowance, they have a more liberal supply of food than their fathers and grandfathers; and if butchers' meat is a rarity at their tables, they have at least a larger share of it than the peasantry of any other country, and even than the artisans and mechanics of most countries. At the same time, it would no doubt be for the advantage of the labourer that he should be paid in coin rather than in kind. Perquisites and allowances have a kindly sound, but they are apt to be only a species of "truck," by means of which the labourer is compelled to pay very dearly for indifferent or worthless articles. The Agricultural Commissioners of 1869 reported that in Dorset, for example, the system is much abused. The wheat given is poor or bad, and pays toll to the miller for grinding; the fuel is perhaps only gorse, or, if it is firewood, there is so much labour in searching, cutting, and grubbing that it does not pay to go after it. In Devon and Dorset the cider which is served out is often vile stuff; and the labourer is deprived of wages which should go to the support of his family by being compelled to receive a considerable part of them in rancid liquor. In Tiverton Union the ordinary allowance is, or used to be, half a gallon of cider a day, with perhaps as much again at haymaking and harvest. The beer allowed in other districts is valued at from one shilling to two shillings a week, but it cannot be seriously pretended that, as a rule, it is worth that price. The way in which the labourer is lodged is perhaps the most miserable circumstance in his condition. Of late years large sums have been devoted to the improvement of cottages without the slightest prospect of commercial advantage; but there can be no doubt that much remains to be done, and the epithets which were used by the Commissioners who inquired into agricultural employments a year or two since—such as "deplorable," "detestable," "a disgrace to a civilized community"—are not too strong to apply to the foul and leaky hovels, reeking with damp and fetid with over-crowding and with all kinds of nuisances, which are still to be found in melancholy abundance in almost every part of the country. It is easy to see that this is not as it should be; but it is not so easy to devise a quick and effectual remedy. The fact is, there are two sides to this as to most other questions. It is true that the labourer is degraded and brutalized by being lodged in this manner; but, on the other hand, it is his own character and habits which form one of the chief obstacles to the improvement of his dwelling. Human nature being what it is, it is not surprising that farmers and landlords should be indisposed to spend money in providing better cottages when the labourer is not only satisfied with the present ones, but prefers them to any others. He will not move if he can help it, and when he does move his first object is to make the new cottage just what the old one was. He detests being clean and tidy, he loves warmth and hates ventilation, he packs himself and his family into the smallest possible space, and even the most stringent regulations and the sharpest supervision will hardly prevent him from taking lodgers or smuggling in a pig. The old law of settlement had much to do with the insufficiency of cottages, because it made it an object to keep labourers out of a parish, so that they should not acquire a settlement and become a burden on the rates. This has been amended, but an Act which was passed for the express purpose of promoting the building of cottages still tends to encourage the old evil of keeping the labourer at a distance from his work, inasmuch as it authorises the Public Works Loan Commissioners to advance money for the erection of cottages only in "populous places." Assistance is thus denied to a landlord who desires to build cottages on his own farms. Many landowners have built cottages from a sense of duty; others would like to do so, but have not the means; others are discouraged by the difficulty of reconciling the labourers to sanitary requirements and the decencies of life. We do not say that the labourers are to blame for this, or that their case is hopeless; but we are quite sure that no good will be done unless all the difficulties of the case are fairly recognized. It is desirable that the labourer should have higher wages and a better house; but the mere raising of wages or building of cottages as a benevolent enterprise will go only a small way towards solving the serious and complicated problem of raising his condition. A landlord has written to the Times to say that, if the labourer "were really anxious to raise himself in the social scale, he would long ago have set about his task by saving, or trying to save, in his youth and middle life a sufficient sum to secure him from what he considers the degradation of the work-house in his old age"; that he would have increased his "intellectual attainments" and given his children a good education. If the labourer had been a being capable of appreciating these advantages so as to make them an object in life, he would be very different from what he is, and there would be no need to consider what should be done for him. It has been the melancholy fact of his condition that hitherto he has not considered the work-house a degradation; and that he has been satisfied with the appeasement of animal wants. In such a case discontent is a healthy and hopeful symptom.

A BERNONDESEY BOUQUET.

MR. DAVID URQUHART, in one of his books, has predicted the ruin of his country if it persisted in eating three meat meals a day, and wasted its phosphorus in the rivers. Mr. Urquhart will perhaps take a more hopeful view of the destinies of England when he learns that the consumption of meat has been by no means so universal as he supposed, and that the high price to which it is now rising bids fair to make it a luxury of the upper classes; and also that a more profitable method has been discovered of turning our phosphates to account than draining them into the sea. It appears from a case which has just been tried that a gentleman, who was described by his counsel as a public benefactor, has for some years been carrying on a manufactory at Bermondsey in which he converts different kinds of filth and garbage into manure; with one hand he relieves the city of its refuse, with the other he supplies the country with a fertilizing substance of acknowledged value. Public benefactors, like prophets, are not always appreciated in their own neighbourhoods; and although the philanthropist of whom we are speaking finds a ready sale for his superphosphates in agricultural circles, he has not yet had a statue erected in his honour by the people among whom he lives. On the contrary, he has been the victim of a series of actions at law. The explanation of this is that the commodities in which he deals are said to be composed of old bones, rotten fish, the blood and offal of animals in a putrid state, and a variety of other articles of a similar kind, which are burnt up by vitriol, and which make "a very excellent manure, but it has a very horrible smell." It must have occurred to any one who has visited Bermondsey, or who has passed over its housetops in the train, that the inhabitants of this region are not likely to be morbidly sensitive or delicate in regard to smells. The whiffs that sometimes come through the windows of the railway carriage are not perhaps the best preparation for the whitebait dinner to which the traveller may possibly be journeying. Bermondsey is a highly perfumed region, but its perfumes are not "Sabean odours from the spicy shore of Araby the blest." The local flavour is, on the whole, more akin to that of Cologne, except that the different smells are not so numerous and well defined, but are rather of a blended character, the not unwholesome fragrance of tan being perhaps uppermost. It is certain, at any rate, that the people of that part of London are not very particular in regard to bad odours, and that they can stand a good deal in this way without grumbling, and possibly even—for use in such a case is second nature—without perceiving or being distressed by it. We should be prepared therefore to believe that when they rise up in protest against a bad smell it must be very bad indeed. It appears that the inhabitants of Bermondsey draw the line at Mr. Salmon's superphosphates and other artificial manures. The smell of these things is more than they can endure, and when we read the evidence on the subject we can hardly wonder at the resistance of the neighbourhood to the continuance of this manufacture.

The nuisance is alleged to be of a twofold, or rather threefold, character. First, there is the accumulation of the materials of the manufacture, which are mostly rotten and foul-smelling; next, there is the process of mixing and boiling them down with sulphuric acid; and then, after the manure has been manufactured, it is kept in great heaps, and an abominable smell is caused when it is dug up, and put into sacks for customers. It is asserted that the materials consist of the blood and refuse of slaughter-houses, stinking fish, putrid animal matter, and garbage of all sorts; and there is always a large stock of these things lying about the premises, while new supplies are frequently arriving. On "mixing days"—that is, days on which the materials are boiled down—there is said to be an escape of pestiferous gases, and a kind of heavy steam, which leaves mould where it falls, and is accompanied by an acrid sensation in the mouth and throat. "The fumes of the process," said the Inspector of Nuisances, "are particularly disgusting, and pervade the streets and gardens; but the smell is worse in digging out the putrid mass, and putting it in bags, and taking it away." The premises of Messrs. Peek and Frean, the biscuit-bakers, adjoin the manufactory, and their workpeople, several hundreds in number, as well as other residents in the neighbourhood, suffer from the stench, which produces nausea, a burning in the throat, and other discomforts. Different kinds of manure are made, and some are less pestiferous than others. The worst smell is alleged by discriminating judges to be that given off by the superphosphate, which is made by pouring vitriol on the materials, the effect being "to raise a kind of white steam with a strong and pungent odour, smelling like lighted sulphur or brimstone, and catching the breath so as to cause the men at work to cough, and force them to cover their mouths with handkerchiefs." It was pleaded by the defence that there were "only three or four mixings" of this kind in a month; but for people with moderate tastes in the way of asphyxiation it is more than can be agreeable to be subjected to this steaming once a week. Then there is "a pig and horse hair sort," the smell of which is also said to be very bad. In fact the whole description of the place, as given by the witnesses for the plaintiff, reminds one strongly of the "Sink of Filth" which Dante visited in the infernal regions, and in which all kinds of excrement and putrescent nastiness were gathered together to torment the noses of the wicked. Here, as one of the translators puts it—

Here we perceived a race who murmured low
In the foul gulf, and snorted with the nose.

It is probable that Dante, who lived in a pre-sanitary age, and in a country which even now is far from particular as to smells, would be startled to hear it said that the abominations which he imagined to be appropriate in a fanciful and highly coloured sketch of hell are now reproduced on earth in the densely populated capital of a country which is under the impression that it is civilized, and which is supposed to have taken for its motto Sanctus sanctus, omnia omnia.

It is perhaps not difficult to understand the reluctance of the jury to visit Mr. Salmon's place of business, as they were advised to do by the Lord Chief Justice; but at last they were persuaded to go. When a medical witness called the smell ammoniacal, the Chief Justice suggested that perhaps demure would be nearer the mark. His lordship also observed that on his visit he was shocked at the horrible smells which proceeded from Rotherhithe, the parish which adjoins Bermondsey. Such atrocious stenches were, he said, a scandal to the sanitary condition of the country; and he asked, not unnaturally, what was the use of Boards of Health and Inspectors of Nuisances if such abominable nuisances were allowed? Dr. Letheby, who is a Sanitary Inspector, appeared as a witness for the defence in this case. Dr. Letheby does not consider carbonic acid gas at all offensive; he had, indeed, "recognized" the effluvia from the manufactory, but he could not say that it amounted to a nuisance. In his opinion it was only "a slight annoyance." Dr. Letheby is a practical chemist, and spends a great deal of time among bad smells, but perhaps it might be considered desirable that a Sanitary Inspector should be more sensitive to the evils which afflict ordinary mortals. When the case commenced, the counsel for the plaintiff offered evidence as to the effects of the nuisance on the health of people in the neighbourhood; but the Chief Justice decided that it was not necessary that the nuisance should be injurious to health; it was enough to show that it destroyed the comfort of the inhabitants. Soon afterwards the jury interfered to say that they had no doubt there was a shocking bad smell, and the only question was whence it came. And, at a subsequent stage, the jury intimated that they had heard sufficient evidence from the plaintiffs on this point, and the defendant was called upon to produce his case. His argument was in effect that he had, since 1868, when a judgment was given against him, made various improvements in his processes, by which the bad smells were prevented; that the materials of the manufacture were by no means so bad as had been represented; and that moreover he had established himself at Bermondsey ten years ago, when it was comparatively open country, and that if people did not like his smells, they should not have come there. The people, he contended, had come to the nuisance, if it was a nuisance, not the nuisance to them. Upon this the Lord Chief Justice remarked that he could not allow that any neighbourhood was to be considered as given up to nuisances. "It was not to be endured that because people had the misfortune to live in a neighbourhood not over nice, and were in a humble position of life, therefore their existence was to be made wretched by the effluvia of foul materials brought to the place by some person for his own profit and advantage." One of the jury asked Mr. Salmon, junior, whether he thought the smell at a certain place offensive; and the witness answered that he did not, upon which the juror lifted up his hands, and the Lord Chief Justice observed, that he did not wonder at the juror's surprise, for the smell actually took one's breath away. De gustibus non disputandum, when there is a question as to the fragrance of manure between the person who manufactures it and the neighbours who have to inhale the odour. The jury, while holding that there was a nuisance, seem to have differed as to which of the materials produced it, and they exonerated the superphosphate of lime, on the offensiveness of which the plaintiffs had insisted most strongly. The Chief Justice accepted their verdict as one of guilty, and sentenced the defendant to a fine of 100*l.* unless he put his place in order before next Term. It will occur to every one that, if there is really a nuisance of this magnitude at Bermondsey, there should be some simpler and more summary process of dealing with it than an expensive prosecution. We can only echo the Lord Chief Justice's question, and ask what are the Inspectors of Nuisances about, and what has been done or is to be done with regard to the "atrocious stenches" at Rotherhithe? It is to be hoped that the Public Health Bill will stimulate the energies of the authorities in this respect.

ENGLISH CIVIL WARS.

IT is an old complaint that history is made up of crimes, and the complaint is so true that it draws near to the nature of falsehood. The proper answer to it doubtless is that, in this imperfect world, good is chiefly shown in its antagonism to evil, and that, where we have the richest crop of crimes, we have also the chance of finding the richest crop of virtues. Where there are no oppressors there can be no deliverers; where there are no enemies to withstand there can be no heroes or martyrs. If everybody else had been as good as St. Louis, St. Louis could not have been so good as he was. In such an angelic community his virtues must have been mainly passive; he would have had few or no temptations to strive against; the occasions for doing most of his best deeds would never have happened. And again, it by no means follows that those portions of history which stand out before us as fullest of crimes were really the times of the greatest wickedness or the greatest unhappiness. A desolating war or revolution stands out before us in all its native ugliness; yet we may doubt whether any war or revolution inflicts so much suffering, or does so much to corrupt and degrade a people, as some of those long periods of dull, grinding oppression which go on year after year, generation after generation, without leaving any particular mark behind them. A war or a revolution, if it gives special opportunity for great crimes, also gives special opportunity for great virtues; while there are times when men seem so utterly smothered by a long and wearing misgovernment as to be unable to do anything great in the way either of good or of evil. The wars of religion in France were bad enough, but it would have been better to live in times which at any rate were alive than to have dragged on our being through the long and dreary deadness of Spanish misgovernment in Italy. It is only when we come to the Thirty Years' War that we begin to doubt whether quiet, however gained, is not better than an endless state of war and tumults. In our own country we have had three great times of civil war, and two of the three are undoubtedly times to which we look back, and rightly, with feelings of national pride. The civil wars of the thirteenth and of the seventeenth centuries stand out among the most brilliant periods in English history, and we may fairly say that they combine an unusually large share of the good side of national commotions with an unusually small share of the evil. It is possible to sympathize with both sides, at all events with particular men on both sides. One reason is that, though the appeal to arms on the popular side was in both cases thoroughly justified, yet it was not called forth by any particularly monstrous oppression. It is quite certain that there were parts of the world both in the thirteenth and in the seventeenth century where the misgovernment of Henry the Third or of Charles the First would have seemed exceptionally good government. It shows how much higher the English standard in these matters was at any given time, as compared with that of most other nations, that our forefathers thought it worth while to draw the sword in either case. The earlier part of the thirteenth century is indeed somewhat different. King John and his Brabançons were positive evils in the land of a different kind from anything that went on under either Henry or Charles. Neither Henry nor Charles was a vulgar oppressor. Henry the Third, in truth, we cannot call in his own person an oppressor at all. In his personal character he was a most respectable gentleman, only he let his kingdom go to utter ruin, because he could not bear to say No to his wife or his mother. Charles we may with more reason call an oppressor, but he was not a wanton oppressor. He was a despot on principle. Such a despot is politically far more dangerous than a mere vulgar tyrant, but his position is not inconsistent with much that entitles him to personal respect. Both these great struggles—that of the thirteenth and that of the seventeenth century—drew a certain elevation of character from the circumstances out of which they rose. The men who fought on the popular side were not like men who are goaded into revolt by mere brutal oppression, and are therefore tempted to repay in kind what they have themselves undergone. They were men fighting for a principle, for the old Constitution and laws of England, and on the whole they bore themselves in both cases in a manner worthy of the cause in which they rose. And, on the other hand, something of the same elevation of character was shared also by their adversaries. The Royalists of the days both of Charles and of Henry were fighting on what we hold to be the wrong side, but they were not in either case fighting for a mere tyranny which it was plain at the first blush that they ought to have been ashamed to support. From one point of view we may be sorry to see good men on both sides coming together to take away one another's lives. But it is really honourable to the national character that, when great national struggles could not be avoided, they should have been of such a kind that good men could be found on both sides. In an ideal state of things, Hampden and Falkland ought never to have been arrayed against each other; but it is something, as things actually were, to have a Hampden and a Falkland to array against each other. And in the earlier struggle, if we weep for the overthrow of Simon the Righteous, it is something that it was by the hand of the great Edward that he was overthrown.

Our third great period of civil war, the struggle which comes in point of time between the days of Evesham and the days of Naseby, is a less satisfactory spectacle than either the earlier or the later time with which it has to be compared. The thirteenth and the seventeenth centuries are eminently attractive portions of our history; the fifteenth, in its internal aspect, is certainly somewhat repulsive. It is not so easy to get up an interest in the Wars of the Roses as in either of the other two great struggles. The ugly features of civil strife come out into special prominence. A war in which fellow-countrymen butcher one another is not in any case an agreeable sight; and it becomes still less agreeable when fellow-countrymen butcher one another, as it would seem at first sight, absolutely without any cause. The civil wars of the thirteenth century and the civil wars of the seventeenth are both perfectly intelligible. There is no doubt as to what the combatants were fighting for on either side. But the civil wars of the fifteenth century are by no means equally clear. Our first impression is that men were fighting out of mere blind attachment to personal leaders, or perhaps that they were fighting without any intelligible reason whatever, out of sheer love of giving and taking blows. The name by which the struggle is commonly known is significant. The other two have political names; they are the Barons' War, and the Parliamentary War—names with the former of which we may perhaps feel inclined to quarrel. The name of the Barons' War sounds as if it had been a struggle for aristocratic dominion, instead of a struggle in which the Barons simply acted as the first rank of the people. Still names like the Barons' War, the Parliamentary War, set forth well enough the political nature of the struggle, a struggle between a Government and the nation. But the war of the fifteenth century has no political name; it is called not after parties or classes in the State, but after the accidental badges of the particular families. It is the War of the Roses; and it might seem at first sight that it really was little more than a strife about a white and a red rose, a dispute in fact about the colour of a shield, a dispute such as the dispute between blue and yellow still is to a good many who shout on either side. But we may be quite sure that in a country which had made such advances in civilized and political life as England had made in the fifteenth century, men did not go out to kill one another without some better reasons than these. The issue was by no means so simple in the fifteenth century as it was in the thirteenth or in the seventeenth. In the seventeenth century, though the political right and wrong of the case is plain, yet we have sympathies which pull us both ways; at all events, we can understand why good and wise men were to be found on both sides. The difficulty then was that there was so much to be said on both sides. In the fifteenth century the difficulty rather is that there was so little to be said on either side. Or it might be put that there was a good deal to be said on both sides, but that the case on both sides alike was confused and inconsistent. The formal claim of the House of York rested on the dullest and most slavish doctrine of hereditary right. That doctrine, as it was put forth by them, took a form yet duller and more slavish than it took in the mouths of the Jacobites. The Stuart pretenders were at least the male heirs of former Kings; the elder of the two was what our fathers would have deemed a true Atheling, the born son of a crowned King. The strictly family sentiment could therefore gather round them in a way in which it could not gather round pretenders whose claim rested on an intricate pedigree of female succession. The houses of Lancaster and York both came of the direct male stock of Edward the Third, and, according to male descent, York came of a younger branch than Lancaster. But, by a diligent reckoning of great-grandmothers, York could make itself out to be in the female line the representative of an elder branch than Lancaster. On the strength of such an hereditary claim as this, men were called on to brand as a dynasty of usurpers a dynasty which had reigned for three generations by a thoroughly good Parliamentary title. Yet, notwithstanding the monstrous nature of the Yorkist claim, it is not hard to see that there was practically a good deal to be said on the Yorkist side. It is plain that the dead conservatism of the country was on the side of Lancaster, and that the advancing elements were for the moment on the side of York. It is not equally plain that the permanent interests of the country were on the Yorkist side. When we get to Edward the Fourth we feel as if we were somehow getting into the region of Louis the Eleventh and Ferdinand of Aragon. When Lord Lytton called his novel Last of the Barons, he did not hit on the most appropriate description of the personal Richard Earl of Warwick. But the title well enough expresses the change which came in with the accession of the house of York. Henry the Eighth was through his mother the grandson of Edward the Fourth; with the blood of Henry the Fifth he had nothing to do in any way. But, when Richard Duke of York first put forth his claim to the crown, all this could not be foreseen. The country at large most likely did not trouble itself very much about the different stages of his pedigree; the plain fact stood out that the country had been shamefully mismanaged by Margaret of Anjou and her favourites, and that Duke Richard, a man of winning and popular character, and the best statesman and soldier that England then had, seemed likely to manage things much better. It was, in short, a strife which, like the other two, arose out of the actual misgovernment of the time, but it assumed a lower character than either of the others, from its taking the form of a dispute between two competitors for the Crown. The particular crimes of Margaret and her favourites were greater than anything that could be laid to the charge of either Henry the Third or Charles the First. The cry for redress of grievances was as just in the fifteenth century as it was in the thirteenth or seventeenth; but when that cry was mixed up with the claims of a particular family to the Crown, it lost its real national character and soon sank into a mere personal and family dispute. And, as is sure to happen, men showed themselves far more bloody, far more merciless, in the war of a disputed succession, than they showed themselves in either of the wars which were waged for right and freedom. It was well for the men who were the leaders of England at the earlier and at the later time that they lay under no temptations to put themselves in the place of their country. The strife of the seventeenth century did not put on anything of a personal character till the main dispute was settled. The war of the fifteenth century had a personal character from the beginning, and when Duke Richard was dead, it became on both sides a mere merciless butchery, a mere sacrifice to personal ambition.

If we turn from the purely domestic character of the English Civil Wars to their aspect when looked at as parts of general European history, the lower position of the struggle of the fifteenth century, as compared with that of either the earlier or the later time, stands out still more clearly. The shaping of the English Constitution into its existing form was the great contribution of England to that work of universal creation and destruction which the thirteenth century carried on through all Europe and civilized Asia. That century was the time when old powers fell and when new powers arose—the time when the Eastern and the Western Empires, the Eastern and the Western Church, the Eastern and the Western Caliphates, all put on forms which made them, for greater strength or for greater weakness, something utterly unlike what they had been before. It was the time when the chief nationalities of Europe became more distinctly marked, when languages assumed something like their present form, when States assumed something like their present boundaries. The changes which were the result of the English civil wars of that age, the changes which distinguish the England of Edward the First from the England of John, were the same which England bore in the great work which was going on throughout the world. In the seventeenth century the connexion between English affairs and those of other nations is less obvious, but is none the less real. The direct connexion between our civil war and the great struggle on the Continent is manifest; but there is something more than this. The war of the seventeenth century was a war waged in order to keep what the war of the thirteenth century had given us. It was a war waged to save the last of these free Constitutions which had once been common to all the kingdoms of Western Europe. In France and in Spain the old institutions had vanished; in England they still went on. It rested with England whether the fire of freedom should still go on burning on one spot, ready, when the time came, to be handed on once more to other lands. Had Charles established his despotism in England, as his brethren in France and Spain had established theirs, the one coal that was left would have been quenched; the hearth of the Pyreanion of Europe would have become cold. In this way the English civil war of the seventeenth century was a struggle not only for English, but for European interests. The common welfare of mankind was at stake.

No such wider interests as these belong to the Wars of the Roses. Great events were going on in other lands, but the civil war of England had no reference to them. The generation which fought for York and Lancaster was the generation which beheld the final overthrow of the Empire of the East, which beheld the stamping out of the last hopes of Lombard freedom, and which, on the other hand, in the growth of the Burgundy of the Valois Dukes, beheld the best chance of carrying out the hopes of a thousand years by fixing a lasting barrier between Germany and France. With the progress of these events, Englishmen, busy in tearing one another in pieces within their own four seas, had little or nothing to do. No doubt the ill success of the English arms in France had much to do with awakening that spirit of discontent without which Duke Richard would have had but little chance of pressing his claims. And at a later time Charles of Burgundy had a certain amount of influence on the affairs of the island of whose Royal house he deemed himself a member. But to the general European character of either the earlier or the later struggle the civil war of the fifteenth century can make no claim. It is a time which, when looked at carefully, has its interest, but on the whole there is no portion of our English history on which we can look back with less satisfaction.

SOCIAL LIFE IN SPIRIT LAND.

THE Spiritualists are advancing. And why not? In an age of progress it might fairly be expected that folks who profess to hold intercourse with beings of another world would not long rest contented with such puerilities as the knocking about of chairs, tables, and crockery, the abstraction of pocket-handkerchiefs, the pressing of hands in the dark, and other mild imitations of some not very clever wizard. Accordingly there are now many favoured mediums whose pens and pencils, guided by spirit hands, portray and describe what is going on in the land of shadows, and give us detailed information concerning life and manners in spirit land. Shakespeare, poor man! talked of "the undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller returns," but this oft-quoted phrase has now lost all the mysterious grandeur which formerly invested it. Travellers are returning every day, and travellers of no mean order too. Not to mention King Solomon, the Emperor Napoleon I., Socrates (who, by the way, has learned Hebrew since he left this nether world), St. Augustine, Joan of Arc, and many others, whose visits have been detailed from time to time in the Spiritual Magazine, there has lately been a great incursion of distinguished artists and literary men; and from information received from them (see Human Nature for March 1, 1872) and from other spirits of less notoriety but of equal veracity, we are enabled to lay before our readers a slight account of how they manage things in the "brighter land." Naturally their arrangements are a great improvement upon our own. In the first place, the climate is charming—perpetual summer, no rain, no cold, no untimely frost. Consequently the houses—for they have houses up there—are made without doors and windows. In a general way we are told that things are much the same as with us, except that everything is better, and certainly a vast deal surer. The dress and jewellery are something remarkable. Wordsworth was not so much out when he spoke of "a spirit yet a woman too," for these spirits betray a truly feminine delight in pretty clothes and "sweet" furniture. That science should advance may not be matter for astonishment, nor is it so wonderful that the fine arts should flourish; but it will no doubt surprise some readers to hear of gardening and rural avocations going on, and babies and distaffs driving thriving trades. For ourselves nothing amuses us like the advance in upholstery. To give an example of this we will quote from Glimpses of a Brighter Land, an elaborately got-up little volume lately published by Messrs. Baillière, Tindall, and Cox, a description of one of the "mansions" to which a spirit is conducted soon after leaving its earthly home:—

This hall was in stripes of white and blue, the white the dominating the blue like lapis-lazuli. The carpet was formed of large circles of blue and white, and curtains of brilliant blue, looped back with pearls, hung in festoons at each opening. We then entered one of the apartments. It was in pale blue like the turquoise, and lovely graceful curtains of white lace softly shrouded the openings or windows, all around were soft and comfortable couches, formed of mother of pearl, and covered with blue silk. The flooring was of inlaid woods—I fancied of sandal-wood—with curious devices in panel to match the furniture; in the centre was a carpet—It appeared to me like moss—with flowers sprinkled over it, blue forget-me-nots, or angel's eyes, interspersed with hare-bells. We then passed on over the soft and velvety carpet to another room. How shall I describe all the varied beauties? It was a dark rich crimson, shaded from black up to shell-pink; the festoons of the hangings were caught up in rings of pearls, and thence depended a large ruy; nothing more graceful or splendid can be imagined. We again passed into another room. Here all was soft, lovely, shining white; the walls were covered with silk caught up in festoons, and in the centre of each was a diamond star with a ruby heart depending from it. The carpet was of white also; from each corner came points of deep shaded crimson, uniting in the centre with a silver dove. The furniture was all in fretted or filigree silver, and of the most graceful devices.

In another place a spirit, after describing a charming apartment, says, "This was my bedroom." We had not realized the necessity for luxurious couches and bedchambers in the other world, nor had we expected to hear of "delicious fruits, bread, and cakes, with wine and odorous drinks in goblets of varied hues and shapes!" One does not connect the notion of a gourmet with the spiritual existence; but then that only shows one's ignorance; it is evident that it is quite possible to have what our American cousins call "a good time" in spirit land. As for dress, the robes increase in beauty and splendour as the spirit rises in the scale; the better it is, the finer its jewellery. From the volume before quoted we take the following description of a really fascinating female spirit, and commend it as an improvement upon the toilets of Le Follet:—

Her long hair curled around her and fell in a profusion of fair shining masses to her waist; her dress was of a soft gauze-like texture, bordered with blue, confined at the waist with a golden band, and one large single pearl; a circlet of gold also bound her hair, and in the centre shone a large ruby. Behind her ears I perceived a spray of rubies like a leaf; her dress flowed to her feet in graceful folds, and open sleeves disclosed her lovely white rounded arms.

The educational establishments adopt the fashion of a livery; infant schools affect cheerful pink, while older children are clad in white; young maidens wear white too, but with the addition of pearl bracelets and girdles with circlets to confine the hair. There is a most touching account of the introduction to one of these seminaries (apparently in the capacity of pupil-teacher) of a young spirit, who is invited by the matron to "partake of some refreshment," during which time the children, who on the entrance of a visitor had been enjoined to keep silence, are sent to play in the garden. Older spirits, "who have known affection upon earth," are robed in cerulean blue, while very advanced ones indeed come out in crimson. Green is quite at a discount; it is an earthly colour, and may therefore fairly be left to its Fenian admirers. Horses, cows, and other cattle animate the landscape, and the rippling streams teem with fish. Spirits pay visits to their friends in their various mansions, and hold little reunions, which they seem greatly to enjoy; and they even make little excursions to other "spheres," and sometimes to less favoured regions, where they assist poor spirits who are in trouble to try to become better and to gain a higher place in the spiritual system. As to their means of locomotion, this is sometimes accomplished by mere volition, but at other times they avail themselves of "chariots drawn by milk-white horses," or of very pretty boats with silver seats, crimson cushions, and silver oars and masts. But the reader must not suppose that spirits spend their lives in amusing themselves. They carry on with increased facility and under new conditions the very same occupations, professions, and trades which they learned in this lower world; and they are often sent down here to assist favoured mortals in the prosecution of their tasks. Hence those who have not spirit friends are at an immense disadvantage, and those who have may confidently reckon on a delightful reduction in their carpenter's, doctor's, and even lawyer's bills. Undertakers, too, are known to come back and visit their friends; but we have not yet heard whether they have set any new fashion in funerals. The number of Human Nature, an "Educational and Family Magazine," before quoted, contains an account of a youthful medium, Master Charles Swan, the nephew of Mr. Thomas Wilson, ironmonger, of Markot Square, Aylesbury, who is visited night after night by quite a bevy of invaluable spirits—literary, artistic, medical, and mechanical—who paint pictures, frame, and hang them, write scientific manuscripts, cure the gout, the toothache, and other ills that flesh is heir to, and enliven their operations by simultaneous performances on the concertina and the tin-whistle. The spirits have been good enough to sign their names on request, and a fac-simile of the signatures is published. Besides John Wilson the carpenter, Mary Wilson the writing spirit, William Wilson the doctor, and William Angus the undertaker, who have appended to their names emblems such as a long quill pen, a bottle labelled "poison," a hammer and plane, and a coffin, we find such well-known names as Wm. E. Channing, J. Wedgwood, Robt. Hare, F. Jos. Gull, Isaac Newton, and Cuvier; as well as Vandyck, Reynolds, Hogarth, Turner, and Eastlake. Lorenzo di Credi is another artist who, in conjunction with Eastlake, has produced several paintings of the inhabitants of Jupiter, Mars, Venus, Mercury, and Saturn; which portraits are, we are told, described at great length.

"A visit to the medium" shall be given in the exact words of the magazine:—

We visited Mr. Wilson during the early part of last month, and saw his collection. The sitting-room is literally smothered with drawings and paintings in various styles, handsomely framed in massive frames, and hung upon the walls in a very peculiar manner. This work has all been done by the boy while in the trance, and while the door has been locked upon him. Some of the paintings are large; Turner's "Childe Harold" being four feet by two feet four; and no single person would like to undertake the task of hanging them unassisted. A painting of the human foot hangs horizontally close to the ceiling, ten feet high, and without any steps to reach it, except the furniture of the room. It is supposed to have been painted in that position, as it occupied several nights, and was seen in various stages, from day to day, in the same place on the ceiling. Some of the paintings are very striking, indicating great power of conception, though the treatment cannot be expected to be of the highest order.

The italics here are our own; why should the treatment not be of the highest order when such distinguished painters are engaged upon the subjects? The writer goes on to say:—

At nine o'clock in the evening the medium puts on his painting costume, and prepares himself for the trance. We saw him entranced on our visit. He simply sits down in a chair before the easel, and leans his head back on a cushion which is supported from behind. Mr. Wilson then places both his hands upon the medium's head, and with a few convulsive twitches he becomes at once unconscious. He cannot paint while strangers are present, and even not well in Mr. Wilson's presence, although he has seen the work going on. He can even write with difficulty while there is any stranger in the room. He wrote a few short sentences, one of which was to request us to leave the room.

In a letter of Mr. Wilson's, which is given in the same magazine, a little further on, he says that in all probability the spirits could take Charley out of the trance without his aid, but they have never yet done so.

Since there is no limit to the gullibility of a certain class of persons, these spirit drawings may probably prove a very paying transaction, especially as Mr. Wilson states that he was offered 5*l.* for a sketch of a lady's hand by Vandyck, executed in twelve and a half minutes; and if it amuses people to believe in this kind of thing, and to pay for their whistle, there can be no objection to their amusing themselves so long as they do not annoy any one else. King Solomon, St. Augustine, Joan of Arc, Socrates, and the First Napoleon are historical characters, and therefore public property. Sir Isaac Newton, Vandyck, and Lorenzo di Credi have passed away long enough to preclude the fear that the mention of their names in connexion with a farce of this kind should give pain to any one. But when it comes to those who so lately walked among us as Turner and Sir Charles Eastlake, really something should be done to prevent such unjustifiable liberties being taken with their names. If mediums have no sense of decency, they should at least be restrained from mixing up private families in their performances without express permission. In the list of spirits who nightly favour Charles Swan with their presence an undertaker is made to appear, and as it is distinctly stated in some works on Spiritualism that spirits work at their former trades, a very curious question here arises, What scope can there be for an undertaker? Or do spirits, before leaving one sphere for ever, get up a ceremonial analogous to those lugubrious ones in which earthly natures seem to rejoice? Or perhaps they make coffins as a penance for sins previously committed, like the poor Spaniard Nuñez, who is represented (in Glimpses of a Brighter Land) as being obliged to do odds and ends of work to help other people—a thing he excessively dislikes—because during his abode on earth he spent his time in dancing, singing, and playing the guitar. We must not fail to remind our readers that mortals are warned to be very careful what spirits they associate with; and the warning would seem to be necessary, as some of them, especially lawyers and millionaires, smell so strongly of brimstone that they render the apartments they visit quite unbearable. We are consoled, however, by learning that there has been a council of spirits appointed to watch over séances, and prevent any evil results ensuing from the presence of these deputations from lower regions; and also that they are to meet and consult as to the course to be pursued in order "to help mortality to become purer." We should like hereafter to know what success they meet with, but we may be permitted to question whether such an end is to be attained by describing a sensual paradise beyond the grave. As there are no fewer than eight periodicals specially devoted to Spiritualism, it is quite clear that there must be readers to keep them up; and besides these there are a constantly increasing number of books on the same subject. We almost feel as if we owed our readers an apology for reproducing such a mass of dull nonsense; but it is well sometimes to see to what depths human stupidity is capable of descending.

THE ADMIRALTY AND LIFEBOATS.

THE Royal National Lifeboat Institution held its annual meeting on Monday last, and its Report may on the whole be regarded as highly satisfactory. It appears that the past year had been marked by no exceptional disasters; that the apparatus of the Society had saved 31 vessels and 658 lives; that in one brief period of sixteen days, during the violent gales of last December, 146 persons had been rescued; that on our coasts and in the Channel Isles the Society has now no fewer than 233 boats; that eighteen new ones have been provided during the year; and, finally, that the receipts for the same period have amounted to 28,140*l.* To superficial thinkers all this, so far as it goes, must seem matter for unmix'd congratulation. They will say that we have here an admirable institution, nobly advertising itself by the excellent work it does, and vindicating its claims to the support it receives; that the only thing to be desired is the steady growth of its resources, until it shall have established an absolute luxury of security against the dangers of our seas. We are far from saying that the superficial thinkers are not right. We are sure they represent those feelings of philanthropy which are inculcated alike by our religion and by the better feelings of our nature, and we are persuaded that they represent the general sense of the community. Yet apparently there are men among us who think very differently, while their official station entitles their opinion to attention, if not to respect. They are advanced thinkers of course, and hold views in political economy which are original and audacious, if not enlightened. Moreover what constrains us to give their ideas consideration, whatever our own views may be, is what we must regard as the unfortunate circumstance that they have it in their power to test theory by practice. For, little as we should look for advanced thought, originality, or audacity of conception in the Admiralty Board-room, it is, in fact, the Board of Admiralty that represents the select school we speak of. True, something of the traditional timorousness still clings to them, and they compensate for what the French would call the frank cynicism of their thoroughgoing experiments by the official reticence they observe. But occasionally circumstances over which they have no control become blunderingly indiscreet and betray them, and an accident like that on board the Ariadne discloses that the Admiralty has a repugnance to lifeboats. As we have observed, they do not say as much. They leave us to construe the line of argument that influences them by reference to their action. But we venture to submit that the only plausible explanation of their attitude is this. In an overstocked country like our own, human life becomes a drug, if not a nuisance, and death by violence thins the redundant population more economically than deportation; therefore, says the Admiralty, let us discourage the precautions which diminish violent deaths. We are willing to admit that there is something in the idea, but we fear it will be found that it must invariably break down in the application. For it is precisely those whom we can least afford to spare who fall the victims of Government negligence. If the Admiralty could load a few Megæras with rickety paupers and ship them for the South Seas in the hurricane season, if they could set convicts to work saving human life in a heavy gale with tackle sure to jam and boats likely to upset, then they might deserve well of the ratepayers. But they should recollect that an able seaman is a costly product of civilization, and one somewhat difficult to come by. We could better spare the sturdy miners who are choked or burnt alive in the mines which the Government inspector runs round once in a twelvemonth. Any hale man can wield a pickaxe, and as the wages are good and provided by private enterprise, the sufferers will be replaced at the cost of an inappreciable increase in the price of coal. But, with all his proverbial recklessness, the seaman is likely to object to being disposed of by a happy despatch, and may look shyly on a service which ostentatiously offers him a short life, if not a merry one. We greatly question whether we should keep up our Naval Reserves if "walking the plank" were made one of the exercises in the service; and yet that is the system we adopt in a modified form.

If any readers fancy that we exaggerate in saying this, we have only to refer them to the debate raised the other evening by Mr. Douverie. Generally speaking, we have occasion to admire the singular adroitness of officials when driven to stand on their defence. It must be owing, we presume, to excellent prompting by permanent officials versed in the practice of special pleading, and trained in an office that is perpetually being incriminated. Assuredly no department can have enjoyed opportunities of this sort in the same measure as the Admiralty, for it is habitually indicted on evidence which is apparently damning. Yet in this instance its representatives in the House were driven to confess to an almost absolute disregard for the lives of their men, for their promises of reformation for the future were tantamount to admission of culpability in the past. The comic, of course, rubs shoulders with the tragic. Nothing could be graver than the charge brought against them; it amounted to one of wholesale manslaughter, aggravated by breach of trust; to a reckless disregard of the lives taken under their special charge, and disposed of by their orders. They did not even attempt to deny that the Ariadne, and many other ships, were unprovided with lifeboats. But if nothing could be more serious than the charge, nothing could possibly be more grotesquely ludicrous than the position on which they fell back while beating a retreat. No lifeboats! Why, so thoroughly were we impressed with the necessity for lifeboats that we built a quantity of them so far back as 1865, and when we had them, we stored them most carefully out of the way. We even went so far as to let it be understood that any captain might have them on application. Under the circumstances, we could hardly do more; for although undoubtedly the matter concerned the lives of the men, it was also a question of the professional fancies of the captain. We feared that captains might feel aggrieved were it made compulsory to carry lifeboats. We knew that they objected to them as ugly, cumbrous things that spoiled the "smartness" of a crack ship. And so rightly did we judge, that, as a matter of fact, only forty lifeboats have been supplied to our cruisers, while the rest are rotting in store—inconspicuous evidence of the superiority of our precautions. Conceal a watchman's absence that he may

Board of Trade for losing a crew by scurvy, and urging in his defence that he had bought a cask of lime-juice, but left it behind because the master of his vessel objected to the smell. Morally his position would be identical with that of the Admiralty, although the one culprit happens to be subject to the law, while the other is above it. Nor is it only in the matter of carrying lifeboats that captains are left to use their own discretion. It appears that they may adopt, according to taste, either Clifford's lowering apparatus, or the ordinary apparatus fitted with Kynaston's hooks, or may dispense with one and the other. It will be gratifying to know that the all-important question has been under the consideration of successive Boards of Admiralty, while ship-boys have been growing to seamen, being pensioned, or being drowned. Their very mature deliberation decided at length on the Kynaston hooks, and accordingly we find that the Ariadne was—not provided with them. Rather an ugly feature this would be in a trial for manslaughter arising out of culpable carelessness. Mr. Goehen disposes of it in a fashion which may be technically conclusive, but which must be anything but satisfactory to those who have a public or private interest in our first-class vessels afloat. As we understand the First Lord of the Admiralty, ships in the First Reserve are handicapped in point of insecurity by not being supplied with any modern improvement during the entire period of their commission. Should the captain fancy that they want any requisite, he may apply for it. If he does not interest himself in scientific naval invention, if he objects to an improvement as spoiling the smart appearance of his ship, he need do nothing, and his men must take their chance. In the Ariadne there was neither a Clifford's lowering apparatus, nor Kynaston's hooks, nor, above all, was there a lifeboat; and doubtless the arrangements on board many of our finest ships are of the same antiquated fashion. A captain may well be pardoned for doubting the value of an invention which all the wisdom of the Admiralty has been puzzling about for years. It may be less excusable in him to indulge his prejudices with regard to lifeboats; still he may possibly have honest convictions on that point, although we can scarcely understand or sympathize with them. But it does seem intolerable that the Admiralty should permit captains to play fast and loose with danger in the navy—should in fact connive at naval free trade in death—while the Board of Trade is rigidly insisting on protection to life in our merchant service. The Admiralty should remember, as we remarked before, that our prime seamen, and the gallant boys who leap overboard after drowning men, are not the sort of people we can afford to lose, overcrowded as our islands may be. And even could we draft our refuse into Megaras made as dangerous as our old fire-ships by the absence of all that was wanting in the Ariadne, they may depend upon it that the sentiment of the country would shrink aquemishly even from so good a riddance on such questionable terms.

For ourselves, we are glad to know that the philanthropy or pseudo-philanthropy of Englishmen tends the other way, and we can quote the success of the Lifeboat Institution in proof of it. Let us make new laws or appoint additional inspectors as we will, death is likely enough to busy itself in our crowded centres and among the weakest and most miserable of our population. Most of our endangered mariners are men worth taking care of in every point of view, and they are just the men to venture their own lives for others, were circumstances reversed. We doubt whether there are any such schools for fostering hardihood and generosity as the different Lifeboat stations, and so long as men are found willing to risk themselves for others, the least which those who live at home in ease can do is to find them the means. Twenty-eight thousand pounds is a considerable sum in itself, yet it is small indeed when compared with the purpose for which it is contributed and with the wealth of commercial England. There are 233 boats, we are told, but many stations are left unprovided, and many more are provided but inadequately. It should be remembered that maritime disasters come in shoals, and a single night may put many ships simultaneously in jeopardy when bearing up in a fleet to make some harbour of refuge. The one lifeboat, or the pair of lifeboats, may be adequate enough to meet ordinary emergencies, but cases will occur when ships may be foundering while their crews see the assistance that should have saved them otherwise engaged hard by. The solitary boat may be damaged in some such struggle as that to which the Duke of Edinburgh referred last Monday, when the Padstow lifeboat, making fast to the sinking Viking, twice snapped the rope that held her, and was beaten back through the breakers on the coast. The solitary boat gone, the bit of coast becomes as dangerous to life as any first-class cruiser commissioned by Her Majesty's Admiralty. Therefore there is still abundance of room for public liberality, nor need we be deterred by the idea that contributing to the Lifeboat Institute is flying in the face of the Ministry. The measure of regard paid to human life is left by our benevolent Constitution to the discretion of the different departments. It is only the Admiralty who look on placidly while men drown; the Board of Trade insists upon lifeboats in the commercial marine, and ultimately perhaps may go the length of subjecting ships to efficient inspection before leaving port, and setting limits to the owner's privilege of loading down to the water-line.

AN AWAKENING DISCOURSE.

WE have been favoured with an opportunity of perusing a thoroughly awakening treatise on the "abominations" of modern society in New York, which contrasts somewhat strangely with the feeble teaching of those manuals of etiquette which are so frequently produced in London. "This," says the prophet of New York, "is the season for parties"; and if they are of the right kind, it is well. But many of them are not of the right kind. Young people are kept in a whirl of unhealthy excitement night after night until their strength fails, their spirits are broken down, and their taste for ordinary life is corrupted. By the time spring comes they are in the doctor's hands or sleeping in the cemetery. The certificate of death is made out, and the physician, out of regard for the family, calls the disease by some Latin name, "when the truth is that they died of too many parties." This alarming but indistinct language is partially explained in the next paragraph, which begins, "Away with these wine-drinking convivialities." We understand the reverend author to complain that dancing or other "excitement" causes hunger, and eating is apt to be accompanied by drinking wine or stronger liquors. "The excuse which Christian men often give is that it is necessary, after late eating, by some sort of stimulant to help digestion." It appears, however, that "Christian men" are so far scrupulous that if a "minister" be present the decanters are kept in a side room, which they visit under the pretence of "going to see the white dog." This book, which was published on New Year's Day, can be compared to nothing but a tract which was once distributed on a festive occasion in England, bearing the inspiring title, "Are you aware that you are going to hell?" The entire literature of New York is vitiated with the passion for strong effects, just as, according to this author, its society is vitiated with the passion for strong drink; and therefore we are not surprised, although slightly mystified, at the exhortation, "Mar not the clatter of cutlery at the holiday feast with the clank of a madman's chain"! It would be hypercriticism to remark that in civilized countries madmen do not usually wear chains, nor, indeed, do ladies or gentlemen often proceed from a glass of wine at supper to intoxication and insanity. The habit of drinking once formed demands constant indulgence, and the means of it are obtained by visits to the pawnbrokers. This is doubtless generally true of all great cities, but in New York it appears to be applicable to a class which we had supposed to be superior to the more vulgar forms of vice. "If," says the author, "I could, I would take the three brazen balls hanging at the doorway and clang them together until they tolled the awful knell of the drunkard's soul." We think that the author does injustice to his own talent for literary clamour when he propounds this figure of himself manipulating after the manner of a juggler the pawnbrokers' balls. Even if they were made of brass, which perhaps they are not, we believe that the author would find himself able to make more noise by the ordinary application of flat to pulpit. But he seems to be possessed with a determination to write finely about common things. He has seen on the front of a public-house the inscription "XXX," and he demands in a poetic frenzy what it means. We all remember the story of the old woman who thought to help her minister out of a difficulty by suggesting the name of the fish that swallowed Jonah, and was rewarded by being called a fool. It may be conjectured that this author would have been equally disabused by any officious friend who had informed him what the mark "XXX" means, and thereby relieved him from the necessity of guessing that "the whole thing was an allegory." The respectable customers of Barclay and Pass will be shocked to hear that their favourite symbol has been prophetically interpreted to mean "Thirty hearts broken. Thirty agonies. Thirty desolated homes. Thirty ways to perdition." Returning from this digression to his purpose of warning against the peculiar temptations of Christmas and the New Year, he exclaims, "Be watchful. . . . Let not your flight to hell be in the winter." We do not of course suggest that he is here labouring under the very influence which he denounces; but certainly his style is, to use a classical expression, not far removed from dithyrambs when he thus curiously jumbles metaphors and half-remembered texts of Scripture.

There is another chapter "On the Indiscriminate Dance," which is, if possible, still more unintelligible. The author does not venture to condemn dancing altogether, and yet he denounces in the strongest language the practice of dancing in New York. "If a few friends gathered in happy circle conclude to cross and recross the room to the sound of the piano well played, I see no harm." This passage suggests that perhaps the author permits quadrilles, and only censures what are called round dances; but his denunciation seems to apply equally to both. He sets out as if with a purpose of distinguishing between the enjoyments and the sinful indulgences of life, but this part of his work is left unfinished. "The whirlpool of the ball-room drags down the life, the beauty, and the moral worth of the city." Here again we for the moment think that the important distinction lies between round and square dances. A quadrille can hardly by any exaggeration of metaphor be likened to a whirlpool. But another clue to the author's meaning offers itself in his next sentence—"In this whirlwind of imported silks goes out the life of many of our best families." It would be doubtless agreeable to the Protectionist party to believe that there is a necessary connexion between homespun and salvation. They might receive with cheerfulness the startling statement that bodies and souls innumerable are annually consumed in what the author calls "a conflagration of ribbons," meaning of course those of foreign make. We have not the least notion what a conflagration of ribbons is, but we do remember to have heard of a flame-coloured stuff, and we conjecture that the same idea is intended to be conveyed. "This style of dissipation"—that is, in imported silks and flagrant ribbons—is hereupon declared to be the cause of all physical and moral ill. "The tread of this wild intoxicating, heated midnight dance jars all the moral hearthstones of the city." Again, attempting to discern by the author's help between good and evil, we conjecture that dancing is only wicked after midnight. As regards the wild or intoxicating quality of this amusement as practised in New York we can say nothing, but we can say that in London these epithets would be singularly misplaced. "The physical ruin is evident. What will become of those who work all day and dance all night?" In London, perhaps, the number of those who are equally energetic in business and pleasure is limited, and at any rate we do not think that among them are many victims of that graveyard which, according to the author, is only one step distant from the ball-room. We are, indeed, inclined to agree with him when he says that "the froth of death" bubbles up in the champagne. Most of the wine drunk at English ball-suppers is detestable, and we credit this author when he states that the article consumed in America is worse. But still it is hardly in our view a sin, although undoubtedly it is a folly, to drink bad champagne. We are told that there are families in New York "that have actually quit keeping house, and gone to boarding," that they may give themselves more exclusively to balls. This may be true, but it does not follow that the author is right in assuming that all the members of a family who go to a ball find "their highest enjoyment" in it. In England a mother usually goes to balls on her daughters' account, and she has to do a great deal of hard work which would be ill requited by calling her, as the author does, "an old flirt." The father perhaps gets a rubber of whist, or, if the ball is held, as what are called "county balls" often are, at an hotel, it is possible that he will after a while "go down into lower dissipation," which we suppose means that he will smoke a cigar in a club-room on the ground-floor. The son of this family will become, says the author, a "nonentity," and the daughter will elope with a French dancing-master, whom he would doubtless regard as the incarnation of wickedness. He perhaps considers that wickedness consists not in dancing, but in dancing well. People may without sin "conclude" to cross a room, but then they must not move gracefully.

Our preacher's most severe condemnation is incurred by attention to dress and appearance, which however he might have observed in the frequenters of churches as well as in the devotees of balls. How, he asks, can any one be interested in the alleviation of the world's misery while there is a question about the size of a glove? We should answer that we believe much useful work is done by hands that usually wear neat gloves. A woman may dress well both at church and ball without becoming absorbed "in the constant study of little things." It is, indeed, almost as easy to buy a pair of gloves of the right as of the wrong size, and sufficient attention may be paid to dress without making it a subject of "harassing anxiety." But upon this subject of dress the author writes in a style of which we may perhaps convey a distinct idea by supposing that the lions of the Daily Telegraph had become serious, and taken to religious and moral roaring. We do, however, some injustice to that band of gifted writers, for we are not aware that any one of them in his finest frenzy ever began a sentence without finishing it. But this author accumulates for half a page such vituperative phrases as, "This inquisition of a small shoe; this agony of tight lacing; this wrapping up of mind and heart in a ruffle," and then breaks off, as if he despaired of finding anything bad enough to say of women who take care to dress neatly and becomingly. "I prophesy," he says, "the spiritual ruin of all participants in this rivalry"—that is, of the ball-room. Have the polished boards ever been the road to heaven? Has "a torch for eternity" ever been kindled at those chandeliers? "From the table spread at the close of that excited and beswathed scene, who went home to say his prayers?" The word "beswathed" is doubtless one of those which the publisher expected would sound unfamiliar to English ears. It is perhaps as disagreeable a word as America has invented. But we are at present concerned not with words but things. We think it probable that the author of this wonderful book occupies a pulpit in New York, and his essay on the "Abominations of Modern Society" is probably a sample of his sermons. It is wonderful that any student of the Bible should be capable of writing in such a prodigiously inflated style. The sentiments are those of old-fashioned English Puritanism, but they are expressed in a language which is perhaps the strangest product of modern America. In this country religion has not yet been entirely divorced from common sense and moderation, but in New York even preachers and teachers deem it necessary to compete with one another in extravagance of thought and diction.

FOREIGN ARTISTS IN THE FRENCH AND OTHER GALLERIES.

SUCH are the resources, developed and undeveloped, of Continental schools, that each one of the many foreign Galleries open from time to time in London brings to light fresh talent. Yet a shrewd manager, planning his exhibition with a view to commercial success, takes care not to alarm his customers by a preponderance of startling novelties. He bears in mind that, just as the good old English gentleman still sticks to port and sherry, so do steadygoing collectors continue to call for Frère and Daubigny. And it is comparatively of little consequence name remains unchanged. Any curious listener to the chat in picture-galleries, generally carried on between a lady who relies on her charms and a gentleman proud to impart his knowledge, will have observed that the criticism is little else than strong swearing by great names—a method which, though apparently safe, often ends in adoration before the worst picture in the room. Yet these are the people whom it is needful to please. And, in justice to the caterers for an uneducated public, it must be granted that foreign collections are made singularly enticing. The masters selected are so disposed that the known lead on to the unknown, and shining talent serves to alleviate dull mediocrity. Thus in the collections now open in Pall Mall, the Haymarket, and Bond Street, M. Gérôme leads the way to a man never heard of before; M. Breton or M. Israëls plays propriety to a work of doubtful reputation; Madame Peyrol tries, and not in vain, to reconcile us to the absence of her sister, Rosa Donheur; Señor Fortuny and Señor Madrazo persuade us that the great days for Spanish art are not departed, while M. Corot, in shadowy depths and in doleful tones, hangs, as it were, his harp upon the willows, and makes his sad plaint heard in a strange land.

The French Gallery in Pall Mall, which maintains a first rank among its competitors, is remarkable for the large space given to the German school. The Germans, in art as in arms, appear assailant; they design a picture as they would plan a campaign; they take pencil in hand in pursuit of some grand idea, and the size of the canvases they choose implies ambition for extended territory. Such, at all events, seems to be the significance of works which come from Munich, sent by Herren Flüggen (67), Liezenmeyer (140), Munkacsy (152), Malecki (100), Max (54), and Meisel (154). These artists, with others in the Gallery, have been formed more or less in the school of Piloty, a school which at the present moment may be accounted the most powerful in Germany. Pupils, however, as is invariably the case, find it more easy to fall into the faults than to rise to the excellences of their master. Thus "Familienglück" (67), by Herr Flüggen, an artist already gratefully remembered, is a composition laid out on a definite plan; the forms are well conceived, the idea of "Glick" is significantly expressed in a family group reposing beneath a tree, enjoying what the Turks call key-f: and yet the picture breaks down because the artist has not cared to carry, or is not able to carry, his conception to completion. From the same cause Herr Liezenmeyer's "First Sight of Marguerite" (140), though all right in notion and situation, ends in failure. The foremost disciple of this school, Herr Makart, when last we saw his colossal and decorative compositions in Vienna, was in like danger of being led astray by vaulting ambition impatient of submissive labour. We incline to think that the once famous school of Munich will not prolong its days beyond the present generation. Cornelius and Hess are gone, and their art dies with them; Kaulbach and Piloty survive, and possibly their system, as a formula, may endure. Indeed their leading pictorial maxim, that art needs first a noble theme and then a worthy treatment, sounds of the nature of one of those truisms which it may be hoped will last through all time. Among the works which come from Munich the most faultless is that which takes the hacknied theme, "He loves me, he loves me not" (54), by Herr Max, son of a sculptor whose statues we have known in Prague. The forms, indeed, of this painter, tenderly modelled and delicately chiselled, prove his parentage; he is studious too of type, line, and proportion; the cast of his drapery is also statuesque; his accessories likewise, little else than a dog on a bench and a bird on a branch, are equally chosen for simplicity; while his colour is pale and silvery as a marble quarry at Carrara in the grey of evening, or as seen when the moon is up on a summer's night. Herr Max we have observed with peculiar interest for some years; he is one of those artists, exceptional everywhere save in Germany, who may be defined as painter-thinkers. His thoughts do not always sport in the open daylight, but wander in shadowy night, and tread the paths of death. Herr Max, like Carstens, Schwind, and Rethel, is singularly creative; his designs are as ideas which may be read in a book, or looked at as we would listen to music. In fact, he has translated music into form; as, for example, in one of a series of designs we met with in Vienna, wherein Beethoven's Sonata Pathétique is made to symbolize or shadow forth life and death, the grave and the resurrection, a land of woe, a realm of joy; from beneath a demon clutches his victim, and into the upper sky spring beings released from death and agony. It would appear to be one of the ordained functions of art thus to deal with the supernatural. Fra Angelico and Luca Signorelli in Italy, Blake in England, Wiertz in Belgium, Martin Schöen in Germany, together with the painters above named, have been accustomed to show how pictorial art may hover on the confines of the spirit world.

The untravelling Englishman may begin in this French Gallery some slight acquaintance with three renowned artists of North Germany—Knaus, Vautier, and Sohn. At the outset it may be observed that the Southern school of which we have spoken as centred in Munich is widely different from what may be designated the Northern school of Düsseldorf. And the distinction has become all the more decided since the latter forsook the high spiritual walk which held communion with the skies, and has contentedly trodden the more lowly paths which lead to the realisms of daily life and the actual forms of nature. Among these naturalistic painters none is more famous than Herr Knaus, Professor of Painting in the Düsseldorf Academy, officer of the Legion of Honour, &c., and the only Prussian artist named in the grand prize awarded at Paris in 1867 to the eight leading painters in Europe. It is now nearly twenty years ago that we were first attracted, in a Gallery in Düsseldorf, to this eccentric genius, by a defiant composition, "The Thief in the Market," and since that time the painter has been peopling his canvases with every possible variety of character, save perhaps the serious and severe; he has, too, given bent to a humour and a satire, and occasionally to a sentiment, which have mingled laughter with tears. As a dramatist he depicted the mountebank among a gaping company in a country barn; and as a poet sensitive to the beauty of nature and the winning innocence of childhood, he expressed himself with charming naïveté in the pretty "Little Peasant Girl Gathering Flowers in a Meadow." Such are the antecedents which impart interest to the small specimens now before us; "He Lives by his Wits" (8), and "On Mischief Bent" (68), two studies from the same model. This wicked little unkin stands before the public ragged as a beggar, happy as a king; his clothes would absolutely fall from his back were it not for one precarious button; he is a gamin ready for anything; and it would seem that his next feat might be to jump out of the canvas with the purpose of picking the spectators' pockets. In most pictures faces are silent; indeed painting has sometimes been termed the silent art; but with Herr Knaus every character speaks. In this head, for instance, mouth, eyes, and even nostrils, are all alive with mental and physical impulse hard to be restrained. And technical qualities are not wanting; indeed this naturalistic school differs from its predecessor, the spiritualistic, in firmness and solidity, in texture and transparency. Herr Vautier, though a man of less mark than Professor Knaus, has been always distinguished for compactness of composition, for lucid narrative, for pleasing incident, for careful and sound workmanship. That as a genre painter he is scarcely surpassed in Europe will be at once apparent from the characteristic work before us, "The Grandmother's Counsel" (5). The grave bearing of age towards childhood, and a spinning-wheel in the midst standing as the sign of honest industry, make a domestic scene which Wilkie or Faed may have equalled, but never excelled. Indeed, in the pictorial relation of all the parts to the whole, a matter most essential to domestic genre, the German, the French, and the Belgians generally surpass the English and the Scotch. "A Mother's Care" (35), by Herr Wilhelm Sohn, also shows with what forethought and calculation these Germans go to work. This artist, who passes from time to time from high art to genre, belongs to a family familiar to students on the borders of the Rhine. "The Two Leonoras" in the Gallery of Düsseldorf, the best known work of Professor Karl Sohn, remains among our earliest associations. The change which has come over Düsseldorf receives illustration in the contrast between that formal and stuck-up composition and the free and easy domestic scenes we have passed under review. But, in short, genre painting is the order of the day throughout the length and breadth of Europe.

"The New British Institution," "the Society of French Artists," and Mr. McLean's well-selected Gallery in the Haymarket once more devote considerable space to foreign painters. Here and elsewhere the last phase of the Spanish school shows its bold, not to say its brazen, front in the brilliant but impertinent compositions of Señor Fortuny and Señor Madrazo. A third artist, who may be said to complete the trio, José Yimenez-y-Aranda, has a hand less dashing and slashing. Altogether the temper of these young Spanish blades suggests the bull-ring and the casino. And yet Señor Fortuny's "Hall of Justice in the Alhambra" is supremely clever; the whole scene is as a fairy fantasy put on a stage; the inflooding light from a cloudless Andalusian sky dazzles the eye; the colours thrown around the water-tank might have fallen from the rainbow; and when we turn from the Alhambra itself to its strange tenants, we discover prisoners prostrate in the stocks more like fiends than men, while the turbaned judges seated in state are blind as justice personified, for after true Eastern fashion they appear to have fallen asleep over their duties.

We have already implied that it seems to us that French artists are assuming at this moment unwonted solemnity, as if they were passing through shadow and sorrow. We have never seen M. Gérôme in more serious mood than in that sedate-minded composition, "Prayer in the Market-place." Also in Pall Mall we encounter M. Hébert's "Malaria," a replica of the sorrow-stricken group in the Gallery of the Luxembourg. Again, in Bond Street we come upon M. Millet's "Winter," a dreary negation; also a canvas in deep shadow, wherein M. Breton depicts, as perhaps no other artist can, the care and the toll of peasant life. We may mention, too, M. Courbet's portrait of himself, so black that it might have come from outer darkness; a strangely Communistic head, turbulent, yet imperturbable. M. Corot also is in keeping with the prevailing sadness; his trees quiver as an aspen leaf when the wind sighs through the branches, his grey monotonies are as prolonged plaints, his symphies throw their arms into the sky as if driven by passionate despair. Surely French art has lost its proverbial joy and gaiety.

The continued growth of the foreign picture trade is something more than a commercial phenomenon. Art importations from abroad differ from some other free-trade cargoes in being directly educational. Our painters, when about to plan a picture or settle the treatment of a subject, cannot do better than take counsel of foreign masters, who undoubtedly are experts in all that pertains to the grammar of art. The general public too have much to learn as well as to enjoy. It is a pretty and a pleasing study, that of the contemporary schools of modern Europe. And persons who travel once and again among Continental capitals have here in London the ready means of reviving agreeable recollections, and of perfecting and fixing a knowledge which, hastily acquired, is often as speedily lost.

REVIEWS.

FERGUSON'S RUDE STONE MONUMENTS.*

(Second Notice.)

IN a former article we gave some notion of Mr. Fergusson's general treatment of the subject of primeval antiquities. We now come to look somewhat more minutely to his treatment of particular monuments, especially in our own island. The crude assumptions and inaccurate expressions which are habitual with Mr. Fergusson must of course be taken for granted. It is vain to argue against the frame of mind which sees a "forefather," naked or otherwise, in every one who has at any time trodden the soil of our island; it is equally vain to argue with the confusion of thought which brings Cæsar and Agricola into "England"; it is of a piece with the kindred confusion which makes Bellovesus "occupy the departments immediately around Bruges," and which thinks it necessary to argue against "the erroneous assumption that no other people except the Celts existed in France." We will not stop over the passages in which Mr. Fergusson wastes his time in making merry about Druids and Phœnicians, and such like dreams, to which scholars have long since bidden farewell. We will not enter upon theories, but we will try, whenever Mr. Fergusson gives us a chance, to bring him face to face with facts. We ask, then, how we are to reconcile the words in page 2, where he says that "the builders of the megalithic remains were utterly illiterate," with the words in page 27, where he says "that they were generally erected by partially civilized races after they had come in contact with the Romans, and most of them may be considered as belonging to the first ten centuries of the Christian era." Stonehenge and Avebury, if we rightly understand Mr. Fergusson, were reared by the Britons during the progress of the English Conquest. The Britons of that age were therefore utterly illiterate; yet in page 87 Mr. Fergusson shows that he has heard of Gildas, the contemporary chronicler of this "utterly illiterate" people, and he even takes upon himself to quote him after a fashion. Perhaps indeed the words "utterly illiterate" are to be taken with some qualification. We could fancy that some very harsh critic might say that none but an "utterly illiterate" commentator could get the words "Welsh gate" (page 87) out of the interpolation in Gildas about "Sabrinum ostium." But such a criticism would be unjust; the fault of Mr. Fergusson and of writers of his class is not that they are "utterly illiterate"—it would be better if they were—but that they are too clever by half, and spare no haste in forming their conclusions. But, as applied to a people, the words "utterly illiterate" can be taken in none but their literal and grammatical sense, and we desire to know how they can be applied to the age and people among whom Gildas wrote his Liber Querulus. Directly after Mr. Fergusson had spoken of the builders of the megalithic monuments as "utterly illiterate," he goes on to say, what is only what we should expect in an utterly illiterate people, that "they have left no written records of their erection." Yet these monuments are, according to Mr. Fergusson, spread over "the first ten centuries of the Christian era," and he himself does not scruple to go to Nennius and Geoffrey of Monmouth for "testimony" and "written history" as to the date of Stonehenge. How these two positions are to be reconciled we know not. But we cannot help copying the following passage as one of the best examples of the grand and solemn contempt of ignorance. Mr. Fergusson has just spoken of some who consider themselves justified in putting aside the testimony of Geoffrey of Monmouth altogether. He thus goes on:—

If, however, we are to reject every medieval author who records miracles, or adorns his tale with fables, we may as well shut up our books at once, and admit that between the departure of the Romans and the arrival of the Normans the history of England is a mere confused jumble, in which may be found the names of some persons and of the battles they fought with one another, but nothing more. It is an easy process, and may be satisfactory to some minds. The attempt to separate the wheat from the chaff is a more tedious and more laborious task, surrounded by difficulties, and open to criticism, but it is one that must be undertaken if truth is to be arrived at.

With equal solemnity Mr. Fergusson goes on to tell us a few pages later that, "from the building of the Parthenon to the completion of Henry VIII.'s [VII.] chapel, the notices of buildings in general histories are as few and meagre as may be, and are comprised in a few paragraphs scattered through many hundred volumes." Such a sentence as this reaches the very sublime of ignorance. Writings like those of Prokopios and Gervase would probably be excluded by Mr. Fergusson from the class of general histories, but if he shuts out all the monastic annals he would shut out the greater part of our materials for medieval history. Yet from these monastic annals it would be easy to put together, not indeed so minute an account as Gervase gives us of Canterbury, but a fair general sketch of the architectural history of most of the chief ministers of England. Mr. Fergusson's limit, "from the building of the Parthenon," cuts us rather short at the other end; otherwise we might remind him that something might be learned about more than one earlier building from the nine books of Herodotus. Mr. Fergusson deals with history after the same fashion whenever he comes across it. Camden, for instance, attributes the Rollright stones to Rollo, who, he says, defeated Edward the Elder at Hook Norton. There is no evidence for any such battle, and the derivation of Rollright from Rollo would approve itself to no one but a Frenchman. But we cannot make out the point of Mr. Fergusson's stately correction of Camden. "This last, however, is apparently a mistake, for it was Eadward (901-923) who was really the contemporary of Rollo." The distinction between "Edward the Elder" and "Eadward" is too subtle for us; but even Mr. Fergusson's stateliness is less amusing than his pathos when he raises his wail over the flight of Aylesford. "Poor Horca died defeated, and all his friends could expect would be to be allowed to bury him under a flag of truce, with such rites as would ensure his proper reception in the next world." Over the tomb of the first slain English Heretoga we might be inclined to ask—

ἔρπονός ἐκ φιλίας τί ποτ' εἶπω;

But the particular form of lamentation chosen by Mr. Fergusson would hardly have occurred to us. It may, however, be becoming in one who is so intimate a friend of the princely Jutish house as to have found out a Vetta, grandson of Hengest, who "probably was slain in battle at the Catstone, near Edinburgh" (p. 57). This is, we suppose, another Vetta or Witta, different from the grandfather of Hengest and grandson of Woden, who so oddly came, in the belief of fervent Scottish antiquaries, to be commemorated by an inscription which, though it writes "oc" for the pronoun "hoc," is pronounced by no less a scholar than Mr. Fergusson to be "good Latin." At a later stage Mr. Fergusson helps us to a "Cissa Saxon King of Winchester, who was contemporary with Arthur." And at one time it seems that Mr. Fergusson was, "on the authority of a Saxon charter, inclined to believe" that a certain barrow at Avebury was his tomb. The charter appears to be that of Eadward the Elder in Cod. Dipl. V. 179, where, among the boundaries, we find the words "on cissan beorg." But as the charter refers to places in Hampshire, this tomb of Cissa, wherever it may be, cannot be at Avebury in Wiltshire, and Cissa, Saxon King of Winchester, is a creation of Mr. Fergusson's own brain. The same, or another, Cissa was in an article in the Quarterly Review (referred to in an article by a sound antiquary in the Edinburgh, October 1870) carried to Mons Badonicus and killed there; but, as the Edinburgh writer truly observes, no reason was given "for this very remarkable conclusion." Where Mr. Fergusson and the Quarterly Reviewer got their respective Cissas we cannot undertake to guess. The merest beginner in Old-English history knows how Ælle and Cissa landed at Cymenore, founded the South-Saxon kingdom, and stormed Anderida. The transformation of either of them into a "King of Winchester," his exploits at Mons Badonicus, and his burial at Avebury, as we cannot suppose them to be due to any contemporary records in an age so "utterly illiterate," would seem to have sprung out of Mr. Fergusson's internal consciousness. While dealing with Arthur and Geoffrey of Monmouth, the ancient connexion of the latter place with Macedon seems to have led Mr. Fergusson into an unlucky comparison between the stories of Arthur and the stories of Alexander:—

Aristotle and his master have been rendered quite as fabulous persons as Merlin and Arthur; and the miracles of one and the feats of the other are equally marvellous. In Alexander's case we fortunately have Arrian, and Curtius, and others, who give us the truth with regard to him; but Arthur had no contemporary history, and instead of living in a highly civilized state that continued for ages after him, he was the last brilliant light of his age and race, and after him all was gloom for centuries.

If words have any meaning, Mr. Fergusson not only looks on Quintus Curtius as an equal authority with Arrian, but looks on both as contemporary historians of Alexander. Some way on (p. 370) he tells us in the grand style, "It must also be borne in mind that the Romans never really settled in Brittany. The country was poor then as now, and it led nowhere." Of course the Romans only settled in "Brittany" in the same confused way of speaking in which Mr. Fergusson would say that they settled in England. But in forming this conclusion he must have been even more unsparing of haste than usual. When inquiring into the primeval remains of Locmariaker, he must have passed by the amphitheatre; he must have failed to notice the Roman remains at Vannes, Brest, Callac, Quimper, and elsewhere—stubborn facts which upset Mr. Fergusson's theory. Elsewhere (p. 380) we have a wonderful passage about migrations out of Spain—migrations, as far as we can make out, out of Spain into Ireland. These are attributed "to the intolerance of the early Christian missionaries." We do hope that at least the Apostle Paul, if he ever did take his journey into Spain, had no hand in these evil doings; but anyhow Mr. Fergusson assures us that there was some time when, "to avoid Carthaginian rapacity, Roman tyranny, and Christian intolerance, the unfortunate aborigines were forced first into the fastnesses of the hills, and thence driven literally into the sea." The time when "Carthaginian rapacity, Roman tyranny, and Christian intolerance" so oddly conspired together against the unlucky Spaniards was, as we gather from a note, somewhere between B.C. 218 and A.C. 143. Mr. Fergusson's notions as to the spread of Christianity in the world seem to be passing strange. Here we have, what we should never have looked for, Christians in Spain in a position to persecute their heathen neighbours in the time of Hannibal and the Scipios. On the other hand, in days about a thousand years later, when we had always fancied that not only heathens but heretics had pretty well vanished from Western Europe, we are surprised to hear how little way the new system had really made in the world. Mr. Fergusson rises to the full grandeur of rebuke when he thus denounces the imperfect historical views of all who have gone before him:—

The fact is that neither historians nor antiquaries seem quite to realize the state of utter barbarism into which the greater part of Europe was plunged between the collapse of the Roman Empire and the revival of order under Charlemagne. Christianity no doubt had taken root in some favoured spots, and some bright lights shone out of the general darkness, but over the greater part of Europe Pagan rites were still practised to such an extent as easily to account for any heathen practice, or any ancient form of sepulture which may be found anywhere existing.

The proof of all this is an extract from one of the Capitularies witnessing to the practice of human sacrifice among the Pagan Saxons; but the odd thing is that Mr. Fergusson here takes a view of the position of Charles the Great exactly opposite to that which he took in the memorable passage of his former work in which he quartered him at Paris. Now the great Emperor is the reviver of order after a state of utter barbarism which followed on the collapse of the Roman Empire, whenever that may be supposed to have happened. In his earlier description his reign was painted as "the last expiring effort of a previous civilization, rather than the foundation of a new and progressive state of affairs. After his death," we were then told, "a period of anarchy ensued." These two descriptions seem to us as hard to reconcile as Mr. Fergusson's present account of the "utterly illiterate" people who had nevertheless been partially civilized by contact with Rome, and who had a Gildas to record their ill luck. The fact that this sort of thing can be put out by a man who has gained a popular reputation, and who has a long string of letters after his name, is really serious. Scholars laugh as they read; but when things of this sort are given to the world with all this solemn pretentiousness, with these stately rebukes of all who have gone before, there can be no doubt that there are many who think that where there is so much pretence there must be some substance, and a real damage to the cause of historic truth is likely to be the result.

If we were to undertake to correct all the minute errors of detail with regard to particular monuments into which Mr. Fergusson has fallen, we should have to fill a volume not much smaller than his own. Whether he knows it or not we cannot say, but we know it well, that never did any book call forth such a storm, not perhaps so much among writers and critics as among really working students of the matters which Mr. Fergusson has taken in hand. We have lying beside us long lists of examples furnished by really learned antiquaries of instances which show, not only what every reader of his book can judge of, that no trust can be put in his inferences, but that very little trust can be put in his actual descriptions. When the reader is once warned of the hazy nature of Mr. Fergusson's argument from finds of various dates—the argument that a barrow or cromlech must be of post-Roman date because a later coin has been found in it or a later interment made in it—he will be on his guard through all the many places where Mr. Fergusson repeats the same fallacy. But it is as well that the reader should also bear in mind how little his actual descriptions can be trusted. This line of argument will be best left in the hands of professed antiquaries, of men who have given their lives to primeval studies, and whose list of charges against Mr. Fergusson we know to be long and heavy. We have rather taken it as our own line to point out the weakness of his main arguments, and the singular state of confusion as to the times and places with which he had to deal in which Mr. Fergusson sat down to his inquiry. But it is well to mention such facts as that he tells us that, in the Isle of Man, dolmens—what most people call cromlechs—are numerous, but that a really careful antiquary, who knows the Isle of Man well, writes to us that there is not a single "cromlech proper" in the island. There may be some question as to what are cromlechs or dolmens, and what are not cromlechs or dolmens; but this is only one example out of many in which men who really understand these matters give us, each from the districts which they themselves have studied, reports in matters of fact altogether unlike those given by Mr. Fergusson. Thus, (1068) he gives an account of the cromlech at Pentre Evan in Pembrokeshire, where he argues that the stones could not possibly have been covered with a mound, and moreover that "the supports do not and could not form a chamber." One who knows the place writes to us, "He is not aware of the other members of the chamber being in the next inclosure, placed in the hedge to be out of the way." Now this is not merely an error in description; it is an error in description where Mr. Fergusson makes use of his own mistake to patch up his theory. So presently after he comes across the great cromlech called Arthur's Stone, or Arthur's Quoit, in Gower. Here Mr. Fergusson remarks, "Only one dolmen in Wales, as far as I know, bears a name; but it is the illustrious one of King Arthur." Men who know Wales thoroughly tell us that there are a good many cromlechs in Wales which bear names, and that among them, as might be expected, the name of Arthur is not uncommon. Here again the point is of importance, as Mr. Fergusson presses the fact of this cromlech bearing the name of Arthur into the service of his theory about Arthur's battles. The eighth battle, according to Nennius, was fought "in Castell Guinnion." On this Mr. Fergusson remarks that this place, "from the sound of the name, can hardly escape being in Wales, or the Welsh border," adding, with charming simplicity, "unless indeed we assume that these Welsh appellations were common to the whole country before the Saxons re-named many of the places." What kind of appellations except Welsh would he expect places in Britain to bear before the Saxons re-named them? Accordingly, it is not very wonderful to find the Guinnion of Nennius, the Venonia of Ptolemy, quite in the North of England. But because there is a cromlech in Wales bearing the name of Arthur, this eighth battle must have been somewhere in Wales; whether in Gwent or Gwynedd seems to be all one to Mr. Fergusson. He then comes to the ninth battle, which was fought "in Urbe Legionia." Mr. Fergusson's comments, "this may be either Chester or Caerleon, in South Wales. It was most probably the latter, as in another manuscript it is added 'quæ Britanniæ Karilum dicitur.'" In our Nennius it is not Karilum, but Karhum; but it does not the least matter; the point is that Mr. Fergusson, not knowing that both Civitates Legionum are equally called Caerleon (in half-a-dozen spellings) in Welsh, thinks that the name Caerleon being added as the Welsh translation of Civitas Legionum is an argument in favour of Caerleon on the Usk in opposition to Caerleon on the Dea.

This we think is enough; we have one extract more:—

I do not know a single instance of an undoubted secondary interment, unless it is in the age of Canon Greenwell's really prehistoric tumuli. When he publishes his researches we shall be in a condition to ascertain how far they bear on the theory.

The sooner Mr. Greenwell publishes his researches the better, as we believe that they bear not a little on the theory, and that their publication will amount to the utter discomfiture of Mr. Fergusson. We have heard of the ducks who were so well trained that they would come and be killed. Mr. Fergusson, in invoking Mr. Greenwell, goes a step further, and prays the destroyer to come and kill him. In the meanwhile we may do some service to the cause of sound scholarship and sound reasoning by pointing out and proving, as we think we have done, by evidence, the true quality of this pretentious book.

SOMERS'S SOUTHERN STATES SINCE THE WAR *

THE name of the publishing house under whose auspices this volume appears will be regarded, not without reason, as a sufficient guarantee for the absence of anything like a bias against the Northern States or the Republican party, as an assurance that Mr. Somers's evidence is that of a witness who, if not impartial, is at least in nowise hostile to the Federal cause or to the authors of the existing system of government in the South. To candid and unprejudiced minds, indeed, the internal evidence of fairness will suffice; for very few writers, in describing such a state of things as has prevailed in the Southern States since their conquest, would be able to preserve that judicial calmness of temper, that absolute avoidance of strong language, that strict abstinence from needless comment and that careful adherence to observed facts, which distinguish every chapter and page of Mr. Somers's work. Yet, though this description of the Southern States since the war is studiously confined to an account of the writer's own observations, and is marked by an indifference of tone which is sometimes almost startling, its effect is to confirm nearly all that has been written by rational advocates of the South in defence of the conquered, and in condemnation of the conduct of the conquerors; and the impression left upon the reader's mind is the stronger because the author has evidently no such intention, and many of the most important parts of his evidence come out incidentally, and almost parenthetically, by way of explaining the facts immediately under this notice.

It is in this way that he bears unintentional witness to the ferocity with which the war was conducted on the part of the Federalists. He makes no direct reference to this point; but, in accounting for the utter desolation of the country after its submission, he mentions as a notorious truth the wholesale devastation effected by the invaders. Such devastation had been for centuries almost unknown in the warfare of Christian nations. The Prussians, in their last invasion of France, were not considered to have erred on the side of lenity, but, except in the immediate neighbourhood of battle-fields, they do not seem to have been guilty of wanton havoc. Private dwellings may now and then have been plundered; requisitions were levied; but no Prussian general wilfully destroyed the residence of a French marshal, as General Lee's house was destroyed, burnt a town that had surrendered, as Sherman burnt Columbia, or made a bonfire of libraries and public records, as was regularly done by the Federal troops. French manufactures and agriculture suffered at the time; but buildings and machinery were spared, and a very few years will replace the material losses of the occupied provinces. In the South the traces of the war are everywhere visible to this day. Wherever the Federal troops came they destroyed all that they could not remove; not only railways and stores, but cotton-factories, iron-factories, plantation buildings, cotton-gins and presses, sugar-boilers and refineries—in short, the whole industrial apparatus of the staple productions of the South.

When the war was over, it was impossible to resume work until the entire fixed capital of the country—the accumulated wealth of generations—had been replaced. And no facilities were given for such replacement. The conquerors were intent on vengeance rather than on restoration. The surrender of the South had been unconditional; but it had been based on the solemn and repeated declarations of Congress and of the President that all that was required was submission to the law, and return to the Union, and that no attempt should be made to deprive the States of their ancient liberties. Perhaps, had Mr. Lincoln lived, he might have desired and been able to fulfil these pledges; his successor tried in vain. Mr. Johnson prevented the Radicals from signalling their triumph by the execution of individual enemies; he could not hinder them from inflicting cruel punishment on the whole nation. Military despotism, rendered doubly odious by the selection of negro subordinates for places in which they would have the largest concern with the personal applications and individual fortunes of their late masters, was merely the preparation for a worse tyranny. The enfranchisement of the negroes gave them at once the mastery in many places; in all their practical ascendancy was secured by supplementary measures. Even if the white men were anywhere a majority of the voters, they were prevented from exercising their franchise by the proscription of every man for whom they could desire to vote. The Test Act—still in force—disqualifies every man who bore arms for the Confederate Government, and every man who held office under it, or gave it support of any kind. Now, whatever may be thought of the merits of the quarrel, it is certain that, except in East Tennessee and West Virginia, the entire Southern people regarded it as national; considered themselves as an independent people, the Government at Richmond as their lawful Government, and the war as a war of self-defence against a foreign invader. Therefore every man of military age and manly courage took arms; every man of character and influence lent his utmost efforts to uphold the cause, and all these are proscribed. No man who was of age in 1865 can now hold any office in the South unless he can swear that he was either a coward or a traitor according to the estimation of his countrymen. And thus it is generally impossible to find a man for whom Southerners can honestly vote; and they are excluded from the polls at which the negroes dominate. In Alabama a Scotch immigrant of respectability has been elected governor. But in general the only available candidates are "scallowags" and carpet-baggers; renegade Confederates who have made their peace with the conquerors, or Northern adventurers who have come South in order to pick up a living as office-holders, and who obtain their election by flattering the ignorance and vanity of the negroes. Under their rule the country cannot but suffer. The negroes pay no taxes, for the poll-tax is the only State tax not levied on property; and this is not collected. There is therefore no motive to restrain the extravagance of the official adventurers; the taxpaying whites are powerless, the untaxed negroes are flattered or bribed into acquiescence; and while the struggling people, still desperately striving to repair the havoc of the war, are oppressed by an intolerable load of taxes, their rulers often enrich themselves by speculations, not approaching those of the Tammany clique in magnitude, but not falling short of them in impudence, and more serious in proportion to the resources of the victimized communities.

Another scarcely less galling form of oppression emanates directly from Washington. The South always complained that she was mercilessly fleeced for the benefit of Northern merchants and manufacturers. But she is now far worse off than before the war. She has had to replace all her implements, from ploughs to cotton-gins and sugar refineries; she has had to buy new instruments to save the labour which emancipation has made intolerably dear; and all she requires she must purchase from the Pennsylvania iron-foundries and machine shops at a fancy price, the enormous duties almost entirely excluding English wares. Every necessary of life is similarly taxed for the benefit of the conquerors, except the "hog and hominy" grown on their own plantations—the pork and Indian corn, that is, which form the staple food of the Southern population. Even the negroes suffer severely from this cause, though too ignorant to understand why the enormous money wages they earn have so little purchasing power. But to the planter the tariff, imposed solely with a view to Northern interests, and forming a constant drain on the impoverished South for the profit of the wealthy North-East, is not only a cruel insult but a crushing burden. While he labours energetically to keep his head above water—for, as Mr. Somers testifies, by none of the many slanders against them have the planters been more misrepresented than by that which described them as an indolent race—he finds that he is paying something like half his total expenditure in the form of a tribute to those Northerners whom he hates not only as conquerors, but as oppressors; and he knows that he could retrieve his fortunes with half the toil if only he were governed by his fellow-citizens, who would regard his interest and refrain from stealing his money, and if the Federal power were in the hands of statesmen who would regard all sections impartially, and refrain from taxing one to enrich another. In a word, he knows that political misfortunes alone are the cause of his suffering; that he is poor, not because he is careless or clumsy, not because his slaves have been emancipated, but because his country has been conquered, and is governed in the interest of the conquerors. And this is not all. Capital is his great want; but foreign capital is frightened away by misgovernment and by the tariff, and the Northerners use their monopoly unscrupulously. The mercantile houses of New York have established agencies in the South, chiefly in Jewish hands, which sell goods at cent. per cent. profit (and this on Protection prices), and lend money at from thirty to forty per cent. It is not wonderful to learn that a large part of the soil of the South is offered for sale, often under fiscal or commercial exactions; that few of the planters are rich, or in the way to be rich; and that the valuation of Southern property (slaves excluded) is scarcely more than half what it was ten years ago.

The planters, by Mr. Somers's account, do not regret the abolition of slavery. Why, he does not tell us. The immediate prospect, as he describes it, is not a cheerful one for either race. In the South, as in Jamaica, the negroes brought up in slavery are not wholly impracticable. They have acquired tastes and habits which need money, and they are willing to work for high wages. They are attached and respectful to their old masters; treat them with the reverence learnt in the days of servitude, and infinitely prefer their service to that of new and sometimes richer employers. In nearly all the States those who wandered from the plantations during or after the war—those at least who have not died of want or dissipation—have found their way back to their homes, and to their old employment. Immorality meanwhile is frightfully prevalent, drunkenness and idleness are common, and the bills of mortality show that for the present emancipation is really "a thing that don't agree with niggers." The mortality is nearly double that of the whites, and very much higher than in the days of slavery. Coupling these facts with the fidelity of the slaves during the war, except when seduced by the actual presence of the invaders, we may find in them a conclusive answer to all stories which imply systematic harshness or abuse of power on the part of the great body of Southern slaveholders. It is clear that the master, as a rule, took far better care of the slave, and especially of his children, than the emancipated negro has taken of himself and his family since he became a free and responsible being.

Mr. Somers's evidence on the subject of the "outrages," so constantly alleged by one party and denied by the other, is well worthy of attention. The Ku-Klux-Klan—which a Southern lawyer described as consisting of "Confederate soldiers who cannot rest in their graves"—was, in fact, the Vigilance Committee of the South, at a time when the bonds of society had been loosened by war and despair; when Northern agitators were inciting the negroes to lawlessness and outrage; and when the law was impotent to protect life, or property, or female honour. With the restoration of order, however unsatisfactory, it has practically disappeared. There is much interest in Mr. Somers's brief and impartial notice of its history and character:—

The secret society was, in point of fact, a kind of ghost of the Confederate armies. Its uniform, made of black calico, was called a "shroud." The stuff was sent round to private houses with a request that it should be made into a garment, and fair fingers sewed it up, and had it ready for the secret messenger when he returned and gave his tap at the door. The women and young girls had faith in the honour of the "Klan," and on its will and ability to protect them. The "Ku-Klux," when out on their missions, also wore a long tapering hat, and a black veil over the face completed their disguise. The secret of the membership was kept with remarkable fidelity. In no instance, I believe, has a member of the "Ku-Klux" been successfully arraigned or punished, though their acts often flew in the face of the "re-constructed authorities," and were not in any sense legal.

When they had a long ride at night they made requisitions for horses at the farmhouses, and the horses were often supplied under a prevailing feeling of assurance that they would be returned on a night following without injury. If a company of Federal soldiers stationed in a small town vapoured as to what they would do with the "Ku-Klux," the men in shrouds paraded in the evening before the guard-house in numbers so overwhelming as at once reduced the little garrison to silence. The overt acts of the "Ku-Klux" consisted for the most part of the disarming of dangerous negroes, the infliction of a "lynch law" on notorious offenders, and, above all, in the creation of one feeling of terror as a counterpoise to another. The white people in the South at the close of the war were alarmed, not so much by the threatened confiscation of their property by the Federal Government, as by the smaller, but more present, dangers of life and property, virtue and honour, arising from the social anarchy around them. Many of them would not settle down to labour on any terms, but roamed about with arms in their hands, and hunger in their bellies; and the governing power, with the usual blind determination of a victorious party, was thinking only all the while of every device of suffrage and reconstruction by which "the freedmen" might be strengthened, and made under Northern dictation the ruling power in the country.

Nearly every respectable man in the Southern States was not only disarmed, but under fear of arrest or confiscation; the old foundations of authority were utterly razed before any new ones had yet been laid; and in the dark and benighted interval the remains of the Confederate armies—swept, after a long and heroic day of fair fight, from the field—littered before the eyes of the people in this weird and midnight shape of a "Ku-Klux-Klan." The negroes were "scared" by the apparition; and many of the "carpet-bag" agitators were run out of the country. Warnings were given, visitations were made in force, criminals taken in "flagrant delicto" were torn out of the hands of the sheriffs, and shot or maimed, and more moderate punishments were inflicted, which, whether deserved or not, could only be considered outrages. One reign of terror began to rise out of another. But six years of peace have greatly changed all that state of things. The negroes are quiet and orderly, and comparatively industrious; and the white people, more sure of their position under the Federal laws of reconstruction, are beginning to resume their right of voting, and of controlling the administration of affairs through the ordinary legal channels.

Scarcely a trace of the original "Ku-Klux" organization remains, as, if it still exists, it is very seldom brought into action.

That such a body should subsist at such a time was almost a necessity, and certainly not an unmitigated evil. That a continuance of the present system can only tend to maintain the sentiment of inveterate popular hostility out of which such organizations spring, must be plain to every statesman not wholly blinded by passion; and the present prospect of a new triumph of the party which is bent on upholding negro supremacy in the South, and a protective tariff for the benefit of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, cannot but be considered as a misfortune to North and South alike. The permanent union of two nations embittered against each other by a continuance of injuries inflicted and endured as impossible as the permanent subjection of a superior race to an inferior; and only by the speedy abandonment of the latter policy can reconciliation and effective reunion be rendered practicable.

We have dwelt chiefly on the evidence which Mr. Somers's book affords of the political oppression and misgovernment under which the South is suffering, because this appears to be the chief cause of her prostration, and the great obstacle to her recovery. But it occupies no similar place in the volume itself. The author traversed nearly the whole of the cotton and sugar region, as a diligent and accurate observer, with a view to note its commercial prospects and material resources rather than its political condition; and it is only in its effect on the former that he is brought to take account of the latter. His description of the different States, and of the several districts into which each State is divided by natural peculiarities, of their physical and social characteristics, of their agriculture and manufacture, of their minerals—chiefly coal and iron—and the facility of their extraction, is most careful, interesting, and valuable; and it has seldom occurred to us to peruse a book of travel, or an account of a foreign country, in which the author had so successfully contrived to tell all that is worth knowing without becoming tedious or trivial, and to leave out all that is trifling or insignificant, while making a judicious selection of such minor incidents as help to give the readers a better idea of the institutions, scenes, or people whereof he writes.

YESTERDAYS WITH AUTHORS.*

THERE are many drawbacks to the pleasures of literary eminence in England. If Johnson's catalogue of evils, "toil, envy, want, the patron, and the gaol," has in part become obsolete, new grievances should be added to the list, and for the patron we should perhaps be inclined to substitute the inquisitive Yankee. The species is regarded with terror by all eminent poets and novelists; and yet, that we may not start a sentimental grievance, we will admit that we do not intend any severe imputation upon the national character. For, in the first place, if it is discreditable to a country to send forth a good many pushing and inquisitive admirers of genius, it may be plausibly argued that it is creditable that genius should be admired even by a class to which good manners have not penetrated. And, in the second place, if English authors are pestered by obtrusive worshippers from America, we have some reason to know that certain American authors have a powerful retort, and would complain—if Americans ever complained of such a fault—of the excessive demands made upon their hospitality by British travellers. At any rate the grievance may be borne with tolerable resignation, considering the compliment which it implies, but always provided that the self-created guest does not rush into print on his return home. Then the grievance becomes one which, if it would not justify a claim for indirect damages, gives at least ample cause for such vengeance as critics can offer.

The book before us, by Mr. Fields, member of the well-known publishing firm at Boston, has a prima facie appearance of deserving to come within this condemnation. Mr. Fields, having paid many visits to England, and being possessed by an ardent desire to make acquaintance with our literary luminaries, gradually accumulated a number of anecdotes about authors and his dealings with them, which first appeared in the Atlantic, and are now reproduced in a volume. The circumstances are suspicious, and we began our reading with a decided expectation of discovering some breach of the strict code of decorum. It is difficult indeed for any man, to say nothing of an enterprising American publisher, to discourse upon such persons as Thackeray, Hawthorne, Dickens, and Miss Mitford—all of whom were personally known to Mr. Fields—without saying some things which had better have been left unsaid. On the whole, however, we are bound to confess that we cannot put our fingers on any statement and say that its publication infringes the legitimate claims of private friendship. There are one or two passages which are, in the old sense of the word, impertinent. We do not, for example, see much point in the following anecdote, unless it is introduced to prove that Mr. Fields knows Mr. Tennyson. It seems that, on being told that Hawthorne had not ventured to address him, "the Laureate said in his thick and hearty manner, 'Why didn't he come up and let me shake hands with him? I am sure I should have been glad to meet a man like Hawthorne anywhere.'" A most becoming sentiment, certainly, but not precisely one which deserves to be printed in letters of gold, or even to be published to the world at large as a specimen of a British poet at his best. This, however, is a trifling matter, and we willingly do Mr. Fields the justice of acknowledging that none of the families of the deceased authors have serious grounds for remonstrance in this sense. When, however, we go a step further, and ask whether Mr. Fields possesses the necessary qualifications for writing a really interesting set of reminiscences, our answer cannot be so satisfactory. Amongst those qualifications we should certainly reckon a delicate appreciation of character.

a strong moral pressure which in the last agonies of a painful and mortal disease he had no strength to resist. Father Hyacinthe continues, so to speak, to be the heart of the French Opposition; but the literary mantle of Gratry has fallen on Dr. Michaud, whose pen is hardly less prolific than that of the great Oratorian. He has already, since breaking with the infallibilist authorities, issued three publications, the last and most considerable of which is now before us; and a fourth, under the title of Programme de Réforme de l'Eglise d'Occident, is announced as in the press. He has also established a Comité d'Action, which appears to be vigorously at work organising the Old Catholic movement in France.

The work just published bears the startling title of Comment l'Eglise Romaine n'est plus l'Eglise Catholique, but there is much less of a merely sensational or rhetorical kind in its contents than in the two which preceded it. The four "notes" of the Church given in the Nicene Creed are discussed in order, and the contrast between the "Romanist" and the primitive and patristic standard is exhibited in detail by reference to historical testimonies. The first chapter, however, explaining "How the Roman Church is no longer One," contains some very odd revelations as to the existing state of opinion among the bishops and clergy who are supposed to have accepted the new dogmas. The author starts with a remark which has often occurred to us in reading modern Ultramontane literature, whether didactic or devotional, though we never recollect coming across it in print before. He observes that, whereas the Creed lays down four notes of the true Church—that it is One, Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic—the Ultramontanes do not find these marks sufficiently distinctive; and therefore quietly interpolate a fifth to clench matters: "the true Church is One, Holy, Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman." And hence the question arises whether the first four marks, which alone are mentioned in the Creed, are actually found in company with the fifth. Dr. Michaud naturally enough insists that unity of doctrine must bear reference to the teaching of the Church throughout all ages, and not simply to the Church of the present day; and that "July 18, 1870, is a complete negation of the Catholicism of former ages." But he proceeds to ask whether the boasted unity of belief in the Roman Catholic Church at this moment is really anything more than "the unity of hypocrisy and fear," as illustrated by the "official" conversion of Liberal Catholics to the new dogmas. And he answers the question by relating several facts which he declares to be within his own knowledge. We will give some of them. A German Cardinal—presumably Rauscher or Schwarzenberg—after having promulgated the Vatican decrees in his diocese, said to an Old Catholic friend, "If you retract after what you have written on the invalidity of the Council, I shall feel nothing but contempt for you." Another German bishop, who published the decrees, and even signed the second Fulda Pastoral, "does not hesitate in private to call the members of the Curia agents of the devil, and to laugh aloud at Papal infallibility." One of the Hungarian bishops wrote to Rome, "I submit as a Catholic and a bishop, but as a man and a theologian I reserve my liberty and my convictions"; which is rather like "forgiving as a Christian," as Sancho Panza explained it. Two other bishops only succumbed under a peremptory threat of having their faculties withdrawn, one of whom has constantly avowed since that he has so completely lost the respect of his old friends that he had far rather die than endure such a life. A French bishop wrote to Father Hyacinthe congratulating him warmly on his letter to Gratry. The Bishop of Marseilles has not promulgated the decrees at all, on the pretext that the Council is not yet over. Two illustrious heads of religious communities, who have submitted in order to save their convents from censure, save their consciences, the one by saying that "he obeys, but does not believe," the other by the more ingenious distinction that "he believes the decrees in the sense which God alone knows to be the true one, for He only can know what that sense is." As for the priests, as a rule, their acquiescence is equally hollow. They do not scruple to give absolution to penitents whom they know to be, on their own professed principles, downright heretics, taking care not to ask inconvenient questions. And for the general mass of the faithful, their attitude is summed up in the current saying:—"Comme catholique, je me soumets, mais le diable m'emporte si j'en crois un mot." Neither in Germany nor England nor Italy nor France is there anything like real unity of belief among them; Ultramontanism everywhere "is rather politic than dogmatic," and there is the same latent scepticism on every side:—

Some believe the new dogmas, while explaining them in absolutely contradictory senses. Others submit, without believing at all; and, if they submit, it is to retain their see, or their cure, or their vicariate, or their convent, or their college, or to avoid a rupture with Rome. They prefer to break internally with truth and faith, to breaking externally with Pius IX. and the Jesuits. We are therefore justified in concluding that the existing Roman Church is wholly destitute of dogmatic unity.

Dr. Michaud goes on to examine the remaining notes of Sanctity, Catholicity, and Apostolicity. Under the first head he dwells chiefly on corruptions of moral theology and the consequent abuse of the Confessional. Passing from Catholicity or orthodoxy of doctrine, which he of course denies to Rome, to numerical extent, he maintains that the Easterns, whom he reckons at 100,000,000, and the Protestants of all communities, whom he counts as 120,000,000, together outnumber professing Roman Catholics; a very large proportion of whom moreover may be divided into "those who do not know what they believe and those who know that they do not believe." And, lastly, the existing Papal system has no claim to be considered Apostolic, for it is in fact based on the spurious Decretals of the ninth century, and not on the tradition of the Apostles handed down in the ancient Church, which recognises, not a supremacy, but a primacy only in the Pope, and that, according to one great theological school of the Western Church, a primacy of ecclesiastical, not of divine, right. Nor is Dr. Michaud content with denying to the present Roman Church the essential attributes of Catholicism; he argues that it has become "positively heretical" by adding to the revealed deposit of faith, as Protestantism has subtracted from it. Successive chapters are devoted to showing how the true idea of the Church, of unity and catholicity, of faith, of Ecumenical Councils, of the priesthood and episcopate, and of authority, has been gradually corrupted. Into the discussion of these various points, which involve a good deal of purely theological matter, we shall not attempt to follow him; but it is conducted with calmness and vigour, and with a constant reference to the witness of ecclesiastical history, and will well repay perusal to all who are interested in the controversy. The fundamental point at issue between the rival parties, if we rightly understand him, is whether the Church which inherits the promises of Christ and the gift of infallibility means practically the Pope, or the whole body of the faithful, in which the priesthood and the episcopate exercise by divine institution certain functions, doctrinal, sacramental, and directive, but have no power to lord it over their brethren. The authority of the hierarchy, according to his view, is neither absolute in character nor unlimited in range, and the modern distinction of order and jurisdiction, which last is supposed to be derived, directly or indirectly, from the Pope alone, finds no support in the constitution and teaching of the ancient Church. In his final chapter, after again recounting the four essential marks of the true Church, the author claims to have proved the present Roman Church to possess none of them, but to be positively schismatical and heretical, and therefore "no longer the true Church of Christ." And he concludes with the practical inference—"Donc, quiconque veut rester sérieusement et publiquement fidèle à l'Eglise catholique, doit rompre sérieusement et publiquement avec l'Eglise romaine." Whether this means more than that every one is bound openly to profess his dissent from the Vatican dogmas is not quite clear, but it certainly cannot mean less. How many of the clergy or of the laity in France are prepared to follow such counsel remains to be seen, but the Abbé Junqua was lately reported to be lecturing to large audiences, including many priests.

It is beyond our province to appraise the theological merits of the controversy. But, in pointing out the broad contrast between the present teaching and discipline of the Roman Church and the Catholicism of the early Christian centuries, Dr. Michaud is dealing with facts which may be verified by every student of history. Indeed the novelty and interest of the volume does not lie so much in his exposition of facts as in his being the person to make it. The integral change in the constitution of the Church effected by the False Decretals, the incompatibility of Papal infallibility and supremacy with the teaching of the Fathers, and the modern and purely arbitrary origin of the received Roman theory of "jurisdiction," have often been set forth before; but then it has usually been by Protestant controversialists, who had a position to defend, and who might naturally be suspected, if not of unfairness, at least of a bias in favour of their inherited opinions. Here the demonstration comes from a priest trained in the narrow and exclusive system of a French seminary, and only forced gradually, by sheer progress of conviction, in view of the monstrous pretensions of Rome, into an attitude of hostility. Nor are signs wanting even among English Roman Catholics, who for the most part are Romanis Romaniores, that the last straw is beginning to press too hard on the much-enduring camel's back. Our readers may recollect our noticing some months ago a little fly-leaf catechism translated from a German Jesuit, Weninger by name, under the title of Infallibility in a Nutshell, which we characterized at the time as the art of "mendacity made easy." A reply has now been published at Rivington's, by a member of the Roman Catholic Church, who indeed is currently reported to hold a higher position in his Church than the author of the original, entitled the Nutshell Cracked. The concluding passage will sufficiently indicate the tone of the little tract:—

Do you know of any General Council which has even implied that the doctrine of the personal infallibility of the Pope is true?

I know of none. Let those who assert that they have shown their authority by pointing to any decree of any General Council where this doctrine is stated or even implied. The Florentine decree, which is the only one yet alleged, when given entire, implies the contrary, not to say that many Catholic theologians question the ecumenicity of the Council.

Is that true which is asserted in Messenger Tracts, No. 1, that "until recently this prerogative has never been called into question by Catholics"?

It is not true. To give one example only out of many. At the time of passing the Act of Catholic Emancipation, the Catholics of England and Ireland, instead of avowing their belief in the Pope's infallibility, declared again and again in official documents, deposited in the Government archives, and referred to by English-speaking bishops in the Vatican Synod, that they did not believe it. Again, a "Declaration and Protestation" to that effect was signed by a large number of Catholics, including over two hundred clergymen; and a similar "Oath and Declaration," taken by all Irish Catholics, was declared by the Irish bishops in synod on February 26, 1860, to be "a part of the Roman Catholic religion."

Besides which, for the first several centuries of the Christian era the doctrine was unheard of, and it was called into question as soon as it began to be asserted.

QUESTION 4.—What then should you say of the decree on this subject in the Vatican Council, promulgated on July 18, 1870?

ANSWER.—I say, in the first place, that many bishops purposely absented themselves from the Council on that day, after having voted against the decree in the previous session, and having between that session and the 18th July presented to the Pope a solemn protest against the decree. And although it is true that most of those bishops have since then submitted to it, still that does not interfere with their having rejected it in a body during the Council. For, in submitting to it, they have acted simply as individual bishops. On the other hand, their protest in the Council was of itself sufficient to prevent the decree from commanding the assent of Catholics.

Besides which, it must be remembered that no doctrine can be made an "article of faith," even by a General Council, which is not founded on Scripture and the continual tradition of the Church. This doctrine is not to be found in Scripture, and the tradition of the Church throughout the early centuries is absolutely hostile to it. For these reasons I deny that the infallibility of the Pope is an article of faith.

SHOOTING THE RAPIDS.*

A WRITER who has been successful with a first book is always in a difficulty when he attempts a second. If he goes back to his old ground, he will probably be accused of repetition; if he ventures on new ground, there is the risk that he may not find himself at home there, and also that his readers, with the recollection of his former effort in their minds, may be disappointed in their expectation of getting something similar, yet different. And for this reason the second book of a successful author is seldom judged quite fairly, at least at the moment when it appears. On the other hand, there is some danger, as we have said, that the writer may not do justice to himself. If Shooting the Rapids had not been preceded by Against Time, it would have been pronounced to be a work of marked ability and promise. About its ability, indeed, there can be no question. Mr. Shand has a quick eye and a graphic pen; if he does not get much below the surface, at least he dashes off his surface-pictures in a strong, vivid, unmistakable style. There is life, and colour, and genuine dramatic force in his narrative. Perhaps for a fastidious taste there may be too much of the rough vigour of distemper in the painting; bold masses of colour are expected to do duty for nice drawing and careful shading; and the effect is occasionally apt to be rather glaring. But of late most novels have been watered down to such a namby-pamby insipidity that vigour, even in excess, is a quality we hardly like to quarrel with. Mr. Shand has a dexterous way of portraying the strong lights and shades of character; he poses his figures picturesquely, and he has a special aptitude for conveying local colour. Moreover he has struck a rich vein, new and strange to most readers, in his pictures of City life. From time to time other writers have ventured into the same field; but Mr. Shand stands almost alone in his power of depicting the romance of premiums and the tragedy of discounts, and the volcanic rifts in the hard grey crust of financial speculation. His financiers are not mere lay figures or abstractions; they are creatures of flesh and blood, who bring with them into the world of bank-books and ledgers those passions which novelists of a former day used to confine to the recesses of gloomy forests, disolute baronial halls, or the mysterious haunts of gamblers and bravos. Apart, however, from its evident ability, there was in his first book a promise of better things which might come with finished workmanship and matured art, and we fear we cannot say that this promise is altogether fulfilled in the work before us. Shooting the Rapids is more ambitious than Against Time, but in proportion to its ambition and the stretch of canvas provided for its display it is less effective. The scene is too crowded; the characters, though vigorous in colour, are blurred in outline; and the unity of design which is essential to a thorough work of art is imperfectly sustained amid the jostle of persons and the hurly-burly of incident.

In Shooting the Rapids Mr. Shand's aim has been to sketch the career of a clever, daring, and ambitious young fellow, whose generous impulses help to impose on himself and on others, and to give a prepossessing air to a character of which the real basis is a resolute and calculating selfishness. When we first meet him he appears to be an honest, good-hearted lad, and there is a turning point in his career at which it is a question whether his better or his worse nature shall get the upper hand of him. But one false step leads to another, and the train of circumstances in which he allows himself to get entangled hurries him to his ruin. On the death of his father, who had been English Minister at Naples, Ralph Dacre finds that his heritage in England is so heavily mortgaged that it will yield only a few hundreds a year. He consoles himself with the reflection that he is also heir to his maternal grandfather, the Baron von Heppenstall, in the Grand Duchy of Baden. He has got into the old man's black books on account of his democratic sympathies, which had in fact carried him off to Rome—it is 1848 when the story opens—to take part with the Triumvirs in the defence of the city; but he has soon enough to be disgusted with the Reds, and he does not doubt that he will be able to pacify his grandfather. When he reaches Heppenstall, he finds the old Schloss riddled and dismantled—a ruined solitude. A party of German revolutionists had first seized it; then the Prussians blew them out of it with their cannon, and established themselves there instead, until they had drained the cellars. Moreover the old Baron had placed his fortune at the disposal of the Grand Duke in order to crush the rebels, and no receipts for the money can be found. It was, the Grand Duke's Minister argues, a free gift to his sovereign. At the most the Heppenstall property and Allonby in the North of England yield a bare 1,500*l.* a year between them; but those who know the encumbrances on Allonby credit Ralph with large revenues in Baden, while his German friends who are aware of his disappointment at Heppenstall imagine that it does not matter much to a rich Milor who has English property to draw upon. In an evil moment Ralph resolves to play off one against the other, and to pass for the wealthy man he is supposed to be. He will trade on appearances in order to turn them into substantial reality. Through an old friend of his father he obtains a private secretaryship at the Foreign Office, and is in a fair way to distinguish himself in official life, when some awkward suspicions are aroused by his association with certain Stock Exchange speculators, and he resigns, on a hint from his chief that his winnings have got wind. There is nothing now to check his financial exploits. He plunges recklessly into all kinds of speculation in concert with Aggill, an Englishman of questionable reputation, and Gaboche, one of the mushroom capitalists of the Second Empire. "With all his thought and his scheming prudence," we are told of Ralph that "there was a strong dash in his veins of the blood of the hare-brained adventurer. He was something of the type of the men who swept the gold-freighted galleons from the Spanish Main, and burst their way to the treasure-vaults of El Dorado—daring, covetous, and calculating by nature." If he had any scruples at first, they soon vanished; he goes shares with Aggill and Gaboche, and is in return obliged to procure for them heavy advances on imaginary securities from the bank of which he has been made chairman. Of course a crash comes. The pace was too headlong to last, and even if Ralph could have saved himself, his allies were enough to ruin anybody. His stepmother dies, leaving him sole and irresponsible guardian of his half-sister Alice, who inherits a large fortune which had been settled on her mother. In a fit of despair Ralph stakes the money on a "dark" horse which he has been induced to back for the St. Leger; the horse breaks down, and Ralph, transferring his English and German estates to his sister, flees the country. When the story opened he was with the Garibaldini defending Rome. He now learns that Garibaldi has once more hoisted his standard, and, in mere weariness of life rather than from any sympathy with the cause, he again flings in his lot with the red shirts, and is mortally wounded in a skirmish at Monte Rotondo. Before he dies he learns that lead has been found at Allonby, and he had previously discovered the Grand Duke's receipt for his grandfather's money, so that his debt to his sister is more than repaid.

It will be observed that in this story Mr. Shand partly goes back to his old ground, and it is undoubtedly there that he is most successful. Indeed it is a pity that he did not work out this part of his plot more thoroughly, and set aside the extraneous incidents and superfluous characters which somewhat confuse and obscure the story of the hero. Moreover, there is an obvious anti-climax in making one of the great gamblers of the Stock Exchange stoop to trifle with a race-horse. In his former book Mr. Shand seemed to argue that, while all professional City men are more or less rogues, a gentleman can go shares in their plunder without losing his virtue or his honour. In Shooting the Rapids we have the other side of the picture, and the moral is unexceptionable; whoever you are, if you touch pitch you will be defiled. There is room, however, for yet another story of financial speculation, in which all the speculators shall not be brigands in frock-coats who drive to Lombard Street in broughams. There are, peradventure, one or two men of business in the City who have the manners of gentlemen and who are not dishonest.

A prominent defect, as it strikes us, of Mr. Shand's writing is the exaggerated violence of his style. He is always at the top of the gamut. All his colours are intense; everything is at its biggest and grandest; and if anybody takes a chair or sips an ice, as much muscular energy is put into the act as if it were a feat of Hercules. If Mr. Shand has to give us a glimpse of the lawn before a country house he must first sprinkle it with "beds of Americans, araucarias, and wellingtonias scattered through the weeping ashes and copper beeches." He mounts the Squire on a cob "with the blood and muscle of a desert-born Arab and the solid frame of a dray-horse." When the Squire takes a quiet round with his gun among the turnips, the dogs go crashing through the drills "with the noise of a tropical tornado, shaking the palm-tops." A couple of young ladies cannot arrange for an afternoon ride without "forcing the Squire's position with a rush." If it is desired that one nobleman should visit another at his country seat, he is not invited in the ordinary way, but the host lays "violent hands" on his guest and "carries him off." When the hero has the offer of a place which he wants, he does not accept it, but "precipitates himself" upon it; when he goes to an evening party he "lets his pulses gallop," and, "exhilarated by the swiftness of the giddy motion," he "dazzles himself with beaming smiles, catches fire at the contact of glowing touches, and, childlike, hunts the dancing straws that change to jewels in the glare of the stage lamps." If he sits down to his desk, "the mass of rapidly dashed-off correspondence taxes the brain even more than the flying hand," and we are afraid Mr. Shand's readers may be tempted to hint that sometimes this is their case too, only the taxed brain is theirs and his the flying hand. Some of the chapters suggest the idea that incidents have been added to the story for the sake of bulging it out to the regulation three-volume size. Those headed "The Lady, the Catfish, and the Champion," and "The Combat," are apparently of this description. Some forty pages are devoted to a minute narrative, telling how a lady was insulted by a costermonger, and how her lover coming up fought the costermonger and thrashed him. After this the young couple of course got married, but as they were in love before, it was hardly necessary for the author to put himself to the trouble of getting up the fight. We cannot help thinking that Mr. Shand's book would have been better in two volumes than three; and he would thus have escaped the necessity of contriving incidents which are not attractive in themselves, and which have really nothing to do with the story. We must add a word on a minor point. Mr. Shand apparently abstains on principle from the use of that harmless and serviceable part of speech, the relative pronoun. Within very moderate limits this ellipsis is no doubt permissible, and may even add something to the glibness and dais of narrative; but Mr. Shand carries it to an extent which makes his sentences often uncouth and at times hardly intelligible. Here, for example, is a sentence which we are not sure that every reader will see his way through even on a second or third attempt:—

In Ralph's state of mind it would have been impossible to speak at a moment's notice; to repress his swelling indignation at the other doing the honours in the house a cousin, his own faults had lost him, was on the eve of inheriting,—with 10,000*l.* a year.

Notwithstanding these defects, however, the story is bright and lively; the author has the rare merit of writing about things which he really understands, and his book may be counted among the not too numerous novels which it is not an absolute waste of time for a grown man to read.

THE ARĀSH-I-MAHĀL.*

WE recently noticed a work called Nasr-i Be-nasir, which is a Test-book in Bengali for those who seek a "Certificate of High Proficiency in Hindustani." We passed an unfavourable judgment upon that work, as being trivial and unfitted for use as a Test-book. We have here another of these Test-books, of which we can speak in very different terms. Its subject-matter is interesting, and it is written in the most polished style; that style, however, being purely Oriental, and consequently often uncongenial to English taste.

The Arāsh-i-Mahāl is one of those works which were translated into Hindustani at the beginning of the present century, under the auspices of the English Government, with the object of supplying its officers with suitable books for the study of Hindustani. It is founded upon a Persian work called the Essence of Histories, written about a century before. And, so far as the matter is concerned, it contains little that is new; for the additions made by the translator are inconsiderable in extent and of no great value. But the style and treatment of the work are the translator's own, and fully justify him in stating that he has not made a mere translation, but that "he has written the substance (of the original work) in the Urdu tongue." The result is a most excellent, perhaps even the very best, specimen of Hindustani composition. Sher Ali, the author of the Hindustani work, was a native of Delhi, and his nom de plume of Afros is generally added to his name. He very early in life showed poetical talent, and he has left a book of poems which is highly esteemed. His abilities being brought to the notice of the English Government, he was appointed to the College of Fort William. Here he produced a translation in Hindustani of the celebrated Gulistan of Sādi, and the work now under notice. Besides these he superintended and revised the translation of several other works. He died in 1809, having printed the first portion of Arāsh-i-Mahāl in the preceding year. The remainder has never been published, but the MS. of it is said to be preserved in the College at Calcutta.

This book, then, is one of the works which have to be studied by aspirants to "High Proficiency in Hindustani," and it is by far the most important of them. To assist students in acquiring a knowledge of the work, Mr. Court has put forth the present translation in English, and, as he "considered a literal rendering to be the most useful," he has "sacrificed elegance of style to this object." His description of the work is short and accurate. "It commences with a description of India, its seasons, fruits, animals, sciences, religious and military orders, and women; then follows a geographical account of the great divisions of the country, and it concludes with a history of the Hindu kings to the time of its conquest by the Muhammadans." Of Mr. Court's translation we would speak as tenderly as possible. His motive in undertaking it was praiseworthy, and his task was difficult. But many portions of his translation would certainly not deserve a Certificate of High Proficiency. There are errors in almost every page; some of them quite misrepresent the real meaning, and some show themselves to be palpable blunders; as, for instance, in the description of the province of Benar, where "the laws" are named as one of the revenue officials. Students who use the translation will find much to assist them, but they will have to keep constantly on the watch for errors, and must refuse to admit its authority when its rendering is unconvincing. Mr. Court speaks highly of his munshi, or native teacher, and in all probability he relied too implicitly upon him. These munshis generally understand their books very well, but their knowledge of English is often superficial and insufficient for precise verbal explanations; still more often their natural indolence and a disposition to flatter their pupils induce them to pass over difficulties by assuming to "what the munshi says."

The third chapter of the book describes the spring and rainy seasons. The word used by the author for "description" also means "praise," and so Mr. Court renders it. This word gives a key to the general character of the book; for, although the author probably intended his work to be taken as a description, it is in reality a panegyric. The chapter opens with describing the blooming of the numerous flowers, and the effect of the season in exciting the passion of love. Yellow is the nearest approach to paleness of which the dusky faces of India are capable. As we sing—

Prithee why so pale, fond lover?
Tell me why so wan and pale!

so Indians speak of the jaundiced looks of their love-lorn swains; and our author says, "the hues of the flowers make the yellowness of lovers' cheeks more conspicuous." If Mr. Court understood this, he has certainly contrived to conceal its point; for he translates the passage, "the colour (of the flowers) adds splendour to the golden hue of lovers," and adds a note that "the natives consider that the faces of people in love assume a golden tint." The author then goes on to describe the great spring festival called the Holi, which is celebrated with dance and song, and especially with swinging in the open air. This festival lasts several days, and, as this work states, its opening day is called the Panchamin Basant. Mr. Court, however, misinterprets his author, and says, "the Panchamin Basant, which comes before the Holi." This festival, like most others in the Hindu Calendar, is regulated by lunar reckoning; but, just about the same period as the Holi, there occurs the Nau-roz, or New Year's day of the solar year, "by which is meant the passing of the sun into the sign Aries, (and it falls) sometimes before and sometimes after the Holi; but, owing to the number of days (in one Calendar) being less than in the other, it so happens that after several years the Holi and the Nau-roz fall on the same day." For the words which we have put in italics there is not the slightest warrant in the original. The literal rendering is "The Nau-roz . . . occurs sometimes before and sometimes after the Holi, but only by a few days' interval; and after several years it so happens that the Holi and the Nau-roz fall together on the same day." Just indeed as we might speak of Easter and the 1st of April. In this chapter there is a much-admired passage, but those only who can read off the original with ease and fluency can appreciate its charms. It is a fair specimen of the Musajja, or prose with rhyme and cadence, of which we spoke in a previous article, and of which Afros was an accomplished master. A considerable portion of the work is written in this rhymed prose, and to give the European reader an idea of what it is like we offer the following imitation, which is strictly literal, more so indeed than Mr. Court's version, but it is not so full of repeated rhymes as the original:—

But the rainy season in this country displays the most exquisite charms. In the skies are clouds of every kind; from every quarter sweetly blows the wind. At once the earth becomes a verdant field; mountains like gardens seem, and gardens with beauty gleam. In the parterres blossom flowers of every kind; the thick and vivid trees together wind. Peculiar is the state of the brink-laving streams; unequalled now the beauty of the fresh young herbage seems. Every stream and brook and river is full; brimful of water is every lake and pond and pool. The verdure's vivid show, the red fly's burning glow; the lightning's flash, the thunder-cloud's crash, display a beautiful sight. The lines of cranes, the patter of the rains; the peacock's shriek, the sparrowhawk's (shrill) scream, all creatures' hearts incite. Every here and there posts are raised; to these the ropes are strung, on which the swings are hung. In them hundreds of fairy-faced damsels, clad in garments of various colours, are swinging. Some strive to give high motion to the swing, others the song of the festival sing; some lock their feet and swing together, some steal a heart and forget it (altogether).

The Holi, or spring festival, thus noticed typifies and celebrates the genial influence of spring upon reviving nature, and gives expression to those passionate feelings which are then evoked in the animal creation. It has many points of resemblance with the festivals and customs observed in the Western world at this season of the year, such as the Lupercalia of the Romans, the Carnival, and Valentine and All Fools days. It is a season of universal merriment and license. Music and dancing, swinging and feasting, are indulged in; amorous songs, more or less licentious, are openly sung; practical jokes are played off, and the revellers pelt each other with balls of red powder, or endeavour to drench each other with water; in fact, anything likely to promote a laugh and afford amusement is allowable. In some parts the "making of fools" takes a prominent part in the festival. The study of Comparative Mythology has of late made considerable progress; a searching comparison of the Fæti of different nations would in all probability be fruitful in results not less valuable and interesting. The spring festival is referable in its origin to natural causes, and it may have arisen independently in different parts of the world; but it is difficult to account for such practices as the throwing about of flour-balls and water, and the making of fools, except by supposing an identity of origin. Whether these are real or merely fanciful points of resemblance is certainly a question worthy of investigation. The late Professor H. H. Wilson more than twenty years ago opened an inquiry upon this subject by asking the Hindu Calendar for his basis, and instituting a comparison of the festivals and those of ancient Rome and modern France. His notices were very interesting and useful. The Chronological glated his task, and the inquiry ought to take a much wider range than he proposed to himself. Since that time the subject has attracted but little consideration, but it certainly deserves the attention of our scholars.

Returning to the work under notice, we find the following amusing account of the wild buffalo. We have slightly altered Mr. Court's translation to bring it into more exact agreement with the original:—

The wild buffalo is a very powerful, iron-framed animal. Its horns are a little more than a yard long, and are very sharp. Its colour is of a glossy black, as if smeared with oil. It is so brave that it does not fear the lion, and has no dread either of the elephant. If a lion comes between two buffaloes, one takes him up upon his horns and pitches him to the other; the other tosses him back in the same way, and so they do not let him take breath until his breath is gone.

The banking arrangements of the Hindus excited the admiration of their Muslim conquerors centuries ago, and their transactions are carried on just in the same way up to the present time with great precision. The following is the account given of them in this work:—

The bankers are so upright, that if any person place a thousand rupees securely with one of them by way of deposit, without any witnesses, then whenever he asks for it (the banker) will immediately make it over to him without any demand or delay. And if any one, by reason of fear of the road or any other cause, should deliver money into his charge on condition of receiving it at a specified city, or that it may be conveyed to his family there, then he (the banker) for a trifling profit takes the money, and on a small piece of paper writes a few words in the Hindu character, in the name of his agent whose shop is in that country, and neither puts it in an envelope nor seals it. When the person goes to him, that fair-dealing man without any demand pays over to him the money in accordance with the writing, that he may see the honesty and strictness of the business transactions of fair-dealing men; this kind of writing is called a darsani hundi, or bill at sight, and the commission is called hundawan. If a person wishes to send (money) in any one day's name, then the banker sends the paper with a letter to his agent, and gets the receipt from him, however far the road may be; this kind of writing they call simply a hundi (cheque). More wonderful still is this; if the holder of a bill at sight should (wish to) sell the paper to a banker at any other place than the specified city, he will take it immediately and pay over the money. Still more curious; if any merchant, from fear of the road, hands over his wares and goods to a banker, then these straightforward men receive their commission and convey the goods intact, in perfect safety and security, to where the owner directs, taking the (risk of) loss upon themselves—this kind of transaction is called Insurance.

In his geographical description of India the author goes through the whole country subject to the throne of Delhi, province by province, describing its chief towns, rivers, natural productions, revenues, and other points of interest. In describing Delhi, he begins by saying, that "from Hindoo and Persian histories it appears that the city of Hastinapur, on the banks of the Ganges, was in former times the capital of the Kings of India." He then runs through all the many changes of locality which the seat of Government underwent, and mentions the great fortifications and other buildings which were raised to the time of Shah Jahan, from whom Delhi received the name of Shah-Jahan-abad. "Its fort," he tells us, "of red stone, is built with such strength and elegance, that the tongue of the builder of fate becomes red in its praise, and to make one like it is an impossible task." Mr. Court puts a note to "red," and says, "that is, ashamed," but he misses the point; the word does not mean "ashamed," but it does mean "dumb" as well as red:—

Round the fort of Mutarak there is a very wide, broad, and deep ditch; its water is so pure and clear, that if a grain of poppy-seed should be lying at its bottom it would be clearly seen in a dark night, and if a blind man could dive into it, he would certainly bring it out. A mustard-seed can be seen at its bottom—Where is there this clearness in the lustre of pearls? And if a hair should fall into it, then it appears to the sight like the vein of the pearl.

The word vein is noted as meaning literally "hair," and so it does; for what the author says and means is, that if a hair is dipped in the water it looks like a hair of pearls—that is, the globules of water adhering to it make it like a string of pearls.

In the account of the district of Narnaul, in the province of Delhi, we miss an interesting passage in which the author lauds the pious zeal of a brother Muhammadan who razed the walls of a temple which a devout Hindu had begun to build. Taking the two great rivers, the Ganges and the Jumna, he traces them, not from their sources, because "the fountain springs are unknown," but from the mountains between India and China down to their junction at Allahabad, and thence till the united waters fall into the sea "by a thousand streams." About the country of Bakhbar, on the upper course of the Jumna, he tells us a wonderful story, of which we amend the translation, for Mr. Court has managed to make it unintelligible:—

In that country gold is abundant, and the reason of it is, that many pebbles of these parts possess the properties of the philosopher's stone, and iron and copper on touching them are converted into gold; but they (the pebbles) are not distinguishable; the inhabitants therefore show their bodies, women, and bullocks, and even their out to grass, and it often happens that their bones are converted into gold.

He makes story about the sanctity of the Ganges, and says that

The river is so holy that it is inhabited by spirits, thieves, and robbers, which may be accounted for by the circumstance that, as men's bodies are washed clean from their offences by bathing in it, their sins pass by way of transmigration into other human bodies, and then commit murder.

There is a legend about Calcutta and the buildings of the English, and this is his own work; for Calcutta came into existence long after the author of the original Persian work was dead:—

At a little distance from the city, on the south side, is the fortress of Fort

William. The foundation of it was laid after the victory of Plassey, in the time of Colonel Clive, but it looks as if it had been built to-day, and only now completed. Whatever provisions and requisites the host or the garrison can need are always in a state of readiness, or rather there is an immense and augmentation of these things from day to day. What can be said about its construction? Its construction is indeed unique, and the style of its building is quite new. No fort in this country equals it. From the outside the walls are like embankments, but in the inside they are very high. Who can get at its treasures? Who has the power of describing its security? Assuredly it exercises a magic spell over the world. The sight of it increases one's astonishment, and a walk about it deprives one of recollection.

He describes the various buildings, churches, mosques, and bazars, and the gardens. He even has a good word to say for the climate, which he declares to be "not so bad, and really excellent when compared with the olden time." In a poetical passage he ventures further, and says "its air is a subject of jealousy to the morning breezes; emeralds would take poison at (the sight of) its greenness, and at its redness the liver of coral would turn to blood"—in which metaphors he is not original, although extravagant. In the Hindustani there is a curious and somewhat difficult passage about the tide in the river Hooghly, which Mr. Court has not translated.

We have already had occasion to complain of Mr. Court's want of system in spelling, so we will say no more now about it. In the present work, he tells us, "names of places are spelt as in the original," and his intention was excellent, for local names have been strangely dealt with. It would have been more satisfactory, however, to the uninitiated if, in writing down such names as Kanhayat, Pitan Nadawat, Bhanouch, and Sarth, he had told his readers that they represent Kambay, Pattan Nahlwan, Brooch, and Surat.

CALENDAR OF STATE PAPERS.—DOMESTIC SERIES.*

IT might at first sight be expected that a volume of Addenda consisting of mere gleanings of State Papers would not be likely to contain much to interest a reader or to employ a reviewer; but a glance over the pages of Mrs. Green's new volume will suffice to convince any reader of the great value of the documents now for the first time brought to light by her. But before we go on to say anything of the contents of this valuable volume, we must not lose the opportunity of again drawing attention to the ludicrous difference between the first two volumes of this goodly Series of Domestic Papers edited by the late Mr. Robert Lemon and their continuation by Mrs. Green. The present volume exhibits that contrast in the most striking relief. There is an evident absurdity in speaking of this volume of Addenda so full of information on various obscure points of history as forming in any way a supplement to the Calendar of the same period published about fifteen years ago. The Addenda, occupying a period of thirteen years, fill a whole volume; the same sized volume under Mr. Lemon's care ran over a period of thirty-three years, and the portion of it corresponding in point of time to the present volume occupies about one hundred pages. The account of it is simply this—that the work, which was begun as a mere dry calendar of reference, giving the mere dates of the documents and two or three lines of information, just enough to identify the paper, has expanded into what it ought to have been from the first, a repository which will save the historical inquirer from the necessity of referring to the original documents. But it is on other grounds no reflection on Mrs. Green's predecessor that the gleanings amount to so large a harvest. The sources of most of these papers are entirely new, and such as Mr. Lemon had no access to. Only a few of them, consisting of accidentally misplaced documents which were dated, and of others which, from their being without date, had been assigned to a later period, could have been noticed in a Calendar whose contents were wholly derived from the old State Paper Office. A few have been hitherto classed as foreign papers, owing to the fact of their having been written abroad; but Mrs. Green is certainly entitled to rank them among Domestic Papers, being as they are for the most part written by English Catholic fugitives in France and the Low Countries.

The rest of the volume consists of certain documents which have been discovered in the Exchequer sacks, and have only been sorted during the last fourteen years, and of the Conway papers presented by the Marquis of Hertford, which among other valuable documents contain a collection of holograph letters from the Earl of Leicester to the Queen. There are several documents which relate to the Channel Islands, of which we will say nothing more than that they appear to be of mere local interest. The most interesting portion of the whole volume is that which relates to the Border Correspondence. The reason of its omission in its proper place in the first volume of the Series of Domestic Papers is that there was formerly a separate subdivision, the papers comprised in it being now divided into two classes—those which relate to Scotland being classed under the head of Foreign Papers, and those relating to the Northern counties being classed as they evidently ought to be, with the other papers of the Domestic Series. The consequence of this rearrangement of documents is that the present volume is enriched with a full and

Under the Direction of the Master of the Rolls, and with the sanction of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department. detailed account of the Northern rebellion under the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland in 1569-70. From October to June scarcely any other subject appears in the letters, which occupy more than one hundred pages of this Calendar, whilst from the scanty notices in Mr. Lemon's volume the reader could scarcely find out that there had been a rebellion at all, or at any rate such a rebellion as to justify the immense number of certificates of musters with which his Calendar of the summer months of 1569 abounds. The history of the rebellion has been dismissed by most historians in a very few pages, and we have here for the first time a fuller account of it than can be read even in Sir Cuthbert Sharp's History of the Rebellion in the North. The divided councils of the conspirators—some being in favour of the marriage of the Queen of Scots with the Protestant Duke of Norfolk, some being only for reformation of religion or naming a successor—may be read at length in the examination of the Earl of Northumberland, who, with the zeal of a new convert, having been reconciled to the Church of Rome only about two years before, objected to such a marriage, and had scruples as to the legality of a rebellion against an anointed prince as yet not excommunicated by the Pope. It must be remembered, that the celebrated Bull, Regnans in excelsis, was not fulminated till the spring of the following year, though Pius V. had issued a declaratory sentence amounting to the same effect as the Bull about a year earlier. So that it is somewhat to be wondered at that Northumberland should have felt any scruple on that score. The unembarrassed style of his answers to the questions put to him is very remarkable, as also is his frank avowal of the motives of his conversion:—"The great dissensions that ever have been among Protestants, I think sufficient to allure all godly and humble minds from the dangerous sects scattered among Protestants." He was committed to the care of Lord Hunsdon, who did not like his charge at all, being afraid of his making his escape and the fault being imputed to himself. He writes to Burghley, August 9, 1572, alleging that

The principal cause that I sought to prolong his execution was to have her understand his brother's doings towards her, for surely if his brother's affection towards the Scottish Queen and his other dealings towards Her Majesty be such as is commonly spoken, Her Majesty shall do herself a worse turn by setting the one up than by keeping the other alive; besides she will lose the benefit of his living, and as many as have any gift of hers of anything of his may pick a salad.

What reason Lord Hunsdon had for suspecting Sir Henry Percy does not appear. His zeal was perhaps greater than his sagacity. Certainly the Queen highly appreciated his services, for in a letter from Elizabeth, the draft of which was penned by Sir William Cecil, the Queen herself adds the following postscript:—

I doubt much, my Harry, whether that the victory were given me more joyed me, or that you were by God appointed the instrument of my glory; and I assure you for my country's good the first might suffice, but for my heart's contentation the second more pleased me. It likes me not a little that with a good testimony of your faith there is seen a stout courage of your mind, that more trusted to the goodness of your quarrel than to the weakness of your number. Well, I can say no more than beatus est ille servus quem, cum Dominus venerit, invenerit faciendo sua mandata; and that you may not think that you have done nothing for your profit, though you have done much for honour, I intend to make this journey somewhat to increase your livelihood, that you may not say to yourself perditur quod factum est ingrato.

Your loving kinswoman,
ELIZABETH R.

The reader must remember that the style in which the Queen addresses Hunsdon is partly accounted for by the fact that Henry Carey was literally her cousin, being the son of her mother's elder sister, Mary Boleyn, whose name has been so often of late quoted in connexion with Henry VIII.

Of the Queen herself the notices are but few, but there are as many as fourteen letters of Leicester, mostly addressed to the Queen. Perhaps the most curious is one written to Throckmorton, May 4, 1567, expressing, in very enigmatical terms, his sorrow at his having unwittingly offended. The letter evidently implies that the Queen had written to him and forbidden him to reply. Nevertheless, the Queen vouchsafed to reply to this indirect communication in the same indirect way. It is very remarkable that this letter from Throckmorton to Cecil, dated May 9, 1567 (not, as stated at p. 29, by mistake, July 9), is a copy in the handwriting of Mr. Lemon. Mrs. Green not having been able to discover the original. She has placed it in her preface, as it was not considered admissible into the body of the volume. The part of it which specially relates to Leicester's delinquency and the Queen's bearing towards him is as follows:—

Her Majesty read your letter over thrice together, and said you did mistake the camelion's property who doth change into all colours according to the object, save white, which is innocency. At your cypher, the black heart, she showed sundry affections, some merry, some sorrowful, some betwixt both. She did much commend the manner of your writing. Then she wished me to show her what your Lordship had written to me. She read my letter twice, and put it in her pocket. Then I demanded of her whether she would write to your Lordship. She plucked forth my letter and said, "I am glad at the length he hath confessed a fault in himself, for he asketh pardon." I said, "Madam, do you mean in your letter or in mine?" "In yours," she answered. I said, "That which you mean is but a conditional supposed proposition." Then she read again my letter, and said, "Here is enough to suffice me." "Yes," said I, "and to accuse your Majesty also." "Whereof?" said she. "Of extreme rigour," said I. Then she smiled, and put up my letter. I asked again whether Her Majesty would write to your Lordship. She said, "I will bethink myself all this day." I do judge by Sir M. Lee she meant to send your Lordship a token and some message. To Mr. Carey, she hath said you have confessed a fault in yourself.

the Queen was possessed, but there is nothing either in this or in any other of the letters which passed to indicate more specially the nature of the connexion that existed between them. In another letter addressed to Elizabeth he speaks of himself and his brother, the Earl of Warwick, as her urus major and urus minor, and the symbol by which in this and most of his other letters he designates himself is your old eyes, the word eyes not being written, but a pair of eyes drawn in the place of it.

The volume contains some interesting notices connected with the projected marriage of Elizabeth with the Duke of Anjou, and especially "a discourse" on the subject by the Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal, Sir Nicholas Bacon. It is only a copy, and, as we conjecture from its being found amongst the Domestic Papers of James I., made during the succeeding reign. Mrs. Green naturally assigns 1570 as the probable date of its composition, but makes no suggestion as to the period to which the handwriting of the copy belongs.

The Lord Keeper was of opinion, like most of her other loyal subjects, that the Queen should marry without delay, and indeed, considering that she was now thirty-seven years old, it was high time for her to marry if she were going to marry at all. The abstract consideration of the expediency of marriage, however, did not help to determine who should be the person to be fixed on for the dangerous and difficult office of husband to the Queen, who, if an Englishman were selected, would have been at once her subject and her lord. Sir Nicholas had considered the subject under both these bearings, and in regard to the domestic aspect of the affair seems to have inclined to the opinion that by marrying at home "she would be most assured beforehand of the qualities of the person"; neither on political grounds does he appear to think such a marriage would have been objectionable. In the remainder of the paper the writer discusses at length the advantages and disadvantages that might ensue from a marriage with Henry Duke of Anjou, the brother of Charles IX., King of France. The disadvantages were fairly stated—namely, the difference of age and religious connexions of the parties, the dislike the English might feel to a French prince, heir presumptive to the Crown of France, his brother Charles having only just before married Elizabeth of Austria, the daughter of the Emperor Maximilian. There was again the danger of his not having any issue by the Queen, in which case he might "encroach the crown to himself" by the help of his brother and the Pope; or, on the other hand, "if the Scottish Queen should remain unmarried, it might be dangerous to the shortening of Her Majesty's life, lest some insinuation might light on the heart of the Duke to attain to the marriage of the Queen of Scots, thereby to continue possession of the Crown of England, and conjoin the Kingdom of England, Scotland, and Ireland in her own person." There was, lastly, the fear of a rupture between England and Spain. Thus far one might have thought it a fair statement of the difficulties involved in a match with the Duke, as compared with the case of the Queen's selecting an Englishman for her husband. The Queen herself probably never really intended to accept the Duke, though negotiations apparently were only finally broken off on the score of the Duke's refusing to conform to the Reformed faith; but if the Lord Keeper was instructed to draw up this paper of pros and cons, it is scarcely conceivable but that he drew up his answers to the objections with a special eye to their being seen by the Queen. It must be remembered in reading the following answers that the husband proposed to Elizabeth, who had now reached the mature age of thirty-seven, was a boy of eighteen. They run as follows:—

Answers.—It were to be wished that he were older, and yet his stature and person is manly and comely; but as it is he shall have cause to esteem Her Majesty as shall become him, both because she is in person, beauty, and all gifts of nature the best and goodliest Princess in Christendom, and also in sight to behold not inferior to any other Princess of the Duke's own age; neither is her age to be judged by her visage, but thereby she may be esteemed of equal age with him. She is also a Queen of a nation, and such a one as all Christendom, nor the rest of the known world, has the like to be married, considering her person, her gifts, and her kingdoms; she is also so wise as it is probable she shall always provoke and direct him to love and honour her, besides that he has no kingdoms or countries to resort to, nor war to maintain, as King Philip had, who by pretence thereof absented himself, and by absence abated his love.

It is not worth while to speculate on the singular state of things which would have existed four years later if this match had been brought about. The death of Charles IX. placed the Duke on the throne of France. But, in truth, there never was a chance. That it should be the talk of the day, and appear to be on the cards, suited the purposes both of Elizabeth and Catherine de' Medici. But Elizabeth was too deeply implicated with her English lovers to have ever seriously entertained the idea of a foreign marriage, and the Queen-Mother of France was sagacious enough to know that the very suspicion of such a marriage being in contemplation would win the affections of the Protestant party.

We have dwelt on two of the principal subjects which occupy this interesting volume, and are obliged to leave unnoticed a number of letters which illustrate the religious and political condition of England, and which show how much remains to be gleaned by publishers of the writings of the Reformers before it can be said that the editions of their works are complete. But why has Mrs. Green given us no analysis of the last document she has chronicled, consisting of 150 pages of "A discourse in favour of the Queen's proposed marriage with the Duke of Anjou, the younger brother have been interesting to know what could be said in favour of the Queen at forty-six marrying a prince of twenty-five which could fill a book of such dimensions as that.

SCENES IN THE SUNNY SOUTH.*

COLONEL VEREKER'S volume is a very good example of a class of books which appears to be alarmingly on the increase, and as to which it seems to be desirable that some remonstrance should be offered. In delivering a verdict upon a book of travels the critic has a very much simpler issue before him than in the case of most other classes of literature. A biography, for instance, though it may be unsatisfactory as a life of its subject, may be meritorious as a picture of his time; or, failing in both of these respects, it may yet have a claim in virtue of the store of anecdotes it contains. A novel may be worthless as a story, but yet deserve commendation for the truth and vigour with which its characters are drawn, or for its descriptions of scenery, or for its sketches of rural life. But a book of travels must take its stand upon one or other of two pleas; either that it opens up new ground, or that, going over old ground, it renovates the subject by freshness of treatment or originality of observation. Thus poor Captain Speke's journal of the so-called discovery of the source of the Nile was not in itself a brilliant production, but a very much clumsier and duller book would still have been welcome coming from the terra incognita of equatorial Africa. As an example of the other sort we may take Eothen. There is no portion of the earth's service that has been so often travelled over and written about, from the time of Sir John Mandeville down to our own days, as Syria and the Holy Land; yet what reader is there who has gone over the ground with "Eothen" and has even for a moment felt that he was travelling along a well-beaten track?

Put upon its trial in this way, Colonel Vereker's book of travels, we must say, fails to justify its existence, and consequently its author must be held to have incurred the penalties—would that they were severer than they are!—of having wantonly written an uncalled-for book, helped to encumber the shelves of the British Museum, and, as far as two volumes octavo can do it, raised the price of rags. He has been over no ground that has not been travelled and described again and again, yet he has treated every place he has visited just as if he was its original discoverer. There is no earthly reason why a man going over a beaten track should not write about it if he is so minded. Even a Rhine tourist is not to be debarred from writing about the Rhine if he likes to try his hand in that way; but we have a right to protest if he invites us to sit down to a dish of crambe repetita about "Coblentz, the Confluents of the Romans," "Bacharach, in which we trace the words Bacchi ara," "Mainz, the birthplace of Gutenberg, and cradle of the art of printing," and so forth. If he does not perceive that all this sort of thing has long since passed out of his hands, and become the exclusive property of the guide and handbook compiler, pen, ink, and paper should be taken away from him; or, if he must absolutely write, he should be obliged to put his needless information on a separate sheet, not intended for publication, as Mr. Dick, in David Copperfield, did with the head of Charles I. The line of country over which Colonel Vereker has travelled is not, to be sure, quite so regular a beat of the vacation tourist as the banks of the Rhine, but it is rather too familiar to the reading and travelling public to be dealt with in this way. Cadiz, Seville, Cordova, and Granada are not Timbuctoo or Cashgare, that the adventurous traveller should feel it incumbent on him to enter into a full and elaborate account of their history, antiquities, and curiosities, as if he were some Barth or Marco Polo, "the first who ever burst into that silent sea." Colonel Vereker would have done better if he had borne in mind, and applied to his own case, what he himself says in a digression on sporting dogs. Speaking of the Spanish fashion of making pointers retrieve, he says, "I think our division of labour between retrievers and pointers or setters is the wisest arrangement." Equally wise is that division of labour which assigns to the guide-book all matters connected with the history, chronology, archaeology, or statistics of any place, leaving the occasional traveller to record his own experiences and impressions, the ideas that have occurred to him, the accidents that have happened to him, the incidents that have been observed by him, and so forth. After all, when one comes to think of it, why should a gentleman, because he happens to have enjoyed bed and breakfast in a town, be accepted as an authority upon its origin and history? It would be just as reasonable to expect that a man who goes up in a balloon should come down an astronomer. Of the cutlets, coffee, and fess he may be qualified to speak, and on these and similar subjects we are bound to receive his communications with all the respect due to experience; but as regards the other matters, we cannot see how he can claim any advantage over people who have never set eyes on the place. This is what scribbling tourists on beaten tracks are continually forgetting. Some indeed go even further than this; at the mere sight of a place out of the railway-carriage window they become so highly charged with historical information that they have to fill at least a couple of pages before they are themselves again. In this category of forgetful tourists we are compelled to place Colonel Vereker. He seems to be entirely oblivious of the existence of Murray's, O'Shea's, and Bradshaw's Manuals on Spain, and of Plesse and about half-a-dozen other guides for Algeria, not to speak of a whole lending-libraryful of "Tours," "Travels," and "Impressions" relating to both countries; oblivious, that is to say, in writing these volumes, for in their smother there is a very strong flavour of redundant guide-book. Sometimes, it is true, he betrays a kind of consciousness of the fact that some one else has been on the spot before him, and that there are extant certain scraps of information relating to it. Thus a half-suspicion crosses his mind as he is entering upon the subject of the Alhambra that it is one with which probably a good number of his readers are already tolerably familiar:—

Of Seville and Cordova [he says] I have spoken freely, because comparatively little is known of them by the public at large beyond their salient point of possessing lovely cathedrals; but who is not familiar with the enchanted precincts of the Alhambra? Bearing these reflections in mind, I shall merely take a touch-and-go canter through the fairy scene, lightly sketching the impressions I received.

His idea of a touch-and-go canter is somewhat peculiar, for his pace in reality is that of a most deliberate, not to say slow, cicero, and he does the fairy scene as methodically as the old housekeeper who conducted Mr. Snob over Castle Carabas. Nobody, we imagine, wants this sort of thing. The stay-at-home reader would very much prefer something more picturesque and lively, and the traveller can always get it at first hand in the pages of the guide-book, and unadulterated by mistakes. It is perhaps like looking a gift horse in the mouth to object to inaccuracy in gratuitous information; but Colonel Vereker abuses his privileges. He shows a curious ingenuity in mistakes. Such slips as los for las, Banderas for Banderaz, Ribatta for Ribalta, any one could make; but he must be especially gifted who can get three mistakes into the spelling of one name, as in "Argate de Mollinas" for "Argote de Molina." But this, as an instance of condensed blunder, is nothing to the scrap of history to which the reader is treated à propos of Cordova. "It was known," he says, "to the Phœnicians, and it is mentioned by Silius Italicus; but we must pass over the history of Cordova until the middle of the thirteenth century" (doubtless his readers will respond as the late Duke of Sussex used to do whenever the words "Let us pray" occurred in the Liturgy—"Oh! by all means, by all means"!), "when Ferdinand entered the city in triumph, and as at Seville, Granada, and all through Spain, drove out the polished, wealthy, and industrious Moor. Even the matchless mosque—the finest type in Europe of the true temple of Islam—he ruined in appearance by tasteless interior additions, carried on until the reign of his grandson Charles V., who angrily exclaimed, when he beheld what had been done," &c., &c., as per Ford's Handbook. How the historical studies of ingenious youth would be lightened if historians would only adopt now and then the simple plan of Colonel Vereker—knock two troublesome characters into one, and at a single stroke get rid of a couple of centuries with all their tiresome dates and events, as is here done in this felicitous confusion of St. Ferdinand, the conqueror of Cordova in 1235, with Ferdinand of Aragon, the conqueror of Granada in 1492! Some trifling perplexities in comparative chronology would probably be the result; for example, the defeat of the Armada, which must be allowed to have taken place in the time of the great-grandson of this compound Ferdinand, would have to be put back to somewhere about the date of the battle of Crécy. But no doubt a historiographer who found no difficulty in the first case would prove himself equal to the second. As Johnson said of Boswell, we do not say Colonel Vereker should be hanged or drowned for this, but we do maintain that we have a grievance against a man who has forced upon us an article we do not want, when that article turns out to be worthless.

He does very much better when he gets to Algeria, and this we are inclined to attribute to the fact that there is no Ford or O'Shea for that country. French guides there are in abundance, but they do not deal extensively in the kind of matter which Colonel Vereker evidently loves, having seldom more to say about any place than that Absinthville contains three hundred and six inhabitants, a bureau arabe, and a café-billard, and that when the road is made there can be no doubt it will not delay to become a town of the highest importance. Still he cannot prevail upon himself to set foot upon the soil of Africa until he has taken the reader upon a cheerful ramble all through the early history of that continent, or at least of its north-western provinces. "It would be tedious," he says, "to relate the long contests between Carthage and Rome"; and then he relates them. And when he has disposed of Hannibal, Hædrubal, Scipio, Syphax, the slaves who were liberated, and the women who cut off their hair, he attacks Gelimor, Genæric, Helisarius, and the Vandals with a vigour and zeal that almost lead one to suspect he must be writing under an impression that in some recent orthodox outburst all the copies of Gibbon's Decline and Fall have been destroyed except that one which happily remains in his possession, and that it has fallen to him as a sacred duty to render imperishable the annals of all these persons. After about twenty pages of this kind of thing, he remarks, with the most charming naïveté, that he fears the chapter has been found dry by some of his readers, and that looking up the necessary authorities has been a laborious task to himself. For all parties it is a pity he has given way so much to what Sam Weller would have called "that there uncompromising spirit of his," for we very much fear that those who want the history of the Barbary States will not go to Colonel Vereker's book for it, and those who want his book will not look at his history of the Barbary States.

THE POSITION OF THE GOVERNMENT.

UP to the time when Parliament reassembled after the short Easter vacation the course of affairs was on the whole favourable to the Government. They surmounted, although with extreme difficulty, the embarrassment caused by Sir ROBERT COLLIER'S appointment. The Opposition succeeded in frightening and discrediting them without forcing them to consider the consequences of a decidedly hostile vote. The defeat in the Lords was arrested by the barest possible majority; but the personal respect felt for the CHANCELLOR, and the frankness and sincerity he displayed in making his defence, whatever his arguments may have been worth, prevented his incurring the vote of censure which he avowedly anticipated. In the Commons the issue was at one time exceedingly uncertain, and it was only at the last hour and by extreme exertion that the Government managed to get together enough support to give it a small majority. Still the danger was over, and the scandal began to be forgotten. Mr. CARDWELL'S army measure was a decided success; and, although Mr. LOWE'S Budget was very unambitious, the payers of Income-tax naturally regarded it as perfectly unobjectionable. Mr. GOSCHEN disarmed opposition by announcing that he intended to undo much of what Mr. CHILDERS had done. As the negotiations with America were still going on, no opportunity for attacking the Government with regard to the Treaty of Washington had offered itself. Mr. DISRAELI went to Manchester, and opened out the vials of his epigrammatic wrath on his adversaries. But he had obviously not much to say against them that had reference to current politics, and they could bear with indifference any amount of abuse for their great Irish measures, in carrying which the House of Commons and the country had given them such cordial and unwavering support. He had no political course to recommend to his supporters, and his silence on the Ballot showed that he could not get his party to follow him in the determined resistance which he had previously announced that he should offer to the measure. Lord DUNSTON urgently advised the Conservatives to be patient, to give the Government time enough to get into as many scrapes as possible, and, above all things, not to snatch at office by a momentary coalition with discontented Liberals. The Government therefore might reasonably hope that after Easter they would have a tolerably quiet time. They had got out of their worst scrapes; they had produced one good measure, they had offered no new handle for attack, and their adversaries had announced that it was the true policy of the Opposition to keep them in office for the present. This was by no means a glorious position. It betokened a very different state of things from that which existed when Mr. GLADSTONE was the People's WILLIAM. But it was at least moderately safe, and if Mr. GLADSTONE continued to believe that an immutable law of nature limits the popularity of a Liberal Government within a term of three years, he might console himself by the thought that the form in which, so far as he was concerned, the law was manifesting itself, was not a very painful or humiliating one to him and his colleagues.

But lately things have been going badly with the Government. On Monday an amendment which they pronounced almost fatal to their Ballot Bill was carried against them by a majority of one, and on this occasion the Conservatives could not resist the pleasure of coalescing with the discontented Liberals. On Tuesday a resolution which they stigmatised as disordering their whole system of Finance was carried against them by the overwhelming majority of a hundred, and Mr. GLADSTONE must have recalled with bitterness the days when he used to have majorities of a hundred always at his command, and everything was bright and beautiful in his eyes. On Wednesday a Licensing Bill intended to rival that of the Government was brought forward, and Mr. BRUCE was in a terrible strait. A majority prepared to vote for the second reading confronted him, and as a means of escape he proposed the adjournment of the debate. But he was not sure of a majority even in this humble proposal, and he therefore had to take refuge in getting the Bill talked out. It was the clock that saved the Government from a third defeat in three days. Lastly, on Thursday the Government found itself again in a minority on that point in the Ballot Bill on which it had been defeated on Monday; and this time the defeat occurred after the most strenuous efforts had been made to avert it. How has all this happened? Why is the Liberal majority so slack and backward? The question of the proper incidence of local taxation is one perhaps on which opinions may be fairly divided, without reference to party, and the offer made by the Government last year to devote the proceeds of the House-tax to local purposes may have reasonably been held by Liberals to have absolved them from the duty of upholding the Government in its present refusal to let the Imperial taxpayer help the local ratepayer. But the first use of a good working majority is to snuff out amendments of detail prejudicial to the success of a main Ministerial measure, and to clear out of the way attempts of the Opposition to take out of the hands of the Government the framing and conduct of measures on which it is itself engaged. The Conservatives attend the House enthusiastically, and the Liberals do not; and it is a question well worth considering why the attendance of Liberals on whom the Ministry can rely is so precarious. The main cause, we believe, is to be found in the peculiar reasons which make a dissolution at present difficult or almost impossible. The Government could not venture to dissolve. The discomfiture of its adherents is a matter of certainty. It would have a majority perhaps, but it would be a majority painfully small as compared with that which supported Mr. GLADSTONE when he took office, and there is no possible ground on which the Government could base a confident appeal to the people. The Conservatives, on the other hand, let it be understood that they do not wish for a dissolution at present. They want to defer a new election until it would give them a majority, and not merely reduce the majority against them. Wavering Liberals think, therefore, that they are perfectly safe for the present, and that, whatever they do or refuse to do, they cannot for some time be called to account by their constituents. Meanwhile it may seem to them prudent to lie by and not to commit themselves too much. They may think that it will not be well to mix up too intimately their personal fortunes with those of a blundering and ill-starred Government. It is natural that they should attentively meditate over the example of the SOLICITOR-GENERAL, who, when reproached on seeking to be re-elected for Dover with the badness of the Licensing Bill of last year, took credit for having opposed it, and for having exposed the folly of the Ministry he had subsequently joined. Possibly when the next election comes it may be a comfort to an anxious candidate to be able to assure his Liberal friends that he boldly withstood the Government on the Ballot, that he had tried to relieve them from paying for the support of local lunatics, and that he was present at and deeply deplored the sad spectacle of a Licensing Bill, on which many publicans have bestowed their blessing, being talked out of existence by the allies of a wavering and faint-hearted Ministry.

If Liberals were sure that it would answer for them at the next election to come forward as the unhesitating and uncompromising supporters of Mr. GLADSTONE, they would have a better guide to action. Two years ago, for a Liberal to have taken any other line would have been equivalent to throwing away in many constituencies all hope of success. Now the best chance of Liberal candidates would be to stand by the simple and majestic truth that they are Liberals, and that, if they are accepted at all, they have a fair claim to have the organization of their party put in motion on their behalf. They would pass gently and tenderly over the history of the Ministry, and of their connexion with it. If they mentioned Mr. GLADSTONE at all, they would take care to confine themselves to the mythical period of his Ministry when he was a hero and slew the Irish Church and freed Irish land. The recent annals of his Ministry are not an inviting subject for his friends. The Government cannot catch the humours or win the confidence or affection of the people just now; and of this there are two obvious causes. The one thing which the English people above all requires in a Ministry is that it should manage the foreign affairs of the nation with discretion and vigilance. No one can say that lately the foreign affairs of England, as regards the United States, have been managed with either discretion or vigilance. The Ministers were in far too great a hurry to conclude a Treaty, however obscure might be its provisions; and after it was concluded they regarded with culpable negligence and apathy the difficulties that sprang out of it, until they were stirred into activity by the appeals of the public. Then, again, they daily show inaptitude for the despatch of public business. After three years' delay they produce in the House of Lords their great measure of Law Reform, and it is half killed before it can be properly said to be born by the damaging criticisms of the CHIEF JUSTICE. In the House of Commons night after night is wasted in the discussion of a measure, the details, the scope, and the consequences of which are not in the least understood by the Minister who has charge of it. Mr. GLADSTONE, too, uses none of the arts of a leader, and studiously lives in a little world of his own, inaccessible to the wishes, the advice, or the remonstrances of his party. The retirement of Mr. BRIGHT damped the enthusiasm with which the more ardent Liberals once regarded the Ministry, and there is no subordinate of Mr. GLADSTONE who can rally, guide, or charm his supporters. If Mr. GLADSTONE does not keep his party together, there is no one else to do it. At one time it seemed as if Mr. FORSTER might have filled the useful office of the PREMIER's right-hand man. But he has provoked, however undeservedly, the enmity of the Nonconformists, and his collapse on the Ballot Bill has shown that he does not appreciate how much is demanded of a statesman who aspires to pass beyond the list of clever, useful officials. No doubt the misfortunes of the Government are not wholly their own fault. Much is looked at in dark colours now which would have been passed over as immaterial if they had been in the full tide of success. In many directions they are trying to do their work well, and they have carefully refrained this Session from giving vague hints of vast projects and encouraging random hopes. But as much may almost always be said of a Ministry. A Government that is losing ground, that is talked of generally with little respect and much distrust, is not necessarily composed of inefficient public servants neglecting their duty. All that can be said in most instances is what may be said now of Mr. GLADSTONE's Government; that it does not get on well, that through its demerit or ill-luck it does not practically succeed, that its supporters do not support it, and that its opponents alternately ridicule and patronize it.

THE GENEVA ARBITRATION.

THE Note or Protest which has been presented to the Arbitrators at Geneva may or may not be sufficient for its purpose. The English Government consistently adheres to the almost deferential tone in which it has from the beginning of the negotiations attempted, with little success, to consult American susceptibility. It was probably for the purpose of avoiding any dispute which might have arisen from the presentation of the Counter Case that Lord GRANVILLE anxiously convinced himself that the American Government would not take advantage of a proceeding which seemed to tend to the hindrance of the arbitration. General SCHENCK assured him that the Counter Case might be delivered without prejudice to the position which the English Government had assumed in the correspondence. After expressing his own opinion, the American Minister obtained the authority of his Government to repeat a declaration which is unfortunately ambiguous. It was not to be expected after previous experience that the implied proposition should be understood by the American Government in the sense which it conveys to an English understanding. When Lord TENTERDEN presented the Counter Case and the Protest to the American agents, Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS professed surprise, and entire ignorance of the intentions of his Government. There can be no doubt that he will be prepared to reconcile his statements with the language of the American Minister in London, but it would seem that General SCHENCK's communication must have been less significant than it appeared to Lord GRANVILLE. The American Government will perhaps contend that the Arbitrators were already fully seized of the litigation, and that consequently the presentation of the Counter Case, with or without an accompanying Protest, could neither increase nor diminish the liability of England to be bound by the result of an unauthorised inquiry. It would have been more dignified and more prudent to decide on the course which was to be adopted without reference to the wishes or suggestions of an astute opponent. It must have occurred to the English Ministers that General SCHENCK had some object to promote by his considerate declaration. The American Government has hitherto, without a shadow of pretext, insisted on referring to the Arbitrators the preliminary issue of the scope and extent of the original reference; and it was perhaps thought that, if England could be induced to proceed to another stage in the pleadings, the Tribunal might be induced to enlarge its own powers with the apparent sanction of both litigants. It is true that, if no Counter Case had been presented, the pleadings would still under the provisions of the Treaty have been complete. It was possible that one or both parties might consider a replication unnecessary, and elect to rely on the arguments and statements of the original Case; but when the first documents were delivered to the Tribunal, Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS's offensive tirade had not raised the question of the extent and meaning of the reference. The English Case could by no possibility be supposed to recognize the admissibility of the insolent demand for 300,000,000*l.* on account of the pretended prolongation of the war. The Counter Case, on the other hand, has been framed with full notice of the extravagant pretensions of the American agents; and it might, by a possible error of judgment, be regarded as a condonation of the miscarriage. The American Government probably by this time suspects that the advocate whom it thought fit to employ has overreached himself and his clients; but Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS still represents the United States, and he disregards or explains away the formal assurances of the American Minister in London.

The indirect language of the Protest might have been advantageously exchanged for plainer English. The Arbitrators are not bound to have read the Correspondence to which they are referred for an explanation of the determination of the English Government. If they are so inclined, they may declare that, although the Counter Case may have been presented without prejudice, no notice has been given of the determination to reject the competence of the Arbitrators to deal with the indirect claims. It would have been easy to announce that, unless the American demand is withdrawn before the 15th of June, the Arbitration will, as far as England is concerned, become finally impossible. The position taken in the Correspondence may be represented as an assertion of a right to repudiate the jurisdiction, without any express announcement of the resolution to exercise the right to the fullest extent. The Americans are probably not yet disabused of their natural belief in the unbounded pliability of the English Government. It is certain that every phrase which can be twisted into ambiguity will be interpreted in the sense most favourable to the American contention, and that no overture will be spared which seems likely to procure fresh concessions. It will be too late to withdraw when the arbitration has once commenced. The Americans have repeatedly, and with probable sincerity, declared that they attach little importance to the amount of money which may be awarded; and a triumph over England would cause universal gratification. If the Arbitrators could be persuaded, after taking cognizance of the indirect claims, to award a gross sum, however small, a part of the amount would be assumed to represent the claims to which the English nation has unanimously assented. As in the case of AJAX and ULYSSES, the prize would remain with the disputant who had forced his adversary against his will to engage in the contest. The sole argument of those American journals which urge the prosecution of the indirect claims is that it is impossible for their Government to admit that it has been guilty of error or of an attempt at extortion. The inference that the injured party must give way to the wrongdoer is highly characteristic. It is not known that, with the exception of Mr. SUMNER and a few of the more violent enemies of England, any American politician of character and status still affects to regard as reasonable the claim of damages for the prolongation of the war. Even a French Professor of Law, who has been induced to publish a pamphlet in favour of the American proposal of submitting the question to the Arbitrators, carefully guards himself against the discreditable suspicion that he has any disposition to maintain the validity of the actual claims. It must be confessed that the difficulty of retreating from a false position was increased by the unaccountable delay of the English Government in remonstrating against Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS's extravagant demands.

The Protest itself incidentally illustrates the readiness of the English Government to make any concession for which a reasonable pretext can be found. The American Commissioners adroitly included the expenses of their own cruisers among the direct claims, when they offered to waive the equally indirect claims for insurance and prolongation of the war in consideration of an amicable settlement. The terms of the Treaty referred only to the claims which had in the official Correspondence been preferred exclusively on behalf of private citizens. If the previous negotiation has no bearing on the Treaty, the claims for the supposed expenses of the American navy are excluded from the reference; but although there are indications that the amount of the demand for watching the Confederate cruisers will be exorbitant, the English Government considers itself bound by the understanding recorded in the Protocol of the 10th of May. The risk incurred may perhaps not be considerable, inasmuch as it is difficult to imagine that any Arbitrator will recognize so remote a kind of consequential damage. In this case, as on other occasions, the English Commissioners thought it no part of their duty to check American exactions. As the audacious assumption of their acuter colleagues was allowed to pass without protest at the time, the English Government rightly holds itself bound by the tacit omission of its obliging representatives.

The rumour of a disposition on the part of the American Government to withdraw or modify its pretensions has within a few days acquired a certain amount of consistency. There can be little doubt that the PRESIDENT and the SECRETARY of STATE have by this time satisfied themselves that they have made a muddle; and they may reasonably apprehend the unpopularity which they are likely to incur if they cause the failure of their boasted Treaty. Their unsuccessful experiment on the patience of a long-suffering nation has already crippled many useful enterprises by the blow which has been inflicted on credit; but great merchants and money-dealers form a small minority of the population, and there is every reason to suppose that general opinion is opposed to any kind of retraction. If the long-delayed answer to Lord GRANVILLE's Note should contain any kind of overture, it is to be hoped that Parliament will, by seasonable pressure, restrain the Government from a hasty abandonment of its position. It is, after late experience, absolutely necessary to take care that there shall be no verbal ambiguity on which subsequent pretensions may be founded. The Government which directed General SCHENCK to encourage the presentation of a Counter Case accompanied by a Protest simultaneously instructed Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS to profess surprise at the delivery of the document. In the almost certain contingency of an ultimate failure of the Treaty, the English Government will be reproached for the timid and hesitating language which has been used in the fear of offending the adverse party; yet Americans must be strangely misinformed if they are capable of doubting that the national resolution is both definite and irrevocable.

THE BATTLE OF THE BALLOT BILL.

THE Government sustained on Thursday night a very decisive defeat on a point which it had magnified into one of great importance. The question was, whether a voter who wilfully showed his voting-paper at the time of voting should be liable to be imprisoned for doing so. The Government, after having had ample time to consider, announced that they deemed it indispensable that a voter so acting should be liable to imprisonment. Mr. HARCOURT on Monday night opposed the notion of punishing a voter for making known how he voted, and Mr. FAWCETT declared that it was a detestable piece of tyranny to prevent an Englishman from letting all the world know in what manner he had exercised a public trust. Seventeen Liberals joined the ranks of the Conservatives, and an amendment moved by Mr. HARCOURT was carried by a majority of one. On Thursday the Government made very great efforts to secure a reversal of this decision. There was a very full House, and great excitement. Mr. HARCOURT again led the attack on the Government, and was loudly cheered and applauded by his newly-found Conservative friends; but it was evident that there was a much more serious danger for the Government than any indicated by the union of free-lance Liberals and excited Conservatives. Sir GEORGE GAST and Mr. CHILDERS both announced that they must vote against the Government, and although this somewhat relieved the impending division from being, if adverse to the Government, a party triumph to the Opposition, yet it showed how great was the risk which the Government was running. At last the division was taken, and a majority of twenty-eight pronounced against Mr. GLADSTONE. He was at once invited to explain whether he intended to abandon the Bill, an element which he had represented as essential to its proper constitution having been taken away from it. He replied that, much as he regretted the decision of the House, he thought that the Bill still contained enough that was valuable in it to warrant him in persevering. In this he was undoubtedly right. Mr. CHILDERS is a warm advocate of the Ballot, but he voted against the proposal of the Government on the ground that in Australia a similar security for secret voting had been actually adopted, and had been abandoned after experience of its working had been obtained, while all the advantages that he saw in the Ballot had been found to have been secured without it. The Government could not have withdrawn the Bill altogether because it did not contain a proviso which an advocate of the Ballot, one of their own surest friends, and till lately a member of the Cabinet, opposed on the ground that practically it had not been found of any great use or importance. Mr. GLADSTONE answered Mr. CHILDERS by saying that what might be true of Australia need not be true of England, and this is one of those vague statements which no one can deny. But when it came to a question of giving up the Bill, it was impossible that the results of Australian experience adduced by Mr. CHILDERS should not have their effect, and should not render it absurd to abandon the great Bill of the Session on a point where arguments were doubtful, and the only experience attainable was against the Government.

But this was not all. The line taken by the Liberal party and by the Government last Session—and, still more, the blunders of the Government on this very point this Session—had made it impossible that the Ministry should now contend that the proposal to impose a severe penalty on the voter should be taken as an essential part of a Ballot Bill. The House of Commons last year adopted a provision inflicting on a voter showing his voting-paper a pecuniary penalty, and none of the Liberals who now say that a mere pecuniary penalty will be wholly inoperative, and that the Bill will be a mere sham without a penalty of imprisonment being attached to the offence, had then a word to say against that which they this Session so vehemently condemn. But before the Bill left the Commons Mr. FORSTER, in order to secure, if possible, its passing in the Upper House, decided to cut out of it all that was not material to its operation, and he actually, with the assent of his party, cut out as immaterial the infliction of even a pecuniary penalty on the voter. The Bill which the Lords were invited to sanction, and for refusing to consider which they were so severely blamed by some extreme Liberals, was a Bill in which there was no provision for punishing the voter. This year, after ample time for reflection, the Government brought in their Bill, and again there was no clause in it punishing the voter. When Mr. LEATHAM proposed to inflict the penalty of imprisonment, Mr. FORSTER agreed on behalf of the Government to be content with a pecuniary penalty, and he was only argued into adopting the penalty of imprisonment by some of his supporters. It was ridiculous, after all this, to speak of a Ballot Bill as worth nothing unless it contained some such provision as Mr. LEATHAM desired to insert. Mr. HARCOURT made the most of the opportunity thus afforded him. The Government was in such a mess that, wherever he chose to hit them, his blows could hardly fail to strike home. He could say with perfect truth that he was doing nothing more than asking the House to adopt the Government Bill as it was sent to the Lords last year, and as it passed the second reading in the Commons this year. The argument as a personal one against the Ministry was unanswerable. If the proposal to imprison the voter for showing his voting-paper was a vital and essential part of the Bill, how did it happen that Mr. FORSTER struck out of last year's Bill, as immaterial, the provision for inflicting a much lighter penalty, that he brought in a Bill this year inflicting no penalty at all, and that after a proposal to punish by imprisonment had been made, he avowed that he would be content with a pecuniary penalty? The division was not altogether a party triumph for the Conservatives, for no one could believe that Mr. CHILDERS and Sir GEORGE GREY were like the ordinary discontented Liberals who enjoy a defeat of the Government as much as the Conservatives do. But in one way it was a party triumph, which was felt in a perfectly legitimate manner, for it recorded the dismay of the House at finding how very imperfectly the Ministry understood their own measure, and how very little thought had been bestowed on the preparation of a Bill of the first order of importance.

If we forget the past history of the Bill, and attend only to the arguments used on either side, the new-born eagerness of the Government to subject the voter to a severe penalty if he discloses how he votes at the time of voting seems in a great measure justifiable. The discussion on Mr. LEATHAM'S amendment brought into conspicuous light a new theory of the Ballot Bill. This is the view that a voter has a right to vote openly if he pleases. The proper Ballot Bill, it is said, is a Bill for enabling those to vote secretly who choose, leaving those who like to vote openly at perfect liberty to do so. The Ballot is thus a device for protecting a weak minority, and ought not to be perverted into an instrument for muzzling brave and honest men, and preventing them from recording their votes in a manly British way, and as those should vote who know that they are executing a public trust. In the first place, this argument goes much too far and is fatal to the Bill altogether; and in the next place, the Bill as it now stands, even after Mr. LEATHAM'S amendment has been rejected, is totally inconsistent with the theory that the majority have a right to record their votes openly. If it were really the intention of the Legislature that this theory should be adopted, the proper way would be to allow open voting to go on just as at present, with the proviso that any one who would publicly own himself to be a coward—one of a weak minority, and afraid to execute a public trust in the proper way—might have the privilege of retiring into a little booth or closet, and of there giving his vote in a miserable and secret way. If such were the state of things, the weak minority would not be protected at all. The essence of the Ballot is that all shall be made to vote secretly. Let us suppose that there are a few men in a Trade Union who wish to rebel against the tyranny of the association. All but these few would vote openly as they were bid to do. The few who asked to be allowed to vote secretly would just as much have proclaimed their disaffection as if they had openly recorded it. If the majority against the Government indicated that the majority of the House of Commons is in favour of what is called a Permissive Ballot, the Government had much better withdraw the Bill at once. But the Bill as it now stands does not countenance this theory in the least. Every voter must vote alone; he must make no mark on his voting-paper connecting his name with his vote; he is to fold up his paper so as to conceal his vote, and then deposit it in the ballot-box. The Bill expressly provides that the elector shall mark his voting-paper "secretly"; a proposal to omit the word "secretly" was last week rejected by a majority of 202 to 126; and it is impossible to contend that an elector who must mark his paper secretly is regarded by the Bill as a person entitled to proclaim, when voting, how he votes. No one will be present while this process is going on but the presiding officer, his clerk, and the agents of the candidates. All these persons are solemnly pledged not to give any information as to how any voter has voted, and are to be severely punished if they do; while any one, whether of those present in the voting place or not, who induces, directly or indirectly, a voter to show, while voting, how he votes, is to be punishable with six months' imprisonment. This is totally unlike a Permissive Ballot Bill, and the only question was whether the voter himself should be punishable with imprisonment who, after having secretly marked his paper, should, before folding it up so as to conceal his vote, wilfully let the Returning Officer, or his clerks, or the agents of the candidates, see how he had marked his paper. There is very much to be said both ways. If the voter is allowed to show to the agents of the candidates how he voted, the objects of the Ballot Bill are unquestionably defeated. The briber will know whether the man bribed has returned his money; the intimidator will know whether his victim has done his bidding. That precautions must be taken against this is obvious, and the only doubt is whether it is necessary to frighten the voter by heavy penalties from showing his paper, or whether it is sufficient to frighten those who are likely to try to make him show his paper and those who will disclose afterwards how he has voted. The Government urged with much force that the way to stop the paper from being shown is to strike at the man who shows it, and that a voter pressed to disclose his paper would be best protected by having it in his power to reply that he should be imprisoned if he did so. The argument on the other side was that the desired end might be attained by striking at the men who would try to see the papers disclosed, and that a voter should not come to the poll with any fear that, if he makes a mistake in his manner of voting, he may be sent to prison. On the whole, the last consideration has, rightly perhaps, prevailed with the House of Commons. The danger of deterring voters from voting is the greatest danger that any new scheme of recording votes can carry with it. A general feeling that it was not safe to vote under the Ballot Bill would make the working of the system impossible; and the penalties imposed on those who try to make the voter disclose his vote, or who disclose how he has voted, are so severe that the best course would seem to be to try whether they will not be efficacious.

SPAIN.

THE estimates formed of the results of the Spanish elections vary largely, but it is admitted that the Government has obtained a majority ranging from fifty to a hundred. On the other hand, the capital, following the example of Paris in the latter days of the Empire, returns only Opposition candidates; and the defeated party throughout the country refuses to acknowledge the validity of the apparent national decision. Two or three years ago Mr. BEALES and other demagogues were in the habit of contrasting the liberty enjoyed by Spain with the narrow and obsolete institutions of their own country; yet it seems that universal suffrage and the ballot afford no sufficient guarantee of popular rights. According to the statements of the Opposition, which represent either an actual or a credible state of affairs, the agents of the Government have by fraud and violence converted the election into an idle mockery. Señor RIVERO, a late Minister and a politician of respectable character, informs ZORRILLA that he has retired from a contest at Ecija because he was unwilling to repel force by force, "a thing very easy for me to have done." The Opposition Committee of "the immortal Gerona" state that they are compelled to withdraw from the poll because the returning officers have been attacked by the Government followers, who have also committed many other irregularities. It is highly probable that Gerona is at least as exempt from violence as Galway; but in Ireland it is not the Government which renders it a dangerous enterprise to give a vote. One of the alleged grievances is that no voting papers are to be obtained from the proper authorities; or rather perhaps that evil-disposed electors only are favoured by the issue of the necessary documents. It is probable that in many instances the charges against the Government are invented as excuses for abstaining from an unpromising trial of strength; but in Spain, as in France, it is the instinct of official persons to distrust and coerce to the utmost of their power a theoretically sovereign people. It will probably be contended on the part of the Ministry that it was necessary to counteract the intrigues and the violence of the clergy in the rural districts, and of the Republicans and Internationalists in the towns. The mass of the population is perhaps puzzled with the choice between the bitterly hostile leaders who nominally belong to the Progressionist party, though SAGASTA depends mainly on Conservative support, while ZORRILLA has, for the purposes of the contest, allied himself with all the outlying factions, including at one extreme the Carlists and at the other the Republicans. In parts of Catalonia, Aragon, and Navarre, Carlist bands have since the close of the election attempted one of their hopeless insurrectionary movements; and disturbances are expected to occur in the Basque provinces. It is not known whether the promoters of the agitation alleged any special provocation; and it is not likely that the professed supporters of absolute monarchy can seriously pretend to be scandalized by the interference of the present Government with the elections.

An Opposition journal has published a circular letter of instructions to Civil Governors which is said to have been composed for the purpose of the elections of last year by SAGASTA, who was then, as now, Minister of the Interior or Home Office.

The paper may probably be spurious, as it has the appearance of a caricature; but it would not have been published if it had not expressed, with or without exaggeration, the administrative principles which are supposed to be held by Spanish Ministers. The general tenor of the document may be inferred from a few of the instructions which are furnished by its author to the functionaries who manage the elections. One of their duties is, through their agents, to excite seditious demonstrations in favour of CHARLES VII. or of the Republic, as a basis for prosecutions which may instil into the minds of the constituencies a salutary respect for the Government. The polling booths are to be packed with trustworthy voters belonging to the army, the police, and the civil service; and when the Opposition voters finally penetrate to the place of voting, the greatest possible delay is to be created by a deliberate examination of the voting tickets. The presidents and secretaries who act as returning officers are enjoined to set their watches half an hour forward, in order that at the commencement of the polling as many Ministerial votes as possible may be deposited in the urns. It is also recommended that a few parish priests should immediately before the election be sent to prison on charges preferred by false witnesses who are to be engaged for the purpose. It would not be surprising if it should appear that one of the imaginary victims of perjury is the real author of the circular; but it must be difficult to obtain a free expression of public opinion in a country where it can be worth while to concoct such forgeries. The subordinate officers of the Government may not improbably believe without authority that interference with elections will be favourably regarded by their superiors. The description of the embarrassments which they are to interpose in the way of Opposition voters is evidently copied from that which is either known or believed to be ordinary official practice.

While the regular Progressist Opposition has discredited itself by alliance with the anti-dynastic factions, it is thought that the more legitimate coalition between SAGASTA and the Liberal Union is in danger of a rupture. Of the Ministerial majority more than three-fifths are Unionists, who recognize SERRANO and TOPETE as their leaders. It is evident that without the aid of SAGASTA and his adherents they would not be able to form a Ministry, unless they could succeed in uniting themselves with some other section of the Cortes; but if they could secure the aid of the few Conservatives who have acted with ZORRILLA during the elections, they would form the strongest of the four or five parties into which the Cortes are divided. In Spain the chances are always in favour of a change of Ministry; and in the fifteen months of his reign the KING has already had to deal with five or six Cabinets. A judicious and patriotic Spaniard would probably wish that SAGASTA should remain in office, not because he is better than his rivals, but that some kind of government may be consolidated. In Australia, where the people are accustomed after the English fashion to manage their own affairs, incessant changes of Ministry may be tolerated as a comparatively harmless kind of political gambling. In Southern Europe a want of respect for authority weakens the chief motive power of public and private action. Since the death of PRIM Spain has had no statesman to trust or to fear, although it may be hoped that the KING will more and more command general respect and confidence. The prospective permanency of the throne affords an element of strength, though an elected King necessarily dispenses with the more important advantage of traditionary custom. The anarchy of opinion which prevails is curiously illustrated in a letter published by General LERONA, who has since been justly punished for his insolence by dismissal from his post as a member of the Supreme Council of War. The General announces that he had supported the Revolution of 1868 in the hope that the Duke and Duchess of MONTPENSIER would succeed to the vacant throne; but he condescends to admit that he is still bound by the oath of allegiance which he has subsequently taken to King AMADEO. If, after due trial, and before or after a bloody struggle, the KING should think proper to abandon his ungrateful task, General LERONA trusts that the "constitutional Alfonsoino-Montpensierist" cause may triumph. It is not easy to understand how the conflicting pretensions of Prince ALFONSO and his uncle could be reconciled; nor is it necessary to enter upon the question. It is surprising that a general officer in active employment should conceive that he was at liberty to anticipate the overthrow or retirement of his Sovereign, and to speculate openly on the choice which might afterwards be made among competing pretenders.

Fortunately for the KING, none of his possible rivals possess any considerable strength. A deposed ruler or his children with more or less colour of hereditary right may often be formidable to the actual possessor of the Crown; but the Duke of MONTPENSIER has not reigned, nor could he have acquired any title except by national election. Queen ISABELLA's right by descent was more than doubtful; and her son is still a boy, while her own personal disqualifications are universally acknowledged. CHARLES VII. is plausibly regarded by his followers as King by divine right; but the principles which he professes are obsolete and unpopular, and his pretensions are recognized only in some parts of the Northern provinces. The Republic, though it may be more dangerous in the future than any pretender to the throne, is at present odious to the middle classes, and to all possessors of property. In the new Cortes the party has only been able to return forty or fifty members, although its cause has been advocated since the last Revolution by the most eloquent of Spanish orators. In France the Republic has inherited the organization of the Empire, and it is maintained either as a permanent or as a provisional arrangement by the statesman who alone forms the Executive Government, while he controls or overrules the Assembly. The Spanish Republicans are identified in the popular judgment with the partisans of spoliation and anarchy; nor can they have enhanced the estimation in which they are held by their recent alliance with the Carlists against the actual Government. Since the fall of Queen ISABELLA the army has been laudably neutral or passive in the midst of the strife of factions. PRIM, though he had risen to power as a military adventurer, proclaimed as Minister and Commander-in-Chief the sound doctrine that soldiers had, as such, nothing to do with politics. SERRANO has never been suspected of inordinate ambition; and there is no other chief whose rank or reputation would enable him to imitate the career of NARVAEZ or O'DONNELL. It is not improbable that the KING, who is, like all the princes of the House of SAVOY, a soldier, and who has seen active service in the field, may acquire ascendancy in the army as well as in the State. He has on many occasions shown respect for the constitutional doctrines which Continental countries have borrowed from England; but, if his reign continues, he will find it necessary to take an active and independent part in public affairs. The Ministerial majority in the new Cortes at first sight seems to justify the KING's consent to a dissolution.

THE APPELLATE JURISDICTION BILL.

WE fear that the LORD CHANCELLOR's effort to reform the great Appellate Courts of the Empire will not be more successful than his earlier essays in law reform. The shadows of coming opposition which have already crossed the path of the preliminary Resolution are ominous of failure. It is true that the objections dimly indicated by Lord CANNING and others are founded on theories that will scarcely bear a close investigation; but it is conceivable that a resistance which purports to be based on a large, though untenable, principle may be sustained hereafter by objections to the details of the projected measure better founded than any sweeping arguments against all reform whatever.

On the broad question whether it is desirable to replace such anomalous tribunals as the House of Lords and the Judicial Committee by a really commanding Court of Appeal, we cannot bring ourselves to doubt the wisdom or the necessity of some such reform as Lord HATHERLEY seems to contemplate. The arguments against any change are not perhaps quite so contemptible as is sometimes assumed, but they are far outweighed by the solid benefits which a really effectual measure would bestow upon suitors. It is said with some truth that it is scarcely less important that our ultimate Courts of Appeal should command the reverence of those who are bound by their decisions than that they should be the soundest and wisest tribunals that the country can command. It is conceivable that the respect paid to the decisions of the QUEEN in Council may be enhanced in the minds of distant colonists and dusky Hindoos by the sort of halo cast about the Privy Council by its nominal association with the Sovereign. It is said to be an actual fact that even hard-headed Scotchmen feel less annoyance at being defeated before the House of Lords than they would do if the adverse judgment were pronounced by a less august, though possibly more efficient, body of paid English lawyers. Sentiment and superstition of this kind, though it may provoke a smile, is not wholly to be disregarded; but we believe that the weight of such considerations has been absurdly exaggerated, and that they do not deserve for a moment to be set off against the real defects of our present appellate arrangements. The House of Lords is, and the Judicial Committee till lately was, made up for appellate purposes of dilettante Judges, who have often been insufficient in number and not always quite first-rate in capacity. There have been times, which may recur, when the irreversible decisions of the House have been pronounced by a single law lord, assisted by two lay figures, as the unfortunate peers who are entrapped to make a quorum have not inaptly been termed. The sittings are of necessity too infrequent and intermittent to get the business disposed of without serious arrears, and this evil would be greatly aggravated if the number of appeals were not kept far below the natural amount by the enormous and inexcusable expenses which the procedure involves. The varying constitution of the judicial body, determined by the convenience or caprice which it is the privilege of unpaid Judges to consult, is another grave defect. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is no longer open to these objections to the same extent as formerly, but it has not yet under the new system acquired, and we do not know why it should acquire, any higher estimation than Courts which exercise only a very inferior jurisdiction.

Any Lord Chancellor who should succeed in replacing these imperfect Courts by a tribunal composed of lawyers, the strongest and most learned to be found in the country, and bound, as men who take rank and emoluments for service are bound, to work diligently and continuously in their high functions, would give us much more than an equivalent for the loss of the superstitious regard which such ancient and dignified bodies as the House of Lords and the Privy Council may be supposed to command. But the project of the LORD CHANCELLOR must be greatly developed and modified to ensure such a result. The scheme as announced amounts to little more than the perpetuation of the two existing tribunals of appeal under new names, with the addition of a few paid members. On the House of Lords division of the proposed Court it is intended that all peers who have been Chancellors, Judges, or even barristers of a certain standing, shall be qualified to sit; an arrangement which will clearly not suffice to exclude persons wholly unfit to form part of a body which should include none but lawyers of the highest and best tried capacity. The Privy Council division is to be constituted very much as it is now, except that the salaries of paid members are to be raised from 5,000*l.* to 6,000*l.* a year; a provision which, if introduced into a former measure, would have saved the Ministry from one of the least agreeable incidents of the Session.

These changes, so far as they go, are undoubtedly good, but we fear that they do not go far enough to secure the sort of tribunal the creation of which could alone justify any disturbance of the time-honoured system under which suitors suffer at present. In the first place, we have no faith in a composite Court made up partly of paid and partly of unpaid members. You may, as experience has shown, get men to undergo considerable judicial labour with no other reward than the high honour of sitting on a tribunal which consults its dignity by administering justice gratuitously in the last resort. We know both the good and the evil of such a system. But once deprive the Court of the glory which it wins by accruing emolument, as you do by the introduction of paid members and by the substitution of compulsory for voluntary attendance, and you will scarcely find that it exercises its old attraction, such as it was, upon the veterans of the law. Paid and unpaid Judges will not long sit side by side, and the upshot of the scheme will be a couple of Courts, each composed of from three to five Judges, with rank and emolument inferior to some others of the judicial body. The plan of tempting ex-Chancellors by the addition of 1,000*l.* a year to their pensions will not, we venture to think, gain many recruits, and the Courts will neither in numbers nor in the qualifications of the members occupy the commanding position which the ultimate appellant tribunal ought to enjoy.

It seems, moreover, to be part of the project to abolish the existing intermediate appeals both at Common Law and in Equity. In itself we doubt much whether this would be in any way beneficial. There are serious defects, both theoretical and practical, in the constitution of the Exchequer Chamber, but (with the exception that two is an inadequate number of Judges for a Court of Appeal) the Lords Justices' Court affords a more economical, and not less satisfactory, resort than the proposed division of the ultimate Appeal Court is likely to supply. The vexed question of an intermediate appeal need not perhaps be discussed at length until it is certain that its abolition will be part of the Government Bill; but it is clear that the two proposed divisions of the Court will be quite incapable of getting through their work if every appeal from a Superior Court of first instance is to come to them. Such appeals in Chancery alone at present occupy the whole time of one Court; for the days otherwise employed by the Lords Justices are more than balanced by the sittings in Chancery of the Lord Chancellor himself. Common Law appeals, with Scotch and Irish appeals, will be fully enough for a second division, and the Indian and Colonial business is not likely to be diminished by the improvement of the Court in efficiency and economy. And there will remain the Divorce, Ecclesiastical, and Admiralty businesses to be disposed of somehow. Possibly the LORD CHANCELLOR will prefer to drop his proposal to abolish the intermediate jurisdictions rather than be driven, to the necessity of establishing a third, and perhaps a fourth, division of the ultimate Court, and we see no escape from these alternatives. It is in itself an objection to throw an excessive amount of work upon so august a body, for the number of Judges of the highest possible qualifications, though very likely sufficient in ordinary times to dispose of all business of grave importance, will seldom be adequate to the correction of every mistake which may be made by any one of the numerous Courts of first instance to be found within the limits of the British Empire or even of the United Kingdom. On the mere score of economy of judicial power, it seems dangerous to ask so much from the final Court of Appeal as the LORD CHANCELLOR proposes. Nature is not too lavish of the highest class of minds, and when they are met with, they are apt to be as costly as they are scarce. It would seem wise, therefore, independently of other considerations, to sift out by a preliminary appeal as many as possible of the comparatively insignificant cases on which the labours of the new Court would otherwise be in a measure wasted, and by which its pre-eminence would inevitably be diminished in proportion as its work and its numbers were increased.

THE INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY.

LORD GRANVILLE'S answer to the Spanish despatch on the International Society was a courteous refusal to adopt any exceptional measures. As the members of the French Commune are allowed to enjoy an undisturbed refuge in England, it would be impossible to concur with any foreign Power in prosecuting persons who have merely combined in the expression of certain theoretical opinions. It is probably true that the International Society, and more especially the Continental sections of the body, would willingly embrace an opportunity of overthrowing almost any existing Government; but the punishment to which insurgents or conspirators might become liable would be inflicted in consequence of their acts or definite intentions, and not because they were members of any club, however mischievous. The POPE and Cardinal CULLEN lose no occasion of execrating the Freemasons, whose organization in England, and probably in many other countries, is, as far as secular law and morality are concerned, perfectly innocent. The English Parliament would be guilty of a similar absurdity if it were to affix penalties to the corporate enunciation of any doctrines whatever. It is conceivable that a Legislature in many countries might think it necessary to silence malcontents; but the English principle of toleration has been in the present generation firmly established. The Spanish nation cannot take it amiss that attacks on their institutions should not be regarded as more dangerous than proposals of political and social revolution in England. Our own ODGERS and BRADLAUGHS, though they belong to the International, propound its anarchical doctrines in a dozen other clubs, such as the Land and Labour League, and the Society which lately met at the "Hole-in-the-Wall." The subversion of the throne, of the House of Lords, of the Church, and generally of property and social order, is in this country a common subject of discussion, though the advocacy of revolution is at present confined to a small and noisy faction. Lord GRANVILLE courteously declares that the English Government would highly disapprove of any plots which might be formed in England against a friendly State. He might have added that there is little probability that the demagogues of the International Society who reside in London will be willing or able to cause any disturbance in Spain. The unbounded liberty which attracts all the enthusiasts of Europe to England at least removes them from their own respective countries, where they would have more facilities than in exile for giving trouble to authority. Another incidental advantage arises from the freedom of the English press, which enables them to stir and agitate all civilized society. A French writer lately published in the Fortnightly Review an enthusiastic eulogy of the movement who is best known as the inseparable friend and political ally of HENRI, more notorious as the Père DUCREUX. Both suffragans were principal promoters of the worship of the court-tesan who represented in the simplest of costumes the Goddess of Reason, and their candid admirer does not fail to defend their indecency as well as their more serious propensity to murder. It was in England also that the Council of the International Society formally justified the massacre of the hostages and the attempted conflagration of the city. It would be difficult to frame any charges against the enemies of society which would be so damaging as their own boastful confessions. The principles of CHAUMETTE, practically revived in the murder of the Archbishop of PARIS and his companions, can only attract the sympathy of those who are already and incurably demoralized.

It is true that the reforms proposed by the International Society are not a little startling. The members have pledged themselves at some of their general meetings to irreconcilable hostility against the middle classes, and to the abolition of property. The English members, though they fully concurred in the general denunciation of all classes except their own, seem practically to have concentrated their attention on the original object of regulating and raising wages. It is too late to inquire whether Trade Unions may be lawfully organized, inasmuch as they exist and exercise great power, and as it would be impossible to prove that men have not a right to determine, in concert or otherwise, the terms on which they will work. Their attempt to form alliances with foreign Unions established for the same purpose was reasonable and legitimate; nor was it necessary to complicate the creed of the Society with abstract questions of the rights of property. The French and German agitators with whom they became acquainted in the course of their negotiations about wages and strikes had long before regarded capitalists with an envious cupidity. By one of those logical processes which are so called because they are independent of experience and practical probability, the Internationalists arrived at the conclusion that marriage must be abolished. It is evident that if men and women live in families they will continue to share the vulgar prejudice of preferring their own children to the theory of Communism and to the rights of man. Every owner of property will contrive, in spite of prohibitory laws, to share his wealth with his children; and thus it would be impossible to correct the odious inequality of fortune. Unchecked variety of intercourse, and consequent uncertainty of paternal relations, would perhaps restore the golden age before wills were invented.

Or one to one was earnestly confined.

The suppression of all forms of religion was probably suggested by independent reasons or motives, and the project seems to have excited little or no interest among the English members of the Society; and it will be long before the English working classes are induced by reasoning, however cogent, to abandon the institution of marriage. The abolition of patriotism and of national distinctions may perhaps have made some progress. Two or three Germans were at different times included in the shifting Governments of the Commune; but it would seem that French workmen in general have not yet attained to cosmopolitan philanthropy. At the commencement of the war in 1870 the first thought of the populace was to expel the thrifty and intelligent Germans who competed successfully with Frenchmen in certain branches of industry. The severity of the conquerors was afterwards partially justified by the hardships which had been inflicted on harmless residents in France; and in this case at least the people were far more to blame than the Imperial Government. The manufacturers of New England and Pennsylvania had, in precisely the same spirit, profited by the outbreak of the civil war and the secession of the Southern members of Congress to enact the MORGAN tariff for their own private benefit; but American men of business are not given to professions of disinterested benevolence, nor were they members of an International Society.

The most valuable result of Mr. BAILLIE COCHRANE'S motion on the International Society was Mr. FAWCETT'S argumentative speech. There was little use in advertising the anarchical professions and principles of the revolutionaries, whether they are or are not to be regarded as formidable. Mr. BRUCE quoted one of their published statements, to the effect that they numbered only 8,000 members, and that they were in urgent want of money. It is possible that if a revolution occurred in London they might, as in Paris, prove themselves powerful for mischief; but when the banners of Trafalgar Square and Hyde Park find themselves strong enough to overthrow the Government and the Constitution, it will matter little whether they call themselves Internationalists, or Republicans, or members of the Land and Labour League. Mr. BAILLIE COCHRANE has been too long in Parliament and in public life to think that any law against abstract opinions could be either passed or executed; but it is at the same time possible that he may have judged more accurately than Mr. FAWCETT in holding that the political character of the Society preponderates over its economic theories. The agitators who control the Society would, even if they admitted the force of Mr. FAWCETT'S arguments, gladly confiscate existing property, in the hope that thus something might be gained in the confusion, and in the certainty that they would be revenged on those whom they have taught themselves to look upon as enemies. Mere speculations on the origin of rent and profits are less exciting, if more instructive, than projects of wholesale spoliation. The Baile declaration of war against traders, capitalists, and the middle classes in general expressed a feeling of hatred, as well as an economic or social aspiration. It was not worth the while of the House of Commons to enter a protest against doctrines which it could never be suspected of countenancing. The English ecclesiastics who thought it necessary to repudiate all complicity with the decrees of the Vatican Council were not more unnecessarily scrupulous than Mr. BAILLIE COCHRANE and his friends. A vast majority both in Parliament and in the constituencies disapproves of the International Society; but there are no means except the use of force, which in this case is impracticable, to prevent the utterance of pernicious nonsense. There is reason to fear that the members of the International Society and of similar clubs will not be converted by Mr. FAWCETT'S lucid demonstration; but it is well that those who adhere to sound doctrines should be taught the best methods of defending their position. Mr. FAWCETT clearly exposed the absurdity of the Socialist scheme of confiscating the land that it may be again let out to occupying holders. If the land were let below its value, the rest of the community would contribute to the support of the agricultural population; and, on the other hand, a full rack-rent paid to the State would be as heavy a burden as at present. The weak point in Mr. FAWCETT'S reasoning was the assumption that the expropriated landowners would receive compensation. The Land and Labour League disavow their claim by anticipation, and its organs even doubt whether payment of back rents shall not be exacted. The transfer of a vast mass of property would certainly be profitable either to public or private agents of confiscation; but Mr. FAWCETT clearly showed that after a short interval either rents would be paid or a section of the community would enjoy a monopoly of the land.

FRANCE.

THE Committee of Permanence have not had sufficient self control to allow M. THIERS'S visit to Paris to pass without formal notice. They have resolved to bring the subject before the Assembly, and to propose some kind of censure on the PRESIDENT for the double crime of treating Paris as though it were still the capital, and of using the property of the nation in a manner not sanctioned by its representatives. It is evident that the majority of the Assembly are not pleased at M. THIERS'S assumption of something like executive independence. They fear that, if the country gets accustomed to see him acting apart from the Legislature, it will forget that the office he fills is the creation of the Assembly, and that his position differs only in name from that of a Minister who can be made or unmade by a Parliamentary vote. Their alarm is perfectly reasonable. The relationship between M. THIERS and the Assembly is too anomalous to be long kept in mind by Frenchmen unfamiliar with politics. He bears a title which implies in other countries, and which has implied at a former period of French history, the possession of very considerable power. The election of a President of the United States is the one event in America which ordinarily excites interest in other countries. When NAPOLEON III. governed France as President, his authority was scarcely less extensive than it was after the Coup d'Etat. These parallels naturally dispose Frenchmen to see in M. THIERS the possessor of attributes such as usually belong to the head of the Executive. After the pains the Assembly have taken to invent a place for him, and to make him feel how subordinate that place is, it would be extremely provoking if careless people should forget to draw the proper distinction between him and other Presidents, or should suppose that he holds his power by any other tenure than the will of the Assembly. The practice of keeping something like a Court at Paris is not unlikely to produce this effect on unthinking minds. The PRESIDENT is seen living in a palace and maintaining a state which resembles in some degree the usual surroundings of such a position. The Assembly cannot well hold rival receptions, or do any other act which shall convey to the gaping crowd its real superiority over the PRESIDENT. When this sense of weakness comes on the heels of the growing conviction that M. THIERS is consolidating an influence which will ultimately overshadow their own, it naturally makes the Deputies anxious to do something to reassert their authority. They cannot be congratulated on the particular means they have chosen to attain their end. The unwillingness of the Deputies to return to Paris is not an heroic sentiment, but there has not hitherto been any ground for pronouncing it a spiteful one. If the Assembly ratifies the vote of the Committee of Permanence, it will be no longer possible to acquit the majority of a desire to inflict degradation on Paris as well as to secure safety for themselves. There may conceivably be reasons why the Assembly should not expose itself to be coerced by mob violence; there can be none why it should resent the choice of Paris as the scene of a State ceremony. The determination to decapitalize the city has never been so clearly put forward, and if the Assembly supports its Committee, the breach between it and the Parisians can hardly fail to become more serious, because more avowedly permanent, than ever. Under these circumstances M. THIERS will have to deal with a new complication. The majority are more sensitive upon this subject than upon any other, and their often threatened and often deferred quarrel with the PRESIDENT might become inevitable if M. THIERS were to resent their criticism of his visit to Paris by insisting on reopening the question of the Assembly's place of session. On the other hand, if he accepts their admonition and undertakes not to offend in like manner again, he runs the risk of making the Government as unpopular in Paris as the Assembly itself. The Parisians are naturally ill-disposed towards him, inasmuch as such of them as are not Republicans are for the most part Imperialists, and such of them as are Republicans are for the most part Communists. The action of the Assembly makes it the interest of Paris that the present Government should be overthrown, and when the majority of a population agree in wishing to overturn the existing state of things, the fact that they are not agreed as to the state of things which is to replace it is less important.

In the meantime the cause of the Republic, as the Republic is understood by M. THIERS, seems to make steady progress in the country. Addresses of sympathy have been sent to the PRESIDENT by many of the Councils-General, and the general attitude of these bodies—the most accurate representatives of French opinion at present to be had—is, with scarcely an exception, favourable to the existing Government. It has been said that this proves nothing as regards the desire of the country for Republican institutions, that it only proves how universal is the desire for the continuance of peace and order. The truth of this statement is unquestionable. The number of ardent Republicans in the French country districts is probably very small. What the people really desire is a time of tranquillity in which to make good their losses, and some security that the fruits of their labours shall not again be put in peril by domestic strife. They support the Republic as administered by M. THIERS, not because it is a Republic, but because it is a Government. But in recognizing this truth it is important not to lose sight of two facts which invest it with special significance. The first is that this is the first time the Party of Order has frankly accepted a Republic. It has been Legitimist, Orleanist, Imperialist, but never Republican. This may be taken either as a justification of M. THIERS's sagacity or as a tribute to it—as showing either that he was right in thinking that a Republic would divide Frenchmen least, or that the majority of the Councils-General believe that he was right. It does not much matter which of these is really the case. The essential point is that, whether the country has led M. THIERS to a conclusion, or M. THIERS has led the country to a conclusion, the conclusion has been arrived at. The party which has hitherto been the constant, if unavowed, enemy of Republican government has accepted it as the best calculated to give France what it wants. The other fact to be noticed is that, while the substance of the Government attracts one large class of Frenchmen, the name attracts another class. A Monarchy might have given the same assurance of order and stability, and most of the Councils-General which now proclaim their adherence to the PRESIDENT would probably have been equally, if not more, forward in proclaiming it to a king. But the difference would have been that in the latter case there would have been a large and sullen minority holding itself entirely aloof from all recognition of the new sovereign. Instead of M. GAMSETTA proclaiming his confidence in M. THIERS, he would have been trying how near he could go to treason without incurring the punishment of a traitor. The peculiarity of French politics at present is that there is one section of the nation which will accept any Government provided that it gives them certain material advantages, and another section which will accept no Government but one, no matter what material advantages any other may offer. A Republic which secures the support of Republicans for the sake of its form, and the support of the Party of Order for the sake of its substance, must be a better thing for France than a Monarchy which can only secure the support of one party instead of both. Whether the majority of the Assembly will ever bring themselves to admit this is doubtful. They have desires and plans of a very different kind to get rid of, and the sacrifice involved in putting them aside may prove too much for them. But their power of giving effect to their views is growing smaller every day, and their undisguised unwillingness to stand the test of a general election shows that they have no confidence—it may almost be said no hope—that they will again have the opportunity of governing France. Whenever M. THIERS insists upon having a Legislature which represents the country, instead of one which has never represented it on more than a single point, the existing Assembly will probably break up with at most a murmur of remonstrance.

SIR MASSEY LOPES'S RESOLUTION.

IN the debate on Sir MASSEY LOPES'S Resolution Mr. GOSCHEN stated that, if there is one subject more than another with which the Government is anxious to deal, it is the subject of local taxation. It is true that last year Mr. GOSCHEN advanced to the attack with a degree of confidence which was only equalled by the sudden precipitancy of his retreat; for he had no sooner introduced his Bill than, warned by the rising murmurs which filled the country, he hastened to withdraw it. Since then, however, there have been no symptoms which indicated to the outer world a keen anxiety on the part of the Ministry to return to the question, and it might have been supposed that, with the proverbial caution of burnt children, they had resolved to keep as far as possible from the dangerous bars at which they had already scorched their fingers. It may be doubted whether Mr. GOSCHEN'S assurance that his rash and mischievous measure is still held in reserve was calculated to conciliate the body to whom it was addressed. It is probable that the overwhelming defeat of the Government on Tuesday night may be attributed partly to the increasing pressure of local taxation, but more perhaps to the vague distrust excited by the Bill of last year, and the consequent desire to force on a measure of relief lest the menaces of disturbance and confiscation should at any time be renewed. Last year Sir M. LOPES'S Resolution was turned aside by Mr. GOSCHEN'S vague promise to introduce a new era of local taxation, the nature of which he could not then explain; and it is not surprising that the manner in which this pledge was subsequently redeemed should have had the effect of helping Sir MASSEY to a majority on the present occasion. It is calculated that the local taxation of the kingdom is about forty millions annually, or only a million less than the sum raised for Imperial purposes, after deducting the interest on the national debt; and this amount, large as it is, is still increasing. It appears that in four years three-quarters of a million has been added to the cost of the Poor Law system; Local Boards have multiplied, fever hospitals have been erected, and the education rate has come into operation. According to the latest official figures, the local rates in England and Wales, leaving the rest of the kingdom out of account, came to 30,000,000*l.* in 1870; and this amount was raised from a total rateable value of 105,000,000*l.* The rates are, therefore, charged on property producing an income equal to less than a third of the income assessed to Income Tax, and to just about a seventh of the total estimated income of the country. It would not be easy to answer the argument of Sir M. LOPES and his supporters, that it is theoretically unjust that the area of local taxation should thus be narrowed, although it may be observed that practically the lapse of time has tended to correct the injustice, inasmuch as the rates have always been taken into account in the purchase of landed property. If it were for the first time a question how local taxation should be adjusted, it would be natural to propose that personal and real property should equally be taxed; but when a fixed arrangement has been in operation for a long period, the surrounding circumstances naturally get adapted to it, and in various indirect ways the incidence of the tax is rendered less oppressive. While land and houses, being subject to rates, have been purchased at a lower price than would otherwise have been demanded, personal property, such as stocks, has had to be paid for at a higher price, in consequence of its exemption from local burdens. It is impossible to avoid fiscal changes from time to time, but it is necessary to remember that they cannot be effected without altering the relative value of different kinds of property, and that every change in the incidence of taxation is in itself an evil.

There are two modes in which the grievance complained of by Sir M. LOPES may be met. Of course the first and most obvious method is to extend the area of local taxation so as to include personal as well as real property; but this is open to the grave, if not insuperable, objection that it would afford relief to the present body of ratepayers, who acquired their property subject to rates, at the expense of other classes who have invested in property which they had no reason to suppose would be brought within the range of local imposts. The other method is to reduce the total amount raised by rates, while leaving the area of taxation as at present; and it was to this object that Sir M. LOPES's latest Resolution was directed. He has examined the different purposes to which local rates are applied, and he has come to the conclusion that some of these purposes are national, and not local, and that they ought therefore to be defrayed out of the national revenue. He accordingly submitted a Resolution insisting upon the injustice of imposing taxation for national objects only on one description of property, and declaring that occupiers and owners ought to be relieved, in whole or in part, from the charges imposed on ratepayers for the administration of justice, police, and lunatics, the expenditure for such purposes being almost entirely independent of local control. He proposed that these charges, amounting to 2,037,000*l.* for the whole kingdom, should be transferred to the Consolidated Fund. The management of prisons and of the police was practically, Sir M. LOPES argued, in the hands of the Government, which could always compel the local authorities to give way to the Inspectors by threatening to withhold its contributions. Moreover, houses and land, he remarked, would not run away, and could not be carried off; and as the owners of this kind of property stood less in need of the protection of the police than the owners of personalty, it was the latter who ought principally to bear the cost of keeping up the constabulary. As to lunacy, it was, he said, a national calamity which ought to be a national charge. In Sir MASSER's opinion, the possession of land and houses has rather a healthy and calming effect, and lunacy is mainly promoted by speculations in personalty.

The logical force both of Sir M. LOPES's Resolution and of the amendment which Sir T. ACLAND moved in opposition to it was impaired by a curious obliquity of argument in each case. The question immediately before the House of Commons was whether local rates could fairly be applied to national objects, but Sir M. LOPES mixed it up with the injustice of levying rates exclusively on one description of property, which is another branch of the subject, while Sir T. ACLAND introduced a third question as to the distribution of the rates between owners and occupiers. As to the first of these questions, there can be no doubt that while, on the one hand, it would be a dangerous temptation to extravagance to entrust the expenditure of Imperial funds to local bodies, on the other hand local taxes should be raised only for purposes which are directly under the control of local authorities. It is less easy, however, to determine what ought and what ought not to be considered national as distinguished from local purposes. There might perhaps be an advantage in making the care and maintenance of lunatics a national duty, and it is possible that the management of the prisons might be usefully concentrated in the hands of the Government. The centralization of the constabulary as a national force, like the army or the navy, under the direct and exclusive control of the Government, is a far more serious and difficult question. The objections which might be urged to this proposal, both on political and economical grounds, are of the gravest character, and are not easily disposed of. With regard to the exclusive incidence of local rates on a particular kind of property, it may be plausibly urged that personal property ought not to be exempted; but a district Income-tax would be a hazardous experiment, and if a change is to be made, some other expedient will probably have to be devised. The argument against disturbing existing arrangements applies in the strongest degree to Mr. GOSCHEN's wanton and iniquitous proposal, which was embodied in Sir T. ACLAND's amendment, to divide the rates between owners and occupiers. The result would be either to leave the matter practically as it is, or to inflict unmerited confiscation on small landowners who are apt to be at the mercy of their tenants. Although Sir M. LOPES has achieved a victory over the Government, it may be doubted whether it is one from which the class which he represents will derive any substantial advantage. There was undoubted force in Mr. STANSFELD's warning that a proposal of this kind cannot be disposed of by itself without raising the whole question of the incidence of taxation, and also the "consideration of the rights and duties of property, and the conditions under which property should be enjoyed." It must not be forgotten that, whatever may be the justice of Sir M. LOPES's appeal, it is addressed to an assembly the majority of which represents interests that are opposed to the interests of landowners; and that the consideration of the rights and duties of property, when the time comes for it, may possibly be found to refer less to rights than to imaginary duties. The proposal which Mr. LOWE made last year to surrender the Inhabited House Duty as a contribution from Imperial resources to local wants may in one sense be regarded as an acknowledgment of the claims which are embodied in Sir M. LOPES's Resolution; but it may be remarked that this tax practically falls upon the landlords, and ought, if relief is intended to be given to this class, to be simply repealed. The whole subject requires more careful consideration than it appears to have yet received, but it may at least be hoped that we have heard the last of Mr. GOSCHEN's project of futile change and wanton confiscation.

THE LIQUOR TRADE.

THE Licensing Bill which Lord KIMBERLEY has brought into the House of Lords is a concession by the Government at once to political emergency and to the dictates of common sense. But if any single person was influenced by the apology for himself and his colleagues which Mr. BRUCE offered during the Long Vacation, that person must now be convinced that the Government deserved for their conduct in this matter all, and more than all, that has been said against them. The Bill of last year has lost them several seats in the House of Commons, and has irretrievably ruined their character as prudent statesmen. The proverb noscitur a sociis is eminently true of politicians who condescend to flirt with the Alliance. Mr. BRUCE disgusted all moderate men last year, and now he will infuriate the enthusiasts. The speech of Lord KIMBERLEY will affect the Permissive agitators as a red rag does a bull. "The Bill," he says, "may be considered moderate in its character." It proposes to leave the granting of licences to magistrates under the supervision of the Secretary of State; and "the valuable principle of popular control" which has been advocated in so many speeches and pamphlets is excluded from this Bill, although Mr. BRUCE made a pretence of introducing it into last year's Bill. It might indeed be argued that Mr. BRUCE, as Secretary of State, will control the magistrates, and that the people, or rather the clamorous faction which usurps that name, will control Mr. BRUCE. But if the new system is to work well, it must be entrusted to a permanent officer of the Home Department, who may be capable of establishing uniformity of practice upon sound principles.

So long as magistrates retain the power of granting and renewing licences, a lucrative branch of business will be preserved for barristers. Indeed it appears that this Bill, like the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill of Lord SHAFTESBURY, will help to compensate the Bar for losses which the County Courts and the Court of Bankruptcy have inflicted on it. The Bill makes to the Alliance almost the only concession which we could approve by granting to it unlimited facility for briefing barristers to oppose licences before magistrates. The movement for raising a fund of 100,000*l.*, which we had looked upon with some disfavour, becomes from this point of view commendable. Mr. POPE, Q.C., who is a leader of the Alliance, will deserve the gratitude of his professional brethren for helping to put money in their pockets. It is true that appeals to Quarter Sessions against the granting or renewal of licences will not be allowed unless security be given for costs, and frivolous appeals will be visited with a pecuniary penalty. But the Alliance will not mind that. There is plenty more money where the 100,000*l.* comes from, and there is a perennial growth of fanatics ready to subscribe it. On the other hand, an oppressed publican may easily obtain through the sympathetic columns of the Morning Advertiser assistance in fighting the common battle of his class. There will be a never-failing supply of the prettiest quarrels that can be conceived, but instead of the hasty agitation and mob violence which the Permissive Bill would introduce, there will be long-winded oratory and decorous wrangling of "learned friends." Considered as a work of art, a speech of counsel before licensing magistrates is perhaps liable to criticism, but as a means of enabling the Alliance to expend superfluous money and energy it must receive unqualified approbation. It is a consoling thought that, among the many tracts which have been issued by that industrious body, there is not one that may not be put into a brief which counsel may be induced by a competent fee to read. We venture to make to Government the surprising and gratifying announcement that the Home Office has achieved a Parliamentary success. This part of their Bill must please everybody, and more particularly the lawyers. The provisions for police inspection and for checking adulteration can only be judged in detail when we have the Bill before us, but every reasonable person must regret that this humble and useful work should have been already delayed a year because the Government weakly yielded to a set of noisy agitators who desired to force what they are pleased to call great principles upon an unwilling nation. We believe, however, that the provision for closing all public-houses until 7 A.M. would demand so many exceptions as practically to repeal the rule. The heavy work of the great markets of the metropolis is either in full activity or nearly finished by 7 A.M. And in other branches of industry a man may do three hours' work in summer, and may sadly want a glass of beer before that time. The economical habit of beginning work at sunrise, which is so invariably practised among the thrifty Germans, ought not to be discouraged among ourselves by legislation, nor ought Parliament to pass a Bill which would in effect enact that a working-man shall take tea or coffee and not beer for his breakfast. A celebrated tavern in Covent Garden did formerly "finish" actors, lawyers, and members of Parliament at the same time as it enabled market-gardeners and greengrocers to begin the day. Even now an exhausted devotee of dancing may obtain a glass of beer as well as a view of London by sunrise on his return from a protracted ball. But under the proposed regulation he would have to complain, like the fast undergraduate who was required to attend morning chapel, that the hour was inconveniently late. So long as the liquors which this Bill calls intoxicating are recognized as an ordinary refreshment of human labour, they must be supplied during the hours in which that labour is carried on. The proposal to fix the hour of opening public-houses at 7 A.M., like many other proposals which are made in Parliament, proceeds from men who habitually rise at 8 A.M., or later, and find their tea, toast, and a newspaper ready for them when they come downstairs. It is manifest that a rule closing the public-houses at 11 or 12 P.M. must also be modified by considerable exceptions. But we admit that the later they remain open at night the greater is the temptation to waste time and money in them, whereas in the morning they are not likely to be visited, except very rarely, by any person who is not going about his daily business. We should doubt whether the most careful research of the Alliance could discover a case of a man who left his bed in order to get drunk. But although we think that a working-man ought to be allowed to have a glass of beer if he desires it before 7 A.M., we should desire to offer him the opportunity, which now he seldom finds, of taking a cup of tea or coffee if he prefers it.

This Bill has been introduced by the Government in the House of Lords because time cannot be found to proceed with it in the House of Commons. But the time which belongs to private members of the Lower House may of course be devoted to this as well as any other subject, and it is at any rate an agreeable novelty to find the publican taking the place of the clergyman who is usually put up to make sport for legislators on Wednesdays. It is obvious, however, that there has been enough talk upon this question, and any practical work that is done now must be done over again when the Bill of the Government comes down from the House of Lords. We do not therefore feel any great interest in examining the clauses of the Bill which Sir H. SELWYN-IBBETSON has brought in, but we observe with pleasure that he, like Mr. BRUCE, has remembered that one chief object of modern legislation is to provide work for lawyers. The celebrated problem of defining a "bona fide traveller," under an existing Act of Parliament, would probably present no difficulty to the daughterman who has defined a "wayfarer" in this Bill. But supposing the Bill to pass we should advise Londoners who take a hasty walk on Sunday to remember that a "wayfarer," according to the Bill, "a person who being in a neighbourhood other than that in which he resides stands in need of rest or refreshment," and the penalty for falsely pretending to be a "wayfarer" is 5*l.* Public-houses would be closed under this Bill from 9 P.M. to 5 P.M. on Sunday; but an inn or eating-house might supply drink during these hours to a "wayfarer." If, therefore, a man starts from Fleet Street at 2 P.M., walks to Kensington in an hour, and desires beer, he can only obtain it as a "wayfarer" at an inn or eating-house; but is he a "wayfarer" at Kensington at 3 P.M.? This question divides itself into several. Is he in a neighbourhood other than that in which he resides? Does he stand in need of rest or refreshment? He can scarcely be said to stand in need of rest when he sits down, as he would probably do, on entering an inn or eating-house; but if he has ceased to be a "wayfarer," liquor cannot lawfully be sold to him. As regards residence, a man who lives in Kensington might be said to reside in the neighbourhood of London. And again, a man who started to walk from Fleet Street might desire refreshment before he reached Kensington, but whether he would "stand in need" of it had better be left to the Judges to decide when the question comes before them. They at any rate would be paid for considering it, which we are not. In order to enhance the absurdity of the introduction of the "wayfarer" into this Bill, it was suggested in the debate that the keeper of an inn or eating-house ought to be required to provide beds for wayfarers. The speaker was doubtless unaware of the interpretation popularly, but perhaps erroneously, affixed to the inscription "beds" which is often seen in the windows of coffee-houses in London. It is lamentable, in connexion with such a serious subject, to find oneself descending into the region of farce. But we greatly wonder that the author of this Bill did not propose to enact that every wayfarer should consume a captain's biscuit and a piece of cheese with his pint of beer, under penalty of 5*l.* The proceedings under this clause of the Bill would be summary, and therefore it is unnecessary to consider how an indictment could be framed for falsely and fraudulently pretending to be in a neighbourhood other than that in which the defendant resided, and to be in want of rest and refreshment, or by what evidence such an indictment might be supported. We think that the Crown would need the help of at least six lawyers to obtain a conviction in such a case.

A new and improved edition of the "intelligent foreigner" has been produced by Mr. TREVELYAN, who mentioned in his speech that a writer in the Debats regarded Mr. Bruce's Bill of last year "with admiration which stopped only short of 'envy.'" If such praise be accorded to a timid and vacillating follower of Sir WILFRID LAWSON, what honour can civilized mankind find adequate to bestow on the consistent and courageous champion of the principle which Mr. Bruce's feeble hand has treated like a hot potato? An American admirer declares that no marble can be white enough for the inscription of Sir WILFRID LAWSON'S name, and if the speaker contemplated the erection of a monument amid the smoke of London we entirely agree with him. We should think that the name and the work of the leader of the Alliance would be obliterated about the same time. It appears that the Alliance is particularly angry because liquor-dealers are allowed to display decanters of alluring pattern in their windows. But we never heard of any person being induced by a druggist's brilliantly-coloured bottles to swallow an unnecessary dose of physic. Among many valuable qualities possessed by Sir WILFRID LAWSON, we chiefly admire his incapacity to see more than one side of any question. The principle of entirely closing public-houses has been applied in Scotland on Sundays, and yet, he says, drunkenness is very great there still. We should have thought that this statement was almost conclusive against prohibition.

CANDOUR.

THERE are, in spite of all proper platitudes to the contrary, a good many virtues which are more offensive than vices. We can forgive a man for being an habitual drunkard, or even for habitual lying, but it is terribly difficult to forgive him for systematic punctuality and early rising. The whole group of virtues of which these practices are generally symptomatic is of an offensive caste. Probably their possessors are so well aware that their habits are generally considered insulting to their neighbours, that they wrap themselves in more than the ordinary pomp of self-righteousness. They are obliged to wear a good thick armour to protect themselves from the odium due to their unsocial excellences. The taste for such observances grows by indulgence. As the first glass of brandy is frequently the ruin of the unfortunate man in whom a turn for dipsomania is latent, so the delight of rising one morning and glorying in imagination over millions of one's remnant fellow-creatures is so keen that the downward step is rapidly followed by others. The man who would be agreeable to himself should guard against the first lapse into virtue. As a rule, the time is acquired at an early period of life, before the full consequences of unswerving morality are appreciated. It is prevalent amongst those excellent and oppressive young men who at a later period reject in the possession of a high moral sense. A little knot of sympathetic youths gathers at a university; they divide the various talents and virtues among themselves with the confidence of youthful Alexanders partitioning the world among their followers; and if the priggish element happens to be powerful, they affect what used to be called earnestness—a term which, as we believe, is now becoming utterly obsolete. It means a profound conviction that the earnest person regulates all his actions according to a lofty moral code; or, which is supposed to come to much the same thing, that a lofty moral code is sure to justify whatever he does. The duller members of the body have to content themselves with aggravated forms of punctuality, pecuniosity, and other small virtues; the cleverer probably succeed in imposing upon the world at large, which is always willing to join in a chorus of vigorous laudation, and develop into conscientious Ministers, Bishops, and Chancellors. They are so elaborately scrupulous that whatever they do has a peculiar grace, and those actions which would be considered as jobs or time-serving in the worldly have a fine moral flavour in their mouths, which gives to any cavil a distinct air of profanity. The world is said to be censorious, and to be too ready to suspect good men of having a touch of the Pecksniff in their compositions. We are more often surprised, we must confess, at the readiness with which a man's own valuation of his merits is generally accepted; but it is true that a certain smouldering disposition to revolt is frequently generated by these irrepressibly virtuous persons.

There is one virtue which is frequently affected by men of this kind. They are given to insisting, with ostentatious humility, upon their admirable candour. The objections to this quality in private life are pretty generally understood. It means a disposition to tell a friend of his faults, not because you want to annoy him, which is pardonable, but because you are anxious to do him good, which, as need hardly be said, is intolerable. The character is a tempting one for purposes of fiction, and has been pretty well worked out by novelists and playwrights. They indeed generally fall into the error of representing the practice as a piece of conscious hypocrisy. Sneer tells Sir Pretful Plagiary of the criticisms which have been directed against him with the comparatively innocent motive of deriving amusement from the irritability of his acquaintance. The more frequent character in real life is the man who really thinks that his unpleasant information will improve his victim. He has been so much accustomed to think of himself as a kind of voluntary missionary to the misguided mass of his fellow-creatures, that he falls into the natural error of believing good advice to be sometimes useful. He has convinced himself, or rather he has unawares adopted the pleasing delusion, that to tell a man to walk due south is not the most probable means of starting him towards the North Pole. It requires unusual force of sympathetic imagination to understand the strange transmutations to which any sentiment will be subjected when it is transferred from your own mind to that of another person; and sympathetic imagination is precisely the quality in which a gentleman exuberantly absorbed in the contemplation of his own virtues is apt to be deficient. There is another form of the virtue, however, which is defended upon more refined principles, and which is perhaps not without its merits when it is genuine—that, namely, which is called intellectual candour. The genuine quality is as useful as it is rare. Nobody can read much of the controversial literature of the day without perceiving that, as a general rule, each side confines itself to the study of its own literature. We should not see a confident opinion about matters in which the ablest men are at variance commended as a virtue in those who are totally unable to appreciate the first conditions of the problems at issue, were it not that each party generally forms a little world of its own, and is as incapable of appreciating the state of mind of its opponents as of entering into the prejudices of the inhabitants of the moon. Mr. Mill somewhere strongly recommends the practice of steadily reading the works of our antagonists; and he has himself given some excellent examples of the advantage of the practice. It has perhaps one recommendation which its advocate did not directly contemplate. A Radical, for example, who only reads Radical literature is apt to become doubtful of his own convictions when he observes how many of the stupidest and most ignorant of mankind entertain them as firmly as himself. It is necessary, in order to restore his self-complacency, that he should plunge for a time into the hostile literature; he will be repaid for the first shock of natural antipathy by the discovery that folly and stupidity are not confined to any side of any question. The frame of mind which is generated by many-sided studies is certainly a desirable one, and it is frequently described by the name of candour. But there is a kind of bastard imitation of the same virtue which is far more common and by no means so estimable. A whole stock of commonplace has been accumulated by the dealers in this commodity about theological and political questions. They are fond of talking about the falsehood of extremes, and have a summary mode of settling all controversies by striking a balance between the most remote opinions. There is something to be said for the ultra-democrat, and something for the bigoted reactionist. Go half way between the two, and you cannot fail of being in the right. In aesthetic and philosophical questions the same kind of opinion calls itself eclecticism; and it is infinitely comfortable to people who dislike the responsibility of striking out an original line for themselves. This doctrine commends itself very strongly to the earnest-minded person generally; he is anxious to recognise everything which is put forward with due solemnity; and by placing himself at a central point between the various extremes, he can gain at a cheap rate a reputation for large-mindedness and width of sympathy. Moreover he can thus reconcile deep convictions with facility for gradually shifting into any system of opinion that may be convenient. A generous recognition of the good that may be found on all sides is a fine decorous virtue, almost indispensable to the preservation of a high moral tone. When you consider a theory to be altogether wrong you are apt to laugh at it, and the truly earnest man should never laugh.

Now it is as plain that this theory has something in it as it is plain that it is far from being an accurate statement of the truth. If we endeavour to apply the principle of striking an average between extremes to any case in which there is a general agreement of opinion, we at once come upon the most palpable absurdities. One set of philosophers held that the sun went round the earth, and another that the earth went round the sun; and the only mode of reconciling the two opinions is to be found in the answer of that distinguished candidate at a competitive examination who said that it was sometimes one and sometimes the other body which revolved. Or, to leave questions in which the method is obviously inapplicable, we might take some of the political compromises that have been held at different times. For example, there were the theories about toleration. The extremists were absurd enough to say that every creed ought to be tolerated. Locke, though a very enlightened man for his age, felt that this was going a little too far, and, in order to maintain a character for common sense, decided that a line must be drawn somewhere, and drew it at Atholists and Papists. Others adopted a theory conceived in the spirit of that ingenious Cornish jurymen who, when a man was accused on doubtful evidence of poisoning an old woman, remarked that he would "give a month in the debtors' ward." They thought that burning a Dissenter was wrong, but did not object to a reasonable amount of imprisonment. The case indeed was one in which the extremists on one side or the other were obviously right. We must either grant absolute freedom, which is the conclusion generally adopted, or persecute so vigorously as to suppress the heresy. Any number of other cases might easily be suggested in which the choice really lies between one of two diametrically opposed principles; and any kind of compromise, even if advisable in practice for a time, is obviously untenable in theory. Indeed it may be doubted whether this does not more frequently hold true than the opposite. The truth of which the doctrine of the advantage of middle courses seems to be an imperfect expression is in its genuine form of a different nature. It is quite true, and it is highly important to remember, that when any large number of people hold a given opinion, there must be some general cause for it; but it does not at all follow that the cause is that the opinion contains any large element, or even any element whatever, of soundness. Mankind is foolish, and has frequently maintained a passionate belief in degrading superstitions of various kinds for many centuries together. Any such superstition must have had some reason for permanence; that is to say, it must have gratified some moral or intellectual instincts. A satisfactory explanation of the facts to which it refers must explain what was the nature of its influence; but it does not follow that the influence depended even in the very smallest degree upon the truth of the opinions held. It is an easy misapplication of this obvious truth to assume that any two hostile opinions are always complementary, and that a complete theory may be reached by combining them. The method is attractive in proportion to its easiness; but unluckily it will not work. Genuine candour would force us to admit that no theory is sound which does not explain how it came to be generally misunderstood. When we know the real arrangement of the solar system we can easily account for the delusions which retarded its recognition, and it is perfectly easy to understand why toleration has made such slow progress in the world; but it would be the height of absurdity to attempt a discovery of the truth by combining the opposite doctrines. And thus it is well to remember that candour may sometimes compel us to say, not that everybody is more or less right, but that a large part of mankind is hopelessly stupid and ignorant, and has accepted many doctrines because a gross blunder is often much easier than a true solution of a difficulty.

M. RÉGNIER AND THE FRENCH STAGE.

THE retirement of that excellent actor, M. Régnier, leaves a void in the dramatic art of his country and of the century. His farewell benefit last week at the Comédie Française was one of those interesting solemnities in which our neighbours excel. Surrounded by his comrades, old and young, by his brethren of the company of the House of Molière, of whom some had been associated with the labours and the triumphs of his earlier years, and some owed their own triumphs to his instructions, he received at the hands of one of the most accomplished and delightful actresses of that illustrious Society the laurel crown of many bloodless victories and of a brilliant career, as the customary and classical expression of public and private esteem for the admirable comedian and the perfect gentleman, whose stainless life had dignified the profession which his talent had adorned. At the comparatively early age of sixty-two, and still in all the fulness of physical and mental vigour and activity, M. Régnier had for some time past contemplated retreat, not perhaps without a secret reluctance to quit that ideal world in which so many of the best moments of his best years had passed away, but with an increasing impatience of its incessant labours and absorbing preoccupations, and an anxious yearning for the well-earned leisure and freedom and the calm that should accompany declining years. The longevity of actors, and especially of good actors, is proverbial, in spite of late hours, of an unwholesome atmosphere, of constant nervous excitement and fatigue, of the wear and tear of a continual strain upon the memory and imagination and all the faculties of expression and emotion. Probably the professional capability of endurance is due in most instances to a certain indispensable regularity of habit and carefulness in living; and we know that, in itself, hard work, and even the most stimulating and exacting brain work, is by no means incompatible with length of years. Besides, much of the actor's work becomes routine, and if he knows the secret of his craft, he does not suffer the emotion he creates. However this may be, M. Régnier certainly had not the look or the build of a powerful physique; yet few men, in the practice of the most laborious of professions, have gone through so severe a course of unremitting study and exertion as this consummate artist during his forty years of service on the stage. Doubtless his rare intelligence, and a serious passion for his art, have made his labours comparatively light to him; and the critical sympathy of the most discerning audience in the world has perpetually animated and inspired the conscientiousness and sincerity of his efforts. Add to these gifts and graces of an artist ever zealous for perfection the dignity and peace of a happy personal and domestic life, of a perfect fidelity to family affections and to the duties of home, and we have no difficulty in understanding how or why M. Régnier retires at sixty-two, in the fulness of his fame and powers, on the modest and honourable pension of a veteran Sociétaire, attended by the affectionate respect and regret of the whole dramatic profession, whether actors or authors, and by the sympathies of a grateful public. National troubles and disasters delayed the fulfilment of a purpose already formed before the war. But although he has taken leave of the Parisian public and of the Comédie Française, we are not without hope that M. Régnier may play at least a farewell engagement on this side of the Channel. Many old and valued friendships, and a long familiarity with our language and literature, have made England almost his second country, and whether among his professional brethren or in general society he is scarcely less at home in London than in Paris. We have not heard whether he has resigned his Professorship at the Conservatoire, but we trust that neither his love of home and of his library, nor his long-cherished desire to spend a long holiday in Italy—the holiday of one singularly well qualified by taste, study, and feeling to appreciate all the beauties of natural scenery, and to enjoy the feast of antiquity and art—will deprive us of the opportunity of echoing at least his fellow-countrymen's farewell.

When we speak of the unquestioned dramatic pre-eminence of France, we are apt to forget that it only dates from the Restoration, if it did not culminate under the Monarchy of July. From the days of Elizabeth to the days of Victoria the English theatre might always have disputed the palm. Louis Quatorze, as the painters so often remind us, entertained Molière at his private table, and handed him a dish; yet until the Revolution it was difficult for a comedian to obtain Christian burial; and while Garrick was the friend and companion of the great, the learned, and the good, and Voltaire was denouncing the barbarity of Shakspeare, the successors of Molière were social pariahs in France. It was the liberal intellectual movement of the Restoration that gave to the French theatre a superiority which it has ever since maintained. The decadence of dramatic art in England has made that superiority of late more manifest and emphatic, but there can be little doubt that, potentially at least, the French have always possessed in an eminent degree the temperament and genius of dramatic impersonation. Under the old Monarchy one classical theatre had been raised to the dignity of an institution with collegiate privileges; under the Revolution and the Empire the art itself was recognized as a part of the national system of public instruction. A dazzling array of dramatic authors furnished the stage with an entirely new order of tragic and romantic drama, and with a new sentimental comedy of manners and society. The higher liberal education of the bourgeoisie provided the authors; the Conservatoire supplied a school of actors; and under these combined influences some fitful flashes of genius that defied instruction from time to time illuminated the scene. Régnier had a glimpse of the life behind the curtain in his childhood, but it was in the earliest years of the Monarchy of July that he entered definitively and decidedly on the serious study of the art and the regular discipline of a professional engagement. Madlle. Mars was still the reigning, though the setting, star at the Comédie Française, and Régnier had the advantage of studying under her subtle and sensitive, and not undiluted, observation, and accepting the inestimable counsels of her exquisite experience. From the first day of his apprenticeship to the day of his last appearance he brought to the cultivation of his art and to the performance of his duties at the theatre all those qualifications which are the true secret of distinction and success in every other profession and pursuit; such as indefatigable diligence, constant attention, perfect trustworthiness, businesslike punctuality, the closest application, the highest sense of honour, and a perfect courtesy and sincerity in all his dealings with his brethren and colleagues. In a word, he respected his art, and his art repaid him with interest. He had not those advantages of face and figure which some modern actors in the country of Shakspeare appear to consider more than sufficient qualifications for success in the most difficult of arts. But he had education, reading, instruction, conscientiousness, and self-respect, a keen observation of life and character, a sensitive instinct, a vivid versatility, and a masterly sense of the relative value of broad outline and nicety of detail in dramatic characterization. To this combination of gifts and acquirements may be attributed the force and finish of his performances and the confidence of the dramatists in his devotedness and discretion. Some English actors, who are apt to believe that it is as easy to be a comedian as a counterjumper, or a music-hall "droll," and that neither study nor instruction is required if nature has given them the charms of person and the easy assurance which we all admire in a cheap tailor's sheet of fashionable costumes, would do well to learn from the example of Régnier the lesson of respect, not only for what they call their "art," but for their audience. With Régnier his art was not a charade in which the actors and the audience were befooling each other; it was as serious a presentation of ideal or actual life as any work of the painter or the sculptor, as serious in its aims and purposes as any other intellectual communication which addresses itself to the reason or the feelings of mankind.

Is the degeneration of dramatic art in England to be charged to the default of authors or of actors? We will not undertake to answer the question; but this at least is certain—no dramatic author with a spark of self-respect would deliberately write down to the ignorance and the vulgarity of actors who degrade the profession by their impudence, and insult the public by their familiarity. No doubt the decline of the English stage is attributable in some degree to general causes which belong to the age in which we live and to the condition of society; such as the want of a recognized school and standard of the art, the want of a critical public, the nightly irruption of a multitude of itinerant playgoers who demand the coarsest stimulants for jaded nerves and brains, and the patronage of a stupid and sensual plutocracy. But that there are audiences willing and able to appreciate good acting, some exceptions even in London seem to prove. Nor will there be wanting a dramatic literature wherever dramatic art is to be found. Actors and actresses who never think it worth their while to learn to listen as well as to speak intelligently and effectively, to be always en scène, to attend as carefully to byplay as to dialogue, and to grasp a character as a whole with some faint attempt at thoroughness of intention and subtlety of insight, will never have a dramatic literature at their service. Now it was precisely in this thoroughness of conception and execution that the surpassing merit of Régnier consisted. Scribe, Jules Sandeau, Émile Augier, Legouvé, Madame de Girardin, and Octave Feuillet, regarded him not only as their interpreter but as their fellow-worker, and never failed to seek his advice and co-operation in preparing their pieces for the stage. The modesty of the actor shrank from assuming the rights and responsibilities of the author; but his contribution to the author's success had always begun before the rehearsals. The range of his repertory was astonishingly wide and various. It was never bounded by the ridiculous categories and classifications which Mr. Dickens ridiculed so exactly in the episode of Mr. Crummles's company. From the Sganarelle and Scapin and Panurge of Molière to the Figaro of Beaumarchais, from Petit Jean in M. Scribe's Bertrand et Raton to the parvenu attorney and proprietor, or the old Marquis in M. Sandeau's Mademoiselle de la Seiglière; from Michonnet, the veteran régisseur of the Comédie Française, in M. Scribe and Legouvé's Adrienne Lecouvreur, to Noël, the faithful old servant, in Madame de Girardin's La Joie fait Peur; from the dignified father in M. Émile Augier's Gabrielle to the disreputable brother in his Aventurière; he touched at will, and with equal power, the whole gamut of human passion, sentiment, and humour. He did not make a speciality of "character parts," but every part he acted became as distinct a character in the recollection of his audiences as any living person in real life. The evanescence of an actor's reputation, the sudden silence of oblivion that falls upon his name from the moment when he makes his last bow to the public, has often excited the commiseration of moralists. But Régnier will certainly not be forgotten so long as France possesses a national theatre. In that sanctuary of the dramatic art he has made himself a lasting monument and a perennial tradition. And if the actor and creator of so many parts which have become classics could be forgotten, the master and professor would survive in the pupils who will perpetuate his example, and be the strength and ornament of the French stage for many years to come, when his earlier contemporaries have one after the other made their final exit.

THE VOLUNTARY CHOIR.

IN the course of the famous visit of Mr. Spectator to Sir Roger de Coverley in his country-house he was informed by the worthy knight that, with the view of introducing decorum into the worship of his fellow-parishioners he had given every one of them a hassock and a prayer book, "and at the same time employed an itinerant singing-master, who goes about the country for that purpose, to instruct them rightly in the tunes of the psalms, upon which," adds the essayist, "they very much value themselves, and indeed out-do most of the country choruses that I have ever heard." Whatever he might think of the hassock and the prayer-book, the most conservative of country parsons would smile nowadays at the musical efforts of Sir Roger and the Coverley psalm-singers. Yet it is odd to remember that hardly thirty years ago Tate and Brady still ruled supreme over every congregation, that charity children screamed in every gallery, and that every village had its "flute, violin, bassoon." The great revolutions of history, said a wise man, are the revolutions which nobody notices; but there is something startling in the unconsciousness with which the ecclesiastical world has looked on at the revolution which has been, and is still being, wrought by the Voluntary Choir. It has altered the very look of almost every church, it has demolished galleries and created choir-stalls, it has carried reform into the Liturgy and brevity into the sermon, it has added the "choral curate" to the staff of the clergy, and modified the whole parochial system by the rise of a new lay order with an organization, tradition, tendency, and literature of its own. Nor are the changes it has effected purely ecclesiastical. In its victory over the parish clerk, and its expulsion of the local musicians from the gallery, it has abolished one of the most picturesque elements of village society. In a moral and religious point of view, no doubt much was to be said for the change. Harmonious as was the link which the "flute, violin, bassoon" formed between the church and the alehouse, it was slightly perhaps unecclesiastical; and to the new and more zealous order of the clergy there was something vexatious in their steady habit of adjourning from the front gallery to the tap of the "Red Lion." Their musical temper, too, was of a narrow and conservative order, while their repertory of tunes was somewhat florid and secular in character. Now, however, that they have utterly vanished we can afford a few useless regrets. If, as is so confidently asserted, "we English are not a musical people," we could ill afford to lose the one musical element of our common village life. However rough and imperfect its form may have been, the group round the clerk certainly succeeded in drawing out in some sort the vocal or instrumental capacities of the village tinkor, and preserved after its fashion a tradition of part-singing. Even if the alehouse tap was no very desirable concert-room, their rendering of a few simple carols or madrigals was a better thing for the taste of farmer or ploughboy than no rendering of them at all. Nor is this all the price we have paid for our modern advance in church music. A new "woman's question" has been introduced into religious politics. The almost universal flight of the new choirs from the gallery to the chancel has done much to effect the expulsion of women from all share in church song, and the growing tendency towards "surpliced choirs" will do more. We have heard from eccentric quarters some bold proposals for the creation of an order of singing women draped in dove-coloured cloaks, but, so far as actual experience goes, the victory of the boy chorister is complete. It is amusing enough that at the moment when woman is knocking at the door of every profession and preparing to storm her way into Parliament, she should be driven ignominiously from the choir-stalls.

Our business, however, is not with such great matters as social changes or woman's questions, but with the choir itself. Of all the many elements of a parish, it is at once the most indispensable and the most embarrassing. Few parsons can do without it, and still fewer can get on with it. Many a vicar dates the troubles of his reign from the hapless day when it strikes the fancy of some attached devotee that "the service is dull and wants a little brightening." A crowd of commonplaces are soon at hand to enforce the casual suggestion; music is the predominant taste of the day, a crowd of musical laymen are eager to aid in the worship of the church, the "voluntary" character of the choir removes all fear of expense, while increased offertories and congregations would certainly accompany "more attractive" services. The parson listens, and is lost. He finds the mere getting a choir together no such easy matter, while the keeping them together requires the patience of an angel combined with the diplomacy of a Talleyrand. The girls of his National School become suddenly useless to him, and his boy choristers are no sooner put in training than they require pay. A supplementary boy choir has to be provided as a security against the epidemics of cough and cold which periodically rage on the eve of high festivals, and this again requires fresh "practices" and fresh pay. The musical ardour of the lay world vanishes on closer acquaintance. Bases are pretty easy to get, and for the most part comfortable and regular when you have got them. Tenors are scarcer in the market, and proportionally coy. They make conditions about attendance, refer to the delicacy of their throat, and refuse to turn out in an east wind. Altos are only to be found after a rigorous investigation of the neighbouring drapers' shops, and the vicar soon learns that they know their value. It is a little bothering to have to waste coaxing and blandishments on a beardless young draper; but there is no help for it, for altos are as scarce as they are indispensable. But preliminary troubles such as these are little in comparison with the troubles which begin as soon as the choir is really formed. "The musical temper," we are told, "is one of extreme sensitiveness," and the choir vestry becomes at once a hotbed of petty jealousies and misunderstandings. The church-goer in the pews, as he sees the white surplices stream quietly into the stalls, has no notion of the mauvais quart d'heure which the vicar has been spending before service began. The alto is sulking because there is no solo for him in the anthem. The leading choir-boy has chosen to play pitch-and-toss in the rain, and has appeared voiceless with a sore throat. The bases make their joint protest against the pace at which the precentor takes the responses. The tenor is late as usual, and appears, hot and angry, only just in time to join the procession. At the last moment it is discovered that there is a mistake about the hymns, or the organist suddenly announces that something is the matter with the diapason. But the parson has long ago found out that the dimensions of the choir are far more tolerable than its harmony. Quarrel as they may among themselves, they are one as against the world without. They pique themselves on their esprit de corps. They are fond of acting in concert, of joint representations, suggestions, remonstrances, secessions. Every hint of opposition to their projects is met by a polite offer to retire—"in a body." The thought of a possible array of empty stalls and a humiliating fall back on "congregational music" generally suffices to reduce the parson to obedience. Every Sunday sees some new proof of his subjection. The old hymn-books are exchanged for new. The performers declare it to be impossible to remain in the gallery, and descend into the choir. The vicar has hardly succeeded in calming the Protestant susceptibilities of his district-visitors when a pressure is put upon him for surplices. Little by little he is driven from response to response, and forced to surrender the whole service to his musical coadjutors. A short fight ends in his utter rout on the subject of anthems. The service which he had fondly hoped to "brighten" has become a blaze of musical glory, but the glory is a little oppressive and overwhelming. The choral revolution has lengthened the services till the unhappy minister, with a consciousness of being "irregular," is forced to shelve the Litany, to play tricks with the closing Collects, and to cut down his sermon to a quarter of an hour.

It is clear that a revolution of this sort can hardly go on without producing some effect on a congregation, and the effect it usually produces is like that of Medea's cauldron. An air of rejuvenescence spreads over the pews. The "old attendant" insensibly vanishes. The doctor, who has no ear, slams his pew door in a rage, and takes a sitting at Little Bethel. The quiet parish simmers with a Protestant agitation which is constantly refreshed by secessions at every new anthem. On the other hand, young faces appear in aisle and gallery. If the grocer goes, the grocer's boy takes his place. The deaf old lady who shakes her head violently in mute protest at the chorister lads is elbowed and giggled out of her seat by a row of young milliners. The parson consoles himself for the flight of "the old familiar faces" by the thought that he is laying hold of the new generation. He winks at the increase of flirtations, and congratulates the choir on the "popularity" of the services. The choir accept the congratulation of the parson as they accept the smiles of the young milliners, but they enter a strong protest against the grocer's boy. It is impossible that the anthem can "go well" if that musical young person persists in singing the treble part in a fine rolling bass. They comment with the same severity on a growing tendency among the congregation to "join in" with a variety of "fancy tenors" and "second trebles." The parson blushes guiltily as he remembers the exhortations he has so often addressed to his flock from the pulpit on the subject of "a hearty service," and discovers that "a hearty service" means the silence of everybody save the choir. But before he can hint prudence to the grocer's boy, he finds himself in a sea of clerical troubles. The old-fashioned curate who, after long reluctance, has been wheedled into attempting a monotone, shrinks abashed before the complications of versicles and response. A distant threat of the adoption of "Tallis" on some high festival drives him to resignation. It is necessary to look out for a choral curate, and in process of time the choral curate appears. He is generally a nice fellow, good-humoured in the vestry, useless in the parish, and helpless in the pulpit. He wears his hair parted down the middle, and carries a little pitch-pipe in his pocket. His voice is delightful and his musical enthusiasm all that can be desired. The young milliners declare him "a love," and the choir listen with deference to his criticisms, till the criticisms fall upon themselves. The young curate piques himself on his taste; he pronounces the chants "florid," and the general execution of the responses "rough." He sneers at the famous "Gloria" from the Twelfth Mass on which the choir so especially pride themselves, and wonders how any reasonable being could attribute "such a thing" to Mozart. He insists on a return to "old church music," and strews the choir-stalls with Purcell and Boyce. The practice grows stricter, and the tenor is pulled sharply up in the middle of a solo, and convinced by the little pitch-pipe that he is flat. The choir-master finds his vocation suddenly taken from him, and the organist resigns in a huff. It is necessary that the vicar should again appear on the stage with a policy of conciliation. A choir supper brings peace to the troubled world of music. The organist pledges the choral curate in the vicar's champagne. The tenor forgets his woes, and is coaxed into repeating his favourite verse in "Forget thee! never!" The choir-master makes a speech to prove that harmony is "as necessary among gentlemen as among gentlemen's voices," and everybody shakes hands all round. But the oddest thing in the vicar's discovery that in the choir's opinion harmony has been disturbed by nobody but himself, and that it is only in a spirit of forgiveness and self-sacrifice that they are quaffing his champagne.

He turns for comfort to the offertories, but the increase in his offertories is met by a crowd of expenses. The parson finds that an unpaid choir is almost as expensive a luxury as a paid one. The cost of his boys has tripled. Surplices are not made or kept clean for nothing. The appearance of the choir in the chancel brings a carpenter's bill for choir-stalls. Then comes a little account from Novello's for "pointed psalters" and service-books. The organist drops in with a little bill for "new anthems," and politely suggests that the increase of work must be met by a rise in salary. The organ itself, however sufficient for plain singing, becomes wheezy and recalcitrant when called on for voluntaries and accompaniments. But the vicar has no sooner drained his pocket for new bellows and a new swell, than he is called on to transfer it bodily from the gallery to the choir. The choral curate, agreeable as he is, is useless in "Dirt Alley," and it is requisite to double the clerical staff in order to provide for the spiritual necessities of the parish at large. The parson looks a little grim when a load of debt is added to the growls of his parishioners and the worries of the choir-vestry. Sometimes he throws up the cards in despair, and falls back on a simple "Dearly Beloved." Sometimes he takes refuge in a "Gregorian choir." The Gregorian choir is the lowest form of musical life which has yet been discovered; but, like the lower forms of life in the animal world, it requires little nutriment, and has a wonderful vitality. Any voice will do for it, if the voice is loud enough; and knowledge of music is useless in the face of a notation where four lines and square-headed crotchets are equally picturesque and unintelligible. All notion of time is openly abandoned, and tune resolves itself into a wild and formless howl at the close of each versicle. There is a large opportunity for "free singing," of which the grocer's boy and the milliner's apprentices gladly avail themselves. The effect perhaps is more curious than pleasant; but then the cost is very little. There is always a volunteer organist, who, as he cannot quite read his notes, is anxious to play "variations," and "variations" are supposed to be the proper accompaniment to Gregorian tones. As there is no sort of melody in the introits and versicles, the shyest curate has no great fear of going either right or wrong. As a rule, the young fellows in the choir are thoroughly satisfied with themselves and their stentorian exertions. But if any little storm rises the remedy is easy. "Walk 'em, sir," replied a sagacious churchwarden, when consulted by his parson how to appease a Gregorian choir, "and if they're still stubborn, walk 'em more." The one infallible specific in fact against permanent discontent is a procession. To pace slowly up and down an aisle with hands clasped before them to the vague and fitful sounds of an "ancient hymn," is a temptation which Gregorian choirs find it impossible to resist. If a short procession fails, it is easy to try a long one. Mutineers who have held out against a single turn up the aisle have been known to give way easily before they had been fairly walked round the body of the church. It is true that the remedy is a shade ridiculous, but a wise vicar will walk gravely in the rear, and as he sees peace spreading over the ranks before him, will pocket the ridicule. A far harder thing is to pocket the meritorious exertions of the choir itself. But at the moment of keenest musical suffering it is still possible for the parson to sacrifice his own instincts to the taste of the public, and to congratulate himself that the Church has discovered a new bulwark in the Voluntary Choir.

THE SAVINGS OF THE PEOPLE.

FOREIGNERS who write books about English ways of life almost invariably express their astonishment at the wastefulness and extravagance which they observe among all classes of our countrymen, and especially among the labouring population. An ordinary middle-class man or artisan in France or Germany would be miserable unless he arranged his expenditure so that there should be a safe margin between what he spent and what he earned. He feels bound to make provision, not only for his own old age, but for his children, so that they may get a good start in the world, that his girls may have a dowry, however small, and his sons a little sum to help them in business. Indeed he probably expects, if things have gone at all well with him, that he will himself be able to give up work before he is incapacitated by the infirmities of age. It must be acknowledged that in England such providence is rare. An Englishman of the same rank, as a rule, sticks to his work as long as he is able, makes as much money as he can, and spends it as fast as he makes it. At the most, he has perhaps subscribed to some Society which will support him when he is actually disabled by sickness, accident, or advancing years, or he has made some little assurance for his family at his death. But for the rest he is dependent on his earnings week by week, and his children must shift for themselves as he did before them. An English shopkeeper, clerk, or mechanic would be equally amazed and amused at the notion of saving up, so that at fifty or thereabouts he might be able to retire from work on a modest independence. To a Frenchman or German the habits of our working classes seem to involve a double waste. There is, first, the waste of labour which might be spared, and of time which might be devoted to repose or recreation. And, next, there is the waste of money which is squandered on evanescent or doubtful enjoyments, instead of being frugally laid by in order to secure exemption from labour and anxiety in after life, and to smooth the way of the young people. The extravagant spendings of English working-men are at their height in the households of the iron-puddlers, or of first-class miners during a brisk season, when four or five pounds a week are literally swallowed in feasting and dissipation; but even among the poorest there are possibilities of economy which are apt to be ignored. It is impossible to deny the extreme wretchedness of large classes of our population, both in the towns and in the country, and anything which can be done to improve their condition must be welcomed as a step towards redressing what is at once a national scandal and a social danger. It may be doubted, however, whether a rise in wages, however good in itself, would be more than a temporary palliative, unless accompanied by a change in the improvident and reckless habits of the people. Whatever stimulates their independence and self-respect will be a gain in this respect; but to exchange dependence on an employer for the slavery of the Union is at the best a small and questionable advantage. Genuine independence is to be found only in those habits of thrift and frugality which provide for the future as well as for the present, and secure a safe margin between expenditure and earnings.

It would of course be absurd to blame the working classes as if improvidence were exclusively their fault. Their wastefulness and extravagance are mainly the product of similar habits among other classes, from whose superior education and enlightenment a better example might reasonably be expected. A simpler mode of life, a better understanding of what political economists mean when they talk of reproductive expenditure, among the upper and middle classes, would have its effect upon those below them. Perhaps the best way to encourage people to live within their means is to provide facilities for the safe and profitable investment of their savings. How far it is expedient that the State should make this its business directly is a question on which opinions differ; but it will at least be admitted that the State, if it interferes at all, is bound to take care that its interference shall not, on the one hand, obstruct voluntary enterprise, or, on the other hand, convey a false impression as to the responsibility of the State for the security of the speculations which it takes under its supervision. Hence the importance of the questions which are now being investigated by the Royal Commission on Friendly and Benefit Building Societies. The Commissioners have not yet published the evidence which they have collected in regard to the working of the Friendly Societies; but there can be little doubt that a large number of these associations are in a very precarious, and some of them in an absolutely insolvent, condition, and that the working classes have been induced to part with their savings—in the aggregate an enormous sum—to ignorant or unscrupulous speculators, who have been trading on the Government certificate that was supposed to guarantee the financial soundness of the Societies to which it was granted. In point of fact, the Registrar certified merely that there was nothing illegal in the rules which he approved; but he had no authority to speak as an actuary, or to investigate the financial constitution of the Societies which came before him. In many instances Friendly Societies are based on false actuarial calculations that must necessarily bring them to ruin, the rate of subscriptions which they require at different ages being insufficient to meet the liabilities which will subsequently arise; in other cases the cost of management eats up the revenues, or perhaps the managers cook the accounts and pocket the plunder. It is obvious that the longer these rotten or fraudulent associations are allowed to exist the more numerous will be the list of victims, and the greater will be the injury inflicted on a class of the community who on every ground are entitled to sympathy and protection. At the same time, it is natural that there should be strong interests opposed to a thorough investigation which must end in an exposure of insolvency, and possibly of malpractices into the bargain. There are the people who are now making a good thing for themselves out of speculations which would instantly collapse if the light were let in upon them, and who perhaps may also have more to dread than a mere loss of income; then there are the members who trust that their Society will at least last their time, and who would prefer to have the deluge postponed for the benefit of the next generation; and there is also a good deal of false pride and perverse jealousy on the part of the working classes, who are not indisposed to resent any interference with their concerns as intrusions, if not oppressive. Now that the Commissioners ask for further powers to push their inquiries to the bottom, we may expect to find an outcry raised against the proposed inquiry. "We have had," they tell us, "occasionally to receive evidence of which, we fear, none of those who heard it could doubt the deliberate falseness; we have failed in many cases to elicit that which we believe would have been important; and we have been compelled to leave almost untouched a whole line of inquiry"—as to burial clubs and their influence on infanticide for the sake of fees, we suppose—"of which the evidence of Mr. Aspinall, the Coroner for Liverpool, may show the significance, but which, as involving criminal charges, could not be adequately carried out without powers of compulsion and powers of indemnity." It is due to the working classes, as well as to justice, that these inquiries should not be broken off in this manner.

For the present the Commissioners have confined their reports to the subject of Building Societies, which are supported by the middle, as well as by the working, classes. There is reason to fear that there may be unsoundness in some of the speculations of this kind, where the borrowed capital is excessive in proportion to genuine assets; and there can be no doubt that there is a serious inconsistency between the operations of most of these Societies and the law as it now stands. The Societies have, in fact, quite outgrown the law. Instead of being small local associations to assist working-men in the construction of cottages, they have become corporations of great magnitude dealing with vast sums of money. It is estimated—for exact returns cannot be procured—that there are 2000 Building Societies now in existence in England and Wales, the total number of members being upwards of a million, with a subscribed capital of over 9,000,000, a loan and 60-paid capital of over 6,000,000, total assets to the amount of 17,000,000, mortgage advances over 15,000,000, and a yearly income of more than 11,000,000. One Society has nearly 17,000 members, another 10,000, and so on. The income of a single Society is over a million and a half. So great is the confidence of the public in these enterprises that many of them have reduced the rate of interest to four, and even three, per cent. in order to check the influx of deposits which still come flowing in. In various districts the banks find it difficult to compete with them. We hear of single advances, not only of thousands, but of twenty and thirty thousand pounds, being made by Building Societies, sometimes on the security of mills and factories; and there seems to be no doubt that they have become to a large extent middle-class organizations. On the other hand, the Commissioners report that the Societies still do business mainly with the working classes, or with a class only slightly superior to them in station. In Birmingham, in Ashton-under-Lyne, and elsewhere, they have greatly encouraged the construction of houses for the working and lower middle classes. The statistics of these Societies show that, notwithstanding our national reputation for improvidence, there is yearly an enormous sum in the shape of savings seeking a safe investment; and also that the people cannot be said to be altogether divorced from the soil when we find that they are, through the Building Societies, in possession of land equal to the area of several counties, as owners, lessees, or mortgagees. It is evident from the operations of these associations that there is no difficulty in purchasing large or small estates, if a sufficient price is offered. The question being whether the Building Societies should be cut down to fit the law, or the law expanded so as to adapt it to their developed condition, the Commissioners recommend that the latter alternative should be followed. They think that the exemption of stamp duty on mortgages should be limited to securities for sums not exceeding 200*l.*; that the privilege of priority against the estates of deceased debtors should be abolished; that the borrowing powers should be limited to two-thirds of the total value of the amounts for the time being secured on mortgage; that the system of registration should be improved so as to secure uniformity, and to allow of a discretion as to certifying; and that some other modifications should be made in the existing law. Building Societies will, on the whole, gain rather than lose by these changes, and all doubts as to their position will be removed.

MODERN PROPHECIES.

WE called attention about a twelvemonth ago to a little work of Dr. Döllinger's on Prophecies of the Christian Era, ranging from the first ages of the Church to the Reformation. But it must not be supposed that the passion for peering curiously into the future, which seems to be an ineradicable instinct of humanity, has died out since then, or that the demand has ceased to create a supply. The second-eight of which Sir Walter Scott has told us so much, and many of the best authenticated dreams and ghost stories—only that unfortunately they always reach us at second hand—bear witness to the persistent desire of mankind to pierce the veil, and to their robust faith, in spite of all former disappointments, in the possibility of gratifying it. Indeed the very use of the word "prophet," which has come in ordinary apprehension to be simply identified with seer, or foreteller of the future, is a significant indication of this. In Latin the same word is employed for prophet and poet, and the Greek term prophētēs, so largely employed in the Septuagint and the New Testament, does not, strictly speaking, mean a foreteller of coming events at all. Liddell and Scott rightly translate it, "one who speaks for another," and especially "one who speaks for God"—an "interpreter"—and give as its New Testament sense "an interpreter of Scripture, a preacher." This is also, of course, its Old Testament sense. The Jewish Prophets were the interpreters of God's will, or preachers to the people; their predictive or "prophetic" function, as we have come to limit the sense of the word, was entirely subordinate to this. When Dr. Newman styled one of his early Anglican works Lectures on the Prophetic Office of the Church, he was as accurate as he always is in his choice of language. But we make not the least doubt that nine-tenths of ordinary Christians, and probably a good many Christian ministers, if they were asked who the Prophets were, would reply at once, without any hesitation, that they were persons who foretold future events; so completely has that one incident of the function which they discharged in the Jewish Church ousted all the rest from the popular mind. And the enormous multiplication of the prophets of Israel who "with one mouth declared"—that is, predicted—"good things unto the king," but who do not seem to have greatly concerned themselves about any moral or spiritual instruction, shows that this one-sided estimate of the prophetic office is by no means of merely modern growth.

We have observed that the stream of Christian prophecy by no means dried up at the Reformation, while there are, moreover, many predictions of an earlier date still eagerly awaited, as being unfulfilled, or only partially fulfilled. Many of these, which are just now popular amongst Legitimist and Ultramontane circles in France, had reference to a Messiahic figure, who has sometimes been identified with the First or Second Napoleon, and is of course now supposed to be the Count of Chambord, though the circumstance of his being sometimes described as a young prince" rather complicates that application. With the great King was usually associated a great Pope, who is called in the prophetic catalogue ascribed to St. Malachy, which is really about three centuries old, Pontifex Angelicus. The monk of Orval, who died in the middle of the sixteenth century, and whose written prophecies were buried with him, but were dug up in 1793, and afterwards published—whether with or without being tampered with it is now impossible to say—adds some further particulars. According to him, three great Kings—whom the Times Correspondent the other day specified as the Czar, the King of England, and a German Prince—are to be converted to Catholicism, and two island nations also are to embrace the true faith. This is indeed a favourite topic of these later seers, and a famous vision, said to have been related by Edward the Confessor on his deathbed, is interpreted in the same sense. He saw, we are told, a green tree, representing England, cut down and moved to a distance of three furlongs from its own root, after which it was replaced. This is explained to refer to the separation of England from Catholic unity for the space of three centuries, and therefore to point to its speedy conversion. Still more elaborate was the prophecy of St. Hildegard, who lived in the twelfth century, and foretold that "in distant ages the Christian nations would very generally depart from the fear of God, wars would increase and become more destructive, vast multitudes would perish by the sword, and many cities be destroyed; but, at last, mankind, purified through heavy tribulations, would return to the practice of the laws of Holy Church." The language, as so often happens in such cases, is sufficiently vague, but it no doubt lends itself readily to the antecedents and outbreak of the Reformation and the religious wars which followed in its wake. The prophetess goes on to describe the reign of righteousness and peace which shall follow the repentance of the nations and usher in the Second Advent, partly in language derived from Isaiah, and the conversion of the Jews. A century and a half later St. Gertrude expatiated in more general terms on the glory reserved for the latter days of the Church. Far more explicit are the predictions of the hermit Bartholomew Holtzhäuser, nearer our own day, who foretold in detail the reunion of Greeks and Latins, the return of England and Germany to Catholic unity, the fall of the Turkish Empire, and that "all idolatry and unbelief shall be rooted out, and the nations enjoy a general peace, while all arts and sciences shall be brought to perfection, and the promises of the inspired Prophets of the Old Testament receive their full accomplishment." There are strange stories of predictions of the kind current even in our own days. Our readers may like to have one specimen. We extract it from a work published some years ago by a Roman Catholic gentleman who is still living. He was travelling in Wales at the time, and, in the course of conversation with the priest at whose chapel he had been hearing mass, asked him whether he thought England would ever again become Catholic:—

The good priest said with much earnestness that he believed it would. And he added a most remarkable history that tended to confirm his opinion. About a hundred and fifty years before that time there was a saintly Catholic gardener in that very town, who was a man of extraordinary virtue and prayer; indeed his life was one continued prayer, and next to his own sanctification no object occupied so prominent a place in his multiplied petitions to the throne of grace as the return of his own dear country England to the unity of the Catholic Church. One morning, three years before his happy death, he had received the holy communion, and all at once he was rapt in spirit, and Jesus, whom in the sacrament of His love he had just received, manifested Himself to His humble servant, and with a sweet and gracious aspect said to him, "My son, I have heard your prayer so often poured out before me; I will have mercy upon England." At these words, the poor gardener, overwhelmed with gratitude, exclaimed: "When, Lord, oh! when?" "Not now," replied our Saviour; "but when England shall build as many churches as she destroyed at the change of religion, and when she shall restore and beautify the remainder."

The narrator of the tale proceeds to quote a contemporary authority—he was writing in 1857—to the effect that about three thousand churches have been restored and nearly two thousand new churches built in Great Britain during the present century, and he considers that there is "a mysterious relation between the facts and the prediction."

The prophecies we have mentioned chiefly concern the fortunes of the Church, and indeed there are few of the mediæval predictions, many of which emanated from monks and nuns, which have not a religious bearing, though they often include political references also, and especially where Rome, the home both of an ecclesiastical and a civil secular sovereignty, is concerned. There are also many vaticinations about Paris, which was looked on as the second centre of Latin Christendom, and these seem still to be exerting a perceptible influence, if we may credit recent statements as to personages of high family in France who hold aloof from the capital at this moment from dread of being involved in its imminent destruction. Still more frequent, as is natural, are the predictions about Antichrist, who, according to some authorities, is to be born of the union between a Jew and a Mahometan. It would be interesting to examine how far many modern and Christian prophecies may be traced to a Pagan source. The Christian apologists of the early centuries, as is well known, invariably recognized a genuine prophetic element in Paganism, as well as in Judaism, and boldly appealed to it. And Alexander insists that, as "Christianity is the end to which all development of the religious consciousness necessarily tended," they were fully justified in doing so. But then he also admits that, with their lack of critical taste or skill, they made many mistakes, especially in using all sorts of spurious or interpolated writings which passed under high-sounding mythical names, as of the Grecian Trismegistus or the Egyptian Thoth; and it seems that Christian as well as Jewish writers freely interpolated the Sibylline oracles themselves. Celsus at least publicly reproached them with doing so, and Origen could only answer that the earlier Sibylline writings were also full of interpolations. The tendency to fabricate predictions and the tendency to credit them, which necessarily react on one another, spring in fact from a common source. It is easy to classify the prophets and their disciples as knaves and fools, and a generation or two ago such a rough and ready classification would have passed current in educated society as exhaustive. There are no doubt still persons who regard Swedenborg and Joanna Southcott as mere vulgar impostors, and their followers, past or present, as idiots or stark mad. But psychology and history alike rebel against this process of coarse rationalizing. It is very doubtful if any impostor ever gained a following who was not at least half an enthusiast, and it is certain that nine-tenths of the followers in such cases are much more of enthusiasts than of fools. The feverish hankering after a knowledge of futurity may be as irrational as the ready credence accorded to any one who offers to satisfy it is often purely superstitious, but denunciation will do little to dispel a curiosity which repeated disappointment seems wholly powerless to diminish. It was just as unreasonable to feel an exceptional dread about the result of the Prince of Wales's illness on the anniversary of his father's death, and an exceptional sense of hopefulness when the day was over; yet we suspect that not one in ten even of the educated classes was altogether exempt from such a feeling, and we should be quite prepared to learn that it was shared by the Royal Family themselves. How many persons are there of sound digestion and well-stored mind, and not exclusively ladies, who will never, if they can help it, start on a journey on a Friday or sit down thirteen to dinner! Yet this is much more irrational than to attach some weight to a prediction, not in itself absurd, coming from a man of apparently saintly character who believes himself to be inspired from above. And belief is of course more natural, though not therefore more reasonable, when the prophecy happens to jump with a surmise or a wish of our own. Archbishop Laud was not perhaps a wise politician; but he was certainly very far indeed from being a visionary or a fool; yet he attached what now seems to us a ridiculous importance to his dreams, and was not ashamed to avow it. It is the privilege of a well-regulated mind to regard all such matters with a lofty indifference, but we are not sure that the privilege may not be too dearly purchased. Man is not only "a rational animal," as the logic manuals tell us, and according to the deduction drawn by the same authorities, "a cooking animal," but he also possesses what Bishop Butler rather unceremoniously designates "the froward and delusive faculty" of imagination, which plays to the full as important a part in the mental development of most men as the reason. And as long as that "delusive faculty" holds its place, there will always be plenty of men and women, who are neither knaves nor fools, so organized as to have a capacity for seeing visions and dreaming dreams, and a vastly greater number eager to listen to their tale, and more than half inclined to believe it.

THE MARTYRED HORRY.

INCIDENTS occasionally occur which make one wonder how much longer the criminal law will bear the strain of that sickly sentiment and morbid sympathy with criminals which seems to be continually on the increase. What with the mad doctors on the one hand, and the madder philanthropists on the other, it appears to be becoming continually more difficult to get the law enforced. A French writer, discussing a proposal to abolish capital punishments, remarked that he thought it was an excellent idea, but it was for the murderers to set the example—"Abolissions la peine de mort, mais que messieurs les assassins commencent." It is a curious trait of modern philanthropy that its fullest sympathy and most affectionate attentions should be devoted to those who prey upon and destroy their species. There seems to be a considerable body of people who, when a man kills another, yearn over the murderer as the hapless victim of an accidental misfortune. They compete with each other in their efforts to persuade him not to distress himself too much about it, and strain every nerve to render the formalities of justice as mild and innocuous as possible. A few weeks ago a young man named Lennard was sentenced to death for the murder of another man. He was recommended to mercy on account of his youth, but the Home Secretary, having carefully inquired into the matter, and consulted with the judge, decided that the law ought to take its course. One of the members for Leeds took up the case, and the Home Secretary reconsidered the question, but adhered to his former view. Upon this Mr. Wheelhouse "went to the Rev. E. Jackson of St. James's, and urged him to send by telegraph a remonstrance against the impending execution." Mr. Jackson did so, and the result was that the Home Secretary immediately telegraphed back that he had determined to reprieve Lennard. Thus a decision which had been deliberately formed after mature consideration and consultation with the proper authorities was withdrawn by the Home Secretary, on the eve of the execution, merely because he happened to receive a telegram from a clergyman saying that he thought it a pity the man should be hanged. An eminent dignitary of the Church once signed a memorial praying that the life of a girl who had murdered her mother under circumstances of peculiar atrocity should be spared, and the reason he gave was that he thought the murderer would make an excellent Sunday School teacher. We do not know what Lennard's gifts may be in that way; but if it is to be understood that capital sentences are to be cancelled whenever a murderer can get a tender-hearted clergyman to send a shilling telegram on his behalf to the Home Secretary, we are afraid very few sentences of that nature will be carried into execution. Even Madlle. Dixblanc need not despair; if she only shows herself to be sufficiently edified by the new views of life presented to her mind since she locked up her mistress's body in the coal cellar, and especially by the exhortations of the gaol chaplain, she will find herself an object of more affectionate interest and gushing admiration than she could ever have expected had she refrained from strangling her employer. A straw will break the camel's back, and poor Mr. Bruce no doubt felt in Lennard's case that the point had been reached at which he could no longer endure the pressure that was brought to bear upon him. It is obvious, however, that this is not the way to maintain the dignity of the law and the confidence of the public in its administration.

It is difficult to say whether it is more demoralizing that murderers should be reprieved in order to gratify weak-minded busy-bodies whose hearts are as soft as their heads, or that the law should take its course in order that the victims may be afterwards glorified as "martyrs." A "demonstration" has lately taken place at Burslem in Staffordshire which illustrates in a remarkable manner the state of mind into which it is possible for people to work themselves when they once give way to false sentiment and maudlin tenderness. It is stated in the local papers that about one hundred and fifty or two hundred of the inhabitants walked in procession to the parish church "to show their appreciation of the late W. F. Horry," and a funeral sermon was "kindly preached" by the rector. The streets through which the procession passed were thronged with thousands of people. The church was also crowded with a respectable congregation, many shed tears, and the preacher himself was "almost choked with emotion." A funeral card was issued, "Sacred to the Memory of William Frederick Horry," &c., winding up with a statement that Horry was held in the highest respect at Burslem for his "sterling qualities," that he died "as a man, a Christian, and a martyr," and "was more sinned against than sinning—peace be to his manes!" Any one who happened to read the account of these proceedings without being acquainted with the late Mr. W. F. Horry's career would naturally be led to the conclusion that he had perished in some noble act of heroism and self-sacrifice for the good of mankind; he might perhaps have been a missionary bishop murdered by savages, a village Hampden who had succumbed to local persecution, a dauntless physician who had fallen a prey to the pestilence against which he was contending. There are many respectable persons who are not honoured with the "highest respect" of their fellow-townsmen, and it is reasonable to suppose that this is reserved for a very high type of character. A candid inquirer whose curiosity had been aroused by these eulogiums, and who had observed that reference was made to a recent trial, would naturally turn to the reports of the trial which appeared in the newspapers to see whether they threw any light on the subject. He would then learn that Horry once kept a tavern in Burslem and married the barmaid. Last year, however, his wife, of whom he was violently jealous, left him and sought his father's protection. She was living at his father's house at Boston in January last when Horry sought an interview with her. He went armed with a five-chambered revolver, and when her back was turned, as she led the way from one room to another, he shot her dead. He had purchased the pistol two days previously, all the chambers were loaded, and there was no doubt that the crime was deliberate and premeditated. It was stated that Horry had been in the habit of drinking to excess. Two or three years ago he had more than one attack of delirium tremens, and since then he had been frequently observed to be excited and wild in manner. It was also remarked that he drank deeply, and that "he was shaky" and had twitchings of the mouth and other marks of a confirmed drunkard. After the murder he was offered a little brandy, but he refused it, saying, "No, I have had enough of that; I have been drunk on it for the last six weeks." He had told his brother that his wife had been unfaithful, and had mentioned different names in connexion with the matter. He had also consulted a lawyer with a view to taking proceedings in the Divorce Court. The only defence set up for him by his counsel was that by drinking and jealousy he was so overpowered as to be unable to control his actions. Dr. Tuke's theory of a "paroxysm of motive" had not yet been invented, or we should no doubt have heard of it in this instance. Mr. Justice Quain, who tried the case, remarked that it was a very painful one, but the jury were bound to see that the law was vindicated, and society protected. It was probable, he added, that Horry was convinced of his wife's infidelity, and it appeared that he was in the habit of drinking; but jealousy and drunkenness were no excuse. When the jury returned a verdict of guilty, the judge said that it was impossible they could arrive at any other conclusion. Horry was sentenced to death, and in this instance the sentence was carried out.

It appears, therefore, that the "Christian martyr" for whom Burslem cherishes "the highest respect" which it is capable of feeling, was a drunken publican, who drank himself into delirium, and killed his wife in a fit of jealousy. Whether there was any ground for his jealousy we cannot say, but it appears that his father at least disbelieved his story, and gave the poor woman the shelter of his roof. Even assuming that his suspicions were well founded, it need hardly be pointed out that Horry should have had recourse to the Divorce Court, and not to fire-arms, and that there is some danger in encouraging the idea that a man who suspects his wife has a right to shoot her. From the report of the trial we turn to the rector's sermon for an explanation of Horry's claims to the profound respect and admiration of his townsmen as a model Christian. The sermon was on the text, "Evil pursueth sinners, but to the righteous good shall be repaid"; but the report leaves us in some doubt whether, in the rector's opinion, the murderer was to be classed among the sinners or among the righteous. In one passage Horry is spoken of as an "instrument made use of by Heaven to stay the progress of one of the sinners." If these words mean anything, they would seem to imply that Horry was an agent of Providence, and that he was hanged for fulfilling a divine mandate to kill his wife. It will perhaps be thought that it is just as well there should be what the rector calls "human law" to discourage murder, when language of this kind is used from the pulpit in regard to a cowardly and atrocious crime. What seems to have impressed the rector most favourably with regard to Horry was the good end he made. Those, he observed, who had been the comrades and boon companions of the murderer would never have expected from him a homily on sin and its penalties. We are led to suppose that the production of this homily was the end which Providence had in view in using Horry as an instrument of murder. But if the wife had not been unfaithful, Horry would not have killed her, and if the "human law" had not taken him in hand with a view to hanging him, he would not have had the opportunity of composing his homily in the condemned cell; so that we have, according to this theory, two sins and the sacrifice of a couple of lives in order that this wretched creature might indite the poor canting egotistical fustian of his last speech and confession. The impression which seems to have been left on the minds of the congregation is shown by a letter which a person who was present has addressed to one of the local papers, asserting that Horry, "by his repentance and the manner in which he expiated his sins, has afforded an example by which many will be benefited." It is to be hoped that Horry's example will not be followed too closely, and that it will not be assumed to be necessary for a man to drink himself into a state of delirium and then to kill his wife in order that he may become a model Christian, and edify the world. For our own part we cannot say that Horry's end appears to us to be altogether of an edifying character. On the contrary, there is something shocking in the arrogant confidence and jaunty self-conceit of the poor wretch in quitting this world. From the beginning to the end of the long letter in which he expresses what he calls his "modest Christian faith," there is nothing more than a casual allusion to the poor woman whom he murdered, and to repentance for his crime. He speaks as a saint might be supposed to do from an eminence of piety and goodness, looking down in sorrow on the grovelling world below. He is sure of Heaven for himself, but he recurs over and over again, in anything but a hopeful tone, to the probable destiny of his father, who sided with his wife against him. "I have been deeply sinned against and wronged," he says. "I pardon all who have sinned against me, particularly my father." The bitterness of spirit thus betrayed contrasts painfully with the pious texts and stereotyped exclamations of religious faith which fill the letter. The whole affair is a melancholy example of the morbid state of mind into which people are sometimes apt to fall with regard to notorious criminals. The lady who has been writing to the Times to complain that women are treated like domestic feræ, and that when a man kills his wife by thrusting her under the wheels of a waggon he gets off with three months' hard labour, will perhaps be disposed to regard the demonstration in honour of Horry as another sign of the prevailing contempt for female life. It would certainly be difficult to imagine a more horribly grotesque instance of popular canonization than this glorification of a drunken innkeeper for murdering his wife.

HISTORY MADE TO ORDER.

VERY odd indeed are the things which ever and anon come before us in the way of statements about the history of distant times. And especially odd do they become when men undertake the task of writing history so as to suit the requirements of theological partisanship. In our line of life examples drop in upon us from various, and sometimes unexpected, quarters. We hardly know how we came by a lecture on the Destiny of Christian Rome, delivered in the Church of St. Laurence O'Toole—seemingly in Dublin—by the Very Rev. Monsignor Moran, D.D., but here it is before us. Now, if Monsignor Moran had not thought good to run his head against the twelfth century, we might not have greatly concerned ourselves as to anything which he might choose to say about the Destiny of Christian Rome. We were of course prepared to find that a Monsignor preaching in the church of St. Laurence O'Toole provides Christian Rome with quite a different destiny from any provided for it by Dr. Cumming. And, if Monsignor Moran chooses to talk about the twelfth century or any other century, we have not a word to say against his talking about it in the conventional way which a long tradition has prescribed to his class. He may use any epithets that he chooses without in the least disturbing us. We know that there are those in whose eyes our own Edward the Sixth is a young tiger-cub, and those in whose eyes he is a blessed and innocent prince. Let him be either blessed or tiger-cub at pleasure, or, if any one likes it, let the two characters be rolled together in the form of "B. Tiger-cub," provided only that no imaginary actions are attributed to him and that none of his real actions are wilfully kept out of sight. We do not quarrel with the worthy diarist Burchard, who writes the history of Alexander the Sixth, beginning each entry with "Sanctissimus Dominus noster," and under that head faithfully setting forth the murders, adulteries, and perjuries that were done that day. So we know how a Monsignor is bound to write in any question about Popes and Emperors, Guelfs and Ghibelines. To be sure, in the English tongue the thing can be done only very feebly. No man can scold so vigorously in our cold Northern tongue as can be done in ecclesiastical Latin. To call people blessed and innocent, or to call them knaves, fools, tiger-cubs, and such like, is a small matter compared with the power of crowning either side with all the several good and bad names which have their ending in issimus. So we are not greatly amazed at the way in which our Monsignor talks of Popes and Emperors severally. Nor are we much more amazed when writers who strive to do justice to both sides, in whose eyes neither Popes nor Emperors are ex officio either angels or devils, are spoken of as writers in whom "envenomed hatred of the Holy See takes the place of history," and by whom "facts are represented, not as they really were, but as these writers would wish them to have been."

This kind of talk reminds one of a very ancient saying—"Ye take too much upon you, ye sons of Levi." A Monsignor may perhaps have some difficulty in understanding that the Holy See is not in everybody's eyes the same all-important object which it is in his own. An impartial historian, who has learned that no sect or class ever had a monopoly either of good or of evil, will certainly not look on the Holy See with "envenomed hatred." He will look on the Papacy as an institution which has played a most important part in the world's history, and whose working has been so different in different ages that it cannot be pronounced to be either wholly good or wholly evil. From the point of view of English history he will pronounce the See of Rome to have been a great benefactor in the sixth century, and on the whole an enemy in the thirteenth. Yet even in the thirteenth century he will not feel a purely "envenomed hatred" against the power which gave us Stephen Langton. But we can quite understand that to the mind of a Monsignor, to whom every act of every Pope, John the Twelfth, Alexander the Sixth, and the rest, is no doubt clothed with infallibility, such a calm way of balancing the good and evil of the Papacy, just like the good and evil of anything else, may bear the look of envenomed hatred. It is more important when the attempt to narrate facts impartially, to do justice to Pope and Caesar alike, is described as "representing facts, not as they really were, but as these writers would wish them to have been."

The matter on which Monsignor Moran feels so troubled is the history of Frederick Barbarossa, and especially his conduct with regard to the double election to the Papacy which followed the death of Pope Adrian the Fourth. It is a matter too far removed from our own time, and from any question bearing on our own time, to excite any vehement degree of partisanship, or to supply any strong temptation to represent facts otherwise than as they really were. But we will meet our Monsignor on his own ground. He has, after his own fashion, appealed unto Caesar; so unto Caesar he shall go. Let us see whether his own statements about the Emperor Frederick represent facts as they really were, and whether they do not look very like representing facts as a Monsignor might naturally wish them to have been.

Let us see how the Monsignor tells the famous tale of the double election:—

On the day when the Cardinals elected Alexander the Third to the chair of St. Peter, the agents of Barbarossa rushed into the conclave, tore off the sacred vestments from the newly-elected Pope, and hurried him and the Cardinals to prison. "Great," says an eye-witness of these scenes, "was the grief of the clergy; the judges and senators of Rome were weighed down with sorrow, and a helpless stupor seized the people, until at length, when the august victims of persecution had been three days in the dungeons of Trastevere, the spirit of Frangipani and the other nobles could brook the outrage no longer; they marched at the head of the Roman people, seized the fortress, and restored the prisoners to liberty." Three anti-Popes in succession were intruded by Barbarossa into the See of Peter, seeking by unrelenting tyranny to oppress the whole Church of God.

Now "Barbarossa," by Monsignor Moran's way of talking of him, might have been the pirate instead of the Emperor; but this does not greatly matter. The point is that, from this account, in which facts are to be represented as they were, and not as anybody might wish them to be, nobody would guess that there was any double election, any division among the Cardinals, at all. The Monsignor's hearers would not be to blame if they fancied that the Cardinals with one voice chose Roland, otherwise Alexander the Third, and that some unknown persons in the Imperial interest elapped them in prison for their pains. Now this double election is one of the things about which we know everything, or rather, unluckily for those who have to write the story, we know something more than everything, a state of things which comes to nearly the same as knowing nothing. That is to say, we have minute accounts from eye-witnesses and actors of both parties; but their accounts are so utterly contradictory that it is hardly possible, even by stretching our charity to the utmost, to believe that both sides were writing in good faith. But on one point there can be no doubt—namely, that a party of the Cardinals chose Roland, who took the name of Alexander, and that another party chose Octavian, who took the name of Victor. The question was, whether of the two elections was canonically valid. Letters from the two rival Popes, and from their several followings of cardinals, are preserved in the second book of Radevic of Freisingen, and the English reader will find a summary of them in the third volume of Milman's Latin Christianity. The first letter is from Victor, and its tenor is a little suspicious. He salutes all the Saints, but chiefly them which are of Caesar's household. He speaks of his own election as having been regularly made by the Cardinals, with the consent of the clergy and people, the senators and captains of Rome. He gives no hint as to any division among the electors, but at the end of his letter he speaks almost casually of a certain Roland, a conspirator with William of Sicily against the Church and the Empire, who had been thrust in twelve days after his own election. It may perhaps win us some favour in the eyes of Monsignor Moran if we say that this does not read like the letter of a man who is speaking the whole truth. Then comes a much longer letter from Alexander, addressed neither to the world in general nor to the courtiers of the Emperor, but to the Bishop, Canons, Doctors of Law and Masters, of Bologna. He does not at all claim a unanimous election, though he asserts that the Cardinals who supported his rival were only three. He then says that, as soon as he was invested with the Papal mantle, Octavian tore it from his shoulder with his own hands, which is probably the incident which the Monsignor refers to when he talks of the agents of Barbarossa rushing into the Conclave and tearing the sacred vestments from the newly elected Pope. Octavian was then invested with a mantle which he had himself brought for the purpose, but in the hurry it was put on the wrong way, and Octavian does not seem to have had, like William the Conqueror, ready wit enough to make capital out of the accident. At this stage bands of armed men appear, and Alexander, with the Cardinals of his party, takes refuge in the fortress attached to the church. There they stayed for nine days, for certain of the senators, bribed, so Alexander says, by his rival, kept guard over them and would not let them come forth. But the people rose up against the senators, on which a further bribe induced the senators to remove the Cardinals to a straiter and stronger place of ward on the other side of the Tiber. Thence, after three days, the senators and people released them, and Alexander was solemnly consecrated and crowned at Ninfa in the presence of a great company. The Cardinals of Victor's obedience next address their letter to all persons of rank and authority in Church and State, in which they plainly profess themselves to be partisans of the Emperor against the Sicilian King; they claim to have had nine votes at the election against fourteen on the side of Alexander. They allow that an attempt was made to clothe Alexander with the Papal mantle, but they affirm that before it was done Victor was regularly chosen, invested, and enthroned with the assent of the senate, clergy, and people at Rome. The sojourn of the Cardinals of the other side in the fortress of St. Peter, and their departure out of the city, are also mentioned, but we of course hear nothing of the violence and the bribery spoken of in the letter of Alexander. At last, twelve days after the election of Victor, they invested Alexander at a place called the Cistern—the Cistern of Nero—and afterwards consecrated him. Then follows a letter to the Emperor from the Cardinals of Alexander's party, asserting that the cause of Victor was supported only by three false brethren among the Cardinals, but containing no new facts, except a complaint of certain wrongdoings of the Count Palatine Otto after the election. On this the Emperor, following, as he says, the examples of his predecessors, Constantine, Theodosius, Justinian, Charles, and Otto, summons a Council of the Church to decide the matter. Fifty Bishops, and a number of Abbots and other prelates, came together, and, as the Emperor affirms, they sat strictly as an ecclesiastical court, without any lay interference. Before this Council Victor appeared, but Alexander took no notice of the Imperial summons. A letter was read from the Canons of St. Peter's, supporting the cause of Victor, and adding the further statement that the party of Alexander had contrived to occupy the castle as a place of shelter before the election began. The Council heard the cause, and decided in favour of Victor, chiefly on the grounds of the earlier investiture of Victor, and of the non-appearance of Alexander; though the fact comes out that letters of Alexander to the insurgent cities of Lombardy were intercepted and read, a fact which may not have been without its influence on the minds of the Imperialist prelates.

This is the account, as we have it in Radevic—an account which is especially valuable as it consists wholly of official documents, and gives us the arguments of both parties as set forth by themselves. Of other contemporary writers, the Imperialist Otto Morano gives us no fresh facts, but the Milanese Sire Raul, telling the story in the same way as it is told in the letters of Alexander's party, adds that the three Cardinals who voted for Octavian devised his election in common with the Imperial Ambassadors, Otto the Count Palatine, and Guy Count of Blandrate. The life of Alexander by the Cardinal of Arragon, a respectable though not contemporary authority, adds certain invectives which he says that the Milan populace, especially the women and children, addressed to Victor, and mentions Otto Frangipani as leading the party by whom the Cardinals of Alexander's obedience were set free. His account, as may be supposed, is conceived in a strongly anti-Imperialist spirit, but it does not help us to any facts with regard to the actual election beyond what we find in the strictly contemporary documents. Such is the genuine story. The reader may judge for himself which Pope was the more canonically elected, and he may believe whichever he chooses of the statements, that Victor was supported by nine or only by three Cardinals; he will probably suspect that the motive which led the Emperor and a Council consisting mainly of German and Burgundian Bishops to accept the claims of Victor is as likely to be sought for in his professions of Imperialist loyalty as in the fact that he was, by whatever means, and in whatever form, the first to be invested with the Papal mantle. Nor is there anything improbable in the statement that the Cardinals of Victor's party acted with the advice and consent of the Imperial ambassadors. But all this is something very different from the picture to which the congregation of St. Laurence O'Toole were treated of Imperial agents rushing in among unanimous Cardinals and carrying them off to a dungeon.

If it were worth while, we might call some other curious instances of history written to order from the lecture of Monsignor Moran, but we have space only to mention a curious and amusing anachronism. We were startled by a statement that Arnold of Brescia was sheltered by the Visconti. After a good deal of searching we found in the Cardinal of Aragon's Life of Hadrian the Fourth that he was sheltered by certain persons described as "Vice Comites de Campaniâ"; we cannot boast of any intimate acquaintance with these Viscounts, but at all events they must have been quite different people from Bernabos and Gian Galeazzo.

We trust that we have written this little piece of disputed ecclesiastical history without discharging any kind of venom against Popes, Emperors, or anybody else; but it does seem to us that our Monsignor, in rebuking those whom he charges with representing facts not as they were, but as they would wish them to have been, has himself become something very like the great Sublime he draws. We owe Monsignor Moran no grudge on account of his particular theological views. We would just as little trust Lord Shaftesbury to write the facts of the reign of Edward the Sixth as we would trust Monsignor Moran to write the facts of the reign of Alexander the Third. Theological partisans, whatever be their theology, have ever had the same tendency to bite and devour one another after the manner of ravening wolves. For our own part we feel among them, as the Council says of Octavian, alias Victor, "tantum agnus mansuetus et innocens"; but as in Mr. Froude's natural history a lamb is made capable of spitting venom, it may be that we have been all the time spitting venom at somebody or other unknown to ourselves.

SOME ECONOMICAL ASPECTS OF THE LABOURERS' STRIKE.

WHATEVER may be the fate of the particular movement which has given such sudden fame to the South Warwickshire peasantry, it is probable that Labourers' Unions may have to be accepted as a condition of the agriculture of the future. There is an increasing disposition among the landowners, even in the districts immediately affected by the recent strikes, to recognise the right of combination; and if the opposition of the farmers to any such admission should be successful for the moment, the revival of such organizations cannot be long deferred. The labourers will have found out the strength that combination gives them, and this discovery, once made, is not likely to remain barren long. It is also probable that this change will lead to the concession of a part at least of the labourers' demands. The over-population of the agricultural districts, and the consequent ability of the farmer to command all the labour he needs, has perhaps been exaggerated. Or, should it prove to be true, agricultural Unions are more likely than town Unions to turn their minds to emigration. A rough life in Canada or Australia may prove to have fewer terrors for the man accustomed to country work of all kinds than for the artisan, or even for the unskilled labourers in towns. It becomes a question of interest therefore what will be the effect of a general rise of wages on the condition of the class by whose efforts it has been brought about. Ought we to wish success to agricultural combinations in the interest of the labourers themselves? Some real well-wishers of the rural poor will say No to this inquiry. They argue that the abolition of payments in kind, which is sure to accompany a rise in wages, will be directly injurious to the labourer; that the universal substitution of contract for that modified form of tenure which now prevails will destroy good feeling between classes, and that the farmer will be compelled to employ fewer men at good wages instead of many men at low wages. The first of these objections is easily disposed of. Payments in kind are payments made in a currency which has no common or recognized value. Like the truck system in a modified form, and thus an overwhelming mass of evidence to show that the truck system, taken as a whole, is an injury to the workman. If employers valued their men as men, there would be some who, from anxiety to be steadily content, or from a wish to deal generously by their men, would make their shillings worth thirty pence. But there would be a far larger number probably who would make them worth eleven pence half penny, and some who would think even this standard excessive. The same rule applies to the quality of the land, or of the soil, or of the grist corn, or whatever other "payments" are made in kind for money. The labourer never knows what wages he has, and though he and his neighbours may have nominally the same, their real value will differ with different seasons. This state of things has already very much interfered with the sympathy between classes which the absence of contract is supposed to bring with it. A continual suspicion of the quality of goods and services is the naturally engendered ill-feeling on the part of the labourer; and, as he is given to be suspicious, this ill-feeling may easily exist where there is not cause for it as well as where there is. At all events, whether the anticipated change in the relation between agricultural labourers and their employers will or will not destroy the good feeling which is at present assumed to exist between them, the effect, whatever it is, must be produced as soon as the labourer wishes to bring such a change about. The enforced maintenance of the present relation would intensify, not avert, it. It used often to be said in the United States that the slave was on better terms with his owner than the free labourer with his master; but, whether this theory were true or false, it ceased to apply directly the slave wished to be set free. That an increased rate of wages may lead to an increased use of machinery is highly probable, and that the increased use of machinery may lead to the employment of fewer labourers at higher wages is possible. Even on the latter hypothesis, however, the condition of the labouring class must be ultimately benefited. It is better that a smaller number of Englishmen should find work at good wages at home, and that the remainder should make new homes for themselves in the colonies, than that the whole number should live in poverty at home. But the hypothesis of machinery reducing the number of labourers is not a probable one. The application of greater skill and more capital to farming may work fresh revolutions in agriculture; and high farming, when it comes to be greatly extended by the cessation of the conditions which made poor farming possible, may turn out to provide new openings for hand labour, in combination with machinery. There may of course be much distress in the interval; that is the inseparable accompaniment of great economical changes. But though we should do our best to remedy this distress in individual cases, it would be the extreme of sentimental short-sightedness to deprecate the process through which alone the passage to a better state of things can be effected.

However anxious we may be to see the condition of the agricultural labourer improved, it is impossible to dismiss all consideration of the effect which a rise in his wages, supposing it to be effected, would have upon other classes of the community. Neither the ruin of the tenant farmers, nor a large increase in the price of food—both which have been predicted as inevitable results of the strike—are pleasant contingencies to contemplate. It is clear that if every labourer is to be paid 10s. a week instead of 12s., the increase must come out of one of three pockets—the landlord's, the farmer's, or the consumer's. According to some reasoners, the landlord will not lower his rent, the farmer cannot be content with smaller profits, and consequently the consumer will have no choice but to pay more for his loaf. According to others, the landlord will not lower his rent, the consumer will not pay more for his loaf, and consequently, as the farmer cannot afford to make smaller profits, there will be nothing for him but ruin. Both these conclusions are based on wrong premises. It is true that the farmer cannot in the long run be content with smaller profits. Farming more and more requires capital, and when a man has capital he will naturally not continue in a business in which he cannot get an adequate return for it. So long as the farmer was only a somewhat higher class of labourer, he was forced to stick to the only trade of which he knew anything. It is different when, besides his skill, he has capital which he may employ in other ways. It is true again that the consumer will not pay more for his loaf, because the price of bread is determined by causes beyond the English producer's control. Russia and America can supply us with all the bread we require, and since the Corn Laws were repealed, the English farmer has never been able to sell his wheat for more than the price at which the foreign producer could supply wheat of the same quality. The latest rise of price above this level would bring more foreign wheat into the English market, and the farmer would find his crop left on his hands, or would be obliged to let it go at the original price in order to undersell his foreign rival. In some cases he might take to market gardening, but the demand for this kind of produce is necessarily limited. In others again he might abandon the cultivation of cereals and take to stock farming. But the conversion of arable land into pasture is a process of which peculiarly favourable conditions of soil and situation are required. In the majority of cases, therefore, one of two things must happen. Either the farmer will find means to increase his profits without raising the price to the consumer, or the landlord must consent to lower his rent. The former process can be effected either by diminishing the cost of production and leaving the amount produced as it is, or by leaving the cost where it is and increasing the amount produced. If the farmer is set to it, he will probably be able to do something in both of these directions. He will resort to the use of machinery to a much greater extent than he has hitherto done. The impetus thus given to the trade in agricultural implements is certain to lead both to the invention of machines to do work which is at present done by hand, and to the cheapening of the processes by which the machines already invented are manufactured. The farmer will benefit by both these changes. He will be rendered more and more independent of his man by the first, while the second will make the independence of those which he has already achieved less costly. The habit of mind produced by the use of machinery, and the increased necessity for capital in the first instance, will make the farmer more and more a capitalist in agriculture, and a considerable increase of produce may be expected from the additional skill and knowledge which will be brought to bear on the soil. No doubt a certain number of small and inefficient farmers, with little capital and little power of turning what they have to account, will suffer. But this is only what they must have done in any case. The small tenant farmer as he has been known in this country, with neither the capital of the large farmer nor the energy and thrift of the peasant proprietor, is every day finding the conditions of modern industry less suited to him.

Let us suppose, however, that the farmer does not find means to increase his profits. The position in which he will then find himself will be, that after paying the cost of production, including a fair interest on his capital and fair remuneration of his own labour, there will be a smaller surplus available for the payment of his rent. This being so, rents must inevitably fall. The farmer will not engage in a business which will not return him interest on the money he has laid out, as well as a reward for the labour he has given in addition. Therefore, unless the landlord is content with what is left after these two conditions have been satisfied, he will find no one to take his land. It is conceivable, of course, that the landlords as a body might be just able to live on their present rents, and that, if these had to be reduced, they would be unable to let their lands, and would have to turn farmers themselves. But as English society is at present constituted there is no probability of any such result. English landowners are for the most part rich enough to stand a considerable fall of rents without serious inconvenience; and the demand for land is so great that those who are less well off will never find any difficulty in finding purchasers for their land, even under the less favourable conditions imposed by the new order of things. The peers, of whom Mr. Disraeli boasted the other day that they had an average income of 20,000*l.* each, would not be impoverished by a reduction of even 25 per cent. on their rentals. They would have 15,000*l.* a year left after their tenants had made all necessary deductions to meet the increased wages they had to pay. The great merchants and manufacturers who are buying land in all directions and creating a class of territorial magnates not less wealthy or influential than the older nobility, would find it equally easy to conform themselves to the requirements of their tenants. And beneath both classes are a large number of landowners to whom the necessity of taking lower rents might be annoying, but would not in any way be disastrous. Smaller men still might suffer, but they would suffer as men must who find society changing more rapidly than they are able to change with it, and as they would probably suffer in the long run even if rents were maintained at their present level.

LEGAL INFANTS.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY has brought in a Bill for the protection of infants, which does not, however, compete with Mr. Charles's attempted legislation with regard to baby-farming. The infants whom Mr. Henry has in view are not the wretched bantlings who are left on doorsteps wrapped up in copies of the Daily Telegraph, or sent in hampers by railways any side uppermost and not to be called for, or handed over to the tender mercies of nursing mothers who are willing to relieve parents of all responsibility for unwelcome offspring for a moderate consideration, and "no questions asked." The objects of Mr. Henry's solicitude are the interesting class of persons under twenty-one years of age who are regarded by the law as infants, and who, being, as Mr. Bright once said of the House of Lords, not very wise, are apt to suffer severely at the hands of bill-discounters, money-lenders, and other predatory professions. The Bill sets forth that, "Whereas money-lenders and others are accustomed to solicit and request infants to borrow money, whereby such infants are often defrauded and injured in their property," it is expedient to protect infants from these dangers. There are certainly precedents in English law for protecting exceptionally weak and helpless persons from injuries against which other people are left to protect themselves as best they can; and it must be admitted that the excruciating imbecility of a large and apparently increasing number of boys about town entitles them to the most compassionate consideration. There are Truck Acts, Factory Acts, and other protective measures of the same kind; but Mr. Henry appears to have taken the idea of his Bill more especially from the enactment in the criminal law which defends the virtue of little girls. It is proposed that it shall be made a misdemeanour to solicit an infant to borrow money, either personally or by an agent, or by means of a letter, circular, or other notice; and that the offender shall be liable, on conviction before a couple of justices of the peace, to a fine of not more than 20*l.*, or imprisonment for not more than a month, with a further liability to forfeit 10*l.* to any informer who sues for the same, with the costs of the suit. It is also to be a misdemeanour to aid in soliciting an infant to accept a loan. The bond or other security given for such a loan will be deemed absolutely void for all purposes; and the money which may have been paid by an infant in order to obtain a loan may be recovered by him from the lender, with the full costs of the suit, in any Court of competent jurisdiction. Moreover, any infant who, after this law is passed, accepts a loan which has been offered to him, and who is foolish enough to pay back any part of it, may recover whatever he has repaid; and any promise to repay such a loan after the infant has come of full age will be considered invalid. This is all well. The infant is to have power to swindle the money-lender to any extent with perfect impunity. No person, it is provided, shall be held civilly or criminally liable for any fraudulent representation or false statement made, or for any fraud committed by him during infancy, in order to induce a person to enter into a contract with him, and no contract shall be binding on him by reason of any fraudulent representation on his part.

The hare pursuing the sportsman is a familiar subject of caricature, and might be taken as the emblem of Mr. Henry's ingenious and highly original proposal. The pigeon is now to be equipped for a triumphant encounter with the rook, who will be placed absolutely at the mercy of his former victim, and may be plundered with impunity. It is obvious that if this Bill were to pass into law, and if the money-lending business did not instantly collapse, the infants would have a fine time of it. An infant might persuade a money-lender that he was over age, and when he had borrowed a sufficient sum he could turn round and snap his fingers at his credulous creditor, and then proceed to lay an information against him, and compel him to pay another 10*l.* for being handed over to justice. In order to encourage the money-lender the infant would of course take care to pay back instalments of the various loans, and these repayments could be afterwards recovered when the trick was disclosed. We have not heard whether this measure has as yet produced much excitement in money-lending circles. It is possible that the members of that profession may flatter themselves that they are more than a match for the infants, even when the latter are armed with such a formidable weapon as Mr. Henry's Bill. The practice of sending out circulars urging young men to borrow money is not only becoming an intolerable nuisance, but is productive of very mischievous results. It is annoying to people who have no desire to contract loans to be pestered with impertinent offers of advances; and human nature, in the hopeful mood in which it is usually to be observed in very young men, finds it difficult to resist pressing applications to make a free use of a generous money-lender's purse, especially when these solicitations coincide with a fresh appetite for enjoyments, a noble contempt for frugal expenditure, and general ignorance of the world. There is the temptation of the pleasures of life on the one hand, and the temptation of the free-handed usurer, with his extended collar, on the other; and it is not perhaps surprising that this double pressure should be more than thoughtless youth is capable of resisting. The nuisance of money-lenders' circulars is one which might perhaps be checked by a simple enactment, although there would be some difficulty in proving who sent them out. An innocent person might be made to suffer for circulars maliciously issued in his name if the address on the letters was in itself to be taken as evidence that they came from him. We certainly cannot affect to feel any compassion for the money-lenders as a body, and we should be very glad if the infants upon whom they have so mercilessly preyed could now have their revenge. But Mr. Henry himself can hardly be serious in some of his proposals. Even if it were to be enacted that money-lenders who solicited young men under age to take loans should be punished, and should have no power to recover money thus advanced, it is obvious that the clause which we have quoted above, authorising infants to make false representations with impunity in order to induce any one to enter into a contract with them—a clause which, it must be observed, is in no way limited, and applies apparently to contracts of every kind—is a provision of a somewhat sweeping and dangerous character, and that the temptation which it might offer to thoughtless or unscrupulous young men would be more seriously demoralizing than the seductions of the bill-discounter's circular. It is also possible that legislation of this kind might have the effect of making infants more rash and reckless than ever; they might imagine that they were now protected on every side; and it is not unreasonable to suppose that when there is so keen a desire to borrow on the one side, and so much eagerness to do business on the other, some means will always be found of bringing supply and demand together, in accordance with the recognized rules of political economy.

It will perhaps occur to some that, while the Bill goes further than is likely to be of much practical use in one direction, it does not go far enough in another. As far as we can judge by the reports of cases which occasionally come before the law Courts and by what we hear in private, the depredations of the money-lenders are by no means the only dangers which infants, or rather infants' fathers, have to dread. We are under the impression that fashionable jewellers and tailors and horse-dealers are quite as fatal to young gentlemen with expectations as the regular bill-discounters. It is true no doubt that bills, under one disguise or another, are usually at the bottom of the infant's ruin; but the questions which the Courts have to decide are usually whether diamond earrings or emerald-mounted betting-books, or a pair of mt ponies, with Victoria to match, "fit for a lady," are "necessaries" for a young gentleman of eighteen or nineteen; and as the juries are apt to be composed of tradesmen, or people who sympathize with tradesmen, the verdict is almost invariably for the plaintiff. If infants are to be protected against money-lenders, it might be plausibly argued that they have at least as much need to be protected against the solicitations and frauds of unscrupulous shopkeepers. Assuming that the characteristic imbecility of infants is a sufficient ground for special legislation on their behalf as against bill-discounters, there are other dangers to which young gentlemen, as well as gentlemen who are not young, but who on coming of age have not ceased to be fools, appear to be exposed which also require attention. There are billiard-sharpers, card-sharpers, and, in a lower grade, skittle-sharpers; there are betting-men, blacklegs, and welchers; there are the rogues who waylay simple-looking people with dropped rings or smuggled cigars; there is the benevolent horse-dealer who has a rare horse in a dark stable, and the amiable countryman who proposes a visit to a tavern in order that he may prove his confidence in you, whom he has never before seen, by entrusting you with his watch or purse, and who would be hurt if you did not display equal confidence in his honour by allowing him in turn to take your watch or purse outside the door. In fact when we come to think of it, it is hard to say where we can stop if we are going to legislate for the protection of all the infants and idiots in the world. Indeed, we are not quite sure whether there is not room for a Bill for the protection of youths under twenty-one years of age from the solicitations of mothers with daughters to marry. Society might perhaps be disposed to do more for the infant, if the infant would only keep himself more out of society. Every year the number of children who go out to dinners and dancing-parties, and who pervade the Clubs, seems to be increasing; but if a bargain could be struck that the infant should have legislative protection against his own idiocy, on condition that he should cease to infest congregations of grown-up people, a good deal might be said in favour of it.

THE THEATRES.

AN attempt has been made to utilize for theatrical purposes the stores of observation of contemporary English life which are accumulated in the novels of Mr. Trollope. This successful writer for the closet seems to have modestly distrusted his power of pleasing on the stage, and accordingly he has obtained the assistance of Mr. Charles Reade in dramatizing the popular story of Ralph the Heir. The result of the joint labour of these two experienced authors, compared with the material on which they went to work, is like—if we may borrow a metaphor from Mr. Nesfit's business—the alteration of a lady's riding-habit into a gentleman's dress-coat. A great quantity of cloth has been cut away, and the remainder has been entirely rearranged. The characters of Mr. Nesfit and his daughter are retained, but little more than the names of any other personages in the story is produced in the drama, which is constructed with curious simplicity. It is desirable, or perhaps necessary, to bring all the characters upon the stage at nearly the same time, and this has been accomplished by extending Mr. Nesfit's business so as to comprise the making of riding-habits for ladies as well as of hunting-breeches for gentlemen. Having got as far as this, it is easy to suppose that Miss Clariissa Underwood comes unattended by any chaperon to the shop to be measured in a private room by Mr. Moggs, who has been converted into Mr. Nesfit's foreman; and there is an obvious opportunity for the foreman and book-keeper to "chaff" that young lady as to the department of the business to which she desires to give her order. It is remarkable that Mr. Trollope, who as a novelist is so invariably proper, and so perfectly adapted for family reading, should have assisted in imparting to the Gaiety Theatre of to-day a slight flavour of the Adelphi of thirty years ago. It is perhaps rather hard upon English managers that their French rivals should have a monopoly of double-entendre; and as Mr. Boucicault has enlarged the domain of incident, Mr. Trollope appears desirous to render a similar service to dramatists as regards allusion. It is, however, possible that the character of Mr. Nesfit ought to be regarded as the joint production of Mr. Trollope and Mr. Charles Reade, and of Mr. Toole, who acts it; and if this be so, we need not be surprised at anything being said that can raise a laugh, however incongruous it may be with Mr. Trollope's usual style. Speaking for ourselves, we should prefer rather more of Mr. Nesfit and rather less of Mr. Toole, but it is manifest that the majority of the audience are well content with what they get. It is a pity that the authors could not have bestowed a little more pains upon the structure of their play. Nothing can be more rude than the contrivance of bringing Mr. Nesfit and party into one box and Sir Thomas Underwood and party into another box adjoining to it, in the garden of an hotel at Twickenham. We should not object to this clumsy expedient if anything amusing came of it, but this scene is the dullest part of the entertainment. There is, however, a pretty view of Twickenham, and dinner is eaten and champagne is drunk in the most lifelike manner by the parties in adjoining boxes. During the banquet news is brought of the death of the elder Newton, and a solicitor appears and formally requires Ralph the Heir to perform his agreement to sell his reversion to his illegitimate cousin Robert, whereupon Sir Thomas Underwood (formerly, as the playbill informs us, Attorney-General) favours the company in the two boxes with an exposition of the law of specific performance in equity of agreements. Nothing turns upon the ex-attorney-generalship of Sir Thomas Underwood, who is merely an elderly and rather feeble papa. Robert Newton expresses his anguish at learning that Clariissa Underwood is to become "another's" in the familiar manner. This pair of lovers are mere nonentities, and as regards Ontario Moggs, he acts best, if we may so say, when he is out of sight, since he enables Nesfit to warn Ralph that his rival has been "sneaking round," and is in earnest pursuit of Polly, if he (Ralph) is not. The greater part, and perhaps the best part, of Mr. Trollope's descriptions of the sayings and doings of young gentlemen and ladies is too fine and beautiful for dramatic use. Attempts to get what he has written must inevitably become ineffectual.

or grotesque, but in this story the two characters of Neddy and Polly easily adapt themselves to the stage. Nothing can be better in its way than the scene where Neddy proposes to Ralph to make love to Polly, unless it be Polly's own reception of Ralph's advances:—"Oh, as for talking," says she, "you can talk. You've been brought up that way. You've had nothing else much to do."

The manager of the Princess's Theatre has turned to account the prevailing interest in Australia which has been excited by the Tichborne case. We believe that at this moment a view of Wagga Wagga would make the fortune of any piece into which it might be introduced. But Mr. Byron in the drama which he calls Haunted Houses has only sought variety of sensational incidents by sending some of his characters across the ocean and through the bush. It is, we suppose, a tribute to the eminence of Mr. J. Clarke in his particular department that he twice narrowly escapes death in the course of the play, and saves the heroine from imminent peril at the close of it. The success of Mr. Byron's change of what lawyers call the "venue" to Australia may perhaps suggest to other authors the propriety of conducting to fresh fields and pastures new a public which has become jaded with such sensational incidents as may be got out of home life. Now that Mr. Charles Reade has had some experience as an adapter of novels to the stage, he should try his hand on that wonderful story which he based upon a trial held a few years ago at the Old Bailey. We are quite sure that his door will be beset by competing managers when our present suggestion becomes known to them. Crowded houses for twelve months would be the least result of an adequate improvement of this magnificent opportunity. Mr. Byron merely causes a ship to sink on a fine summer's evening in order that his drama may keep afloat, but Mr. Reade would bring before his audience the Plot! the Execution!! and the Discovery!!! Imagination becomes inflamed at the contemplation of this tremendous and unparalleled effect. Semper ego auditor tantum! The critic may ask himself why should not he abandon the cold and cheerless place of observation and taste the exciting joys of authorship. Combine the stores of romance which have been accumulating for ages with the mechanical resources possessed by the present generation, and you produce with ease and certainty of success a series of dramas of intense and absorbing interest. A company of ordinary actors, and a liberal expenditure upon scenery and properties, will ensure a career of uninterrupted prosperity. There would of course be some preliminary love-making in Australia, and then the young lady would take ship for England, while her lover, a convict who has been found guilty on a false charge, manages to disguise himself and obtain a passage in the same vessel. We should next see the mate of the ship, like an aquatic Guy Fawkes, at work by the light of a single candle among the cargo in the hold, boring the ship's bottom with an auger, and inserting plugs so as to be able to admit a regulated supply of water slightly in excess of the pumping power of the crew. This process would be secretly watched by the convict, who would peep from behind a bale of goods, and indicate by emphatic gestures his purpose of defeating villany and rescuing youth and beauty from a watery grave. There is enough in Mr. Reade's novel to supply almost all the literary work that would be needed. The discovery of the ship's peril, the panic of the crew, and their rush to the boats would all be transacted amid hurried music, which would render anything that anybody might say unintelligible—an arrangement which both author and critics might find convenient. A new and, as we venture to think, beautiful and admirable effect might be produced by making the ship rise and fall with the motion of the waves, so as to exhibit the holes by which the water had been admitted which is sinking her. A little fragment of wood protruding from a hole, so as to suggest that the mate had been lately busy with his auger, might be worth hundreds of pounds to the treasury of the theatre. These are the slight but effective touches by which the artist of genius is distinguished from the merely tradesmanlike manufacturer of sensation. The young lady would probably be in her cabin when the alarm was given, and might be engaged, let us say, in the contemplation of her father's miniature. Her convict lover would urgently but respectfully entreat admission, and after short parley would take her round the waist, and, supporting his lovely burden with one arm, would use the other to help his ascent on deck, where the extent of her danger and his devotion would be revealed. The boats perhaps would have pushed off, and he would make frantic gestures of entreaty to the crew to return and rescue the lady. Between the motion of the ship and the complication of the lady's skirts the task of saving her life without sacrificing propriety would be difficult; but she would be dragged into the boat, which would push off instantly to escape the eddy of the sinking ship, while her lover would have to trust to his strong limbs and his stout heart to save his life by swimming. As he reached the boat exhausted and was lifted into it the curtain would descend amid prolonged and renewed applause, and the manager would feel that he had his playbill in type for a year to come. The adventures of the lovers on the island to which Mr. Reade conducts them would supply opportunities which the scene-painter would not neglect, and we may venture to hope that the ballet-master of the theatre would remember that the bodily activity of the young lady, on which the author much insists, would be most effectually and agreeably developed by his assistance.

Taking this expansive and radiant view of the possibilities of the sensational drama, we regard with impatience its actualities as exhibited in the Miss's Daughter at the Adelphi. We have no emotion to expend upon such time-worn incidents as the escape of a Jacobite conspirator over house-tops, pursued by soldiers of a Hanoverian King. There is an old saying that, if you want to ruin a thing, you should put a sentry over it; and we might with equal truth remark that, if you want to ensure a criminal's escape, you should send a company of foot-guards in full uniform and fixed bayonets to arrest him. Have we not seen in those Irish dramas which so strangely fascinate the English mind a whole regiment swept away by an old woman with a besom? We care little for the "Folly" on the Thames, and less for the cloisters of Westminster Abbey, even though a remarkably clumsy scoundrel commits a murder there. Let us burst all links of habit, let us wander far away, and carry our scene-painter and costumer to the summer isles of the Pacific. The latter artist, we may remark, will need to take only a limited stock-in-trade with him. The slave trade, under another name, exists in Polynesia, and vessels of the British navy are in the habit of giving what are called "lessons" to islanders who confound missionaries with kidnappers. The shelling of a village by a man of war is a subject which might deserve to be taken in hand by the same liberal manager who ordered two halfpenny squibs for his eruption of Vesuvius. A Jew who had dealt in old clothes at Wapping might easily be led by his commercial instinct as far as Fiji, where he might become Chancellor of the Exchequer to his Majesty the King of the Cannibal Islands, or might head the constitutional Opposition which objects to pork, and desires to maintain the ancient and laudable custom of banqueting on human flesh. When every land and sea is open to our sensational dramatists, we are entitled to complain if they confine themselves within the four miles radius of Charing Cross.

REVIEWS.

GUIZOT'S HISTORY OF FRANCE.*

A FRESH instalment of M. Guizot's History of France, which we in England are tempted to speak of by the familiar and honoured name of Tales of a Grandfather, has now appeared, and the first volume of the work is thus complete, bringing us down to the accession of Philip of Valois, and leaving us on the brink of the French and English wars. The new portion quite comes up to the expectations excited by the few sheets which have already been noticed in these columns. The style is as clear and easy as before, and the subject-matter is of increased interest. Perhaps it is because they awaken reminiscences of Cæsar De Bello Gallico that, except for the pathetic tale of Vercingetorix, we always find the Gauls rather dull, while the Franks, barbarians who had lost, if they ever possessed, barbaric virtues without replacing them by those of civilization, are little better than unreadable until light breaks in with the Great Charles. And even then, "this German warrior," as M. Guizot very honestly calls him, does not in reality belong to France, which was as yet without form and void, seething in the general chaos of Roman, Celt, and Teuton. It is with the house of Robert the Strong and the gallant resistance of Paris to the Normans that we first begin to see France waking to life.

As has been already remarked, M. Guizot's History is, according to our ideas, hardly one for children, unless French children are much cleverer than English ones. The reader requires some previous knowledge of the course of events to fit him for appreciating it, the more so as the arrangement is not strictly chronological, but rather according to subjects, the Crusades being pursued from their "origin" through their "success" and their "decline" to their end, as one complete history, after which we are sent back again to Louis VI., from thence to trace the progress of "la Royauté française." The long political disquisitions, which to a grown-up reader form the most interesting part, are, if not beyond the comprehension, yet certainly beyond the patience of children. It is true that M. Guizot assures us that he found his grandchildren understood him even when he was led to general considerations and deep studies of characters:—

J'en ai fait l'épreuve dans le tableau du règne et le portrait du caractère de Charlemagne: les deux grands desseins de ce grand homme, qui a réussi dans l'un et échoué dans l'autre, ont été de la part de mes jeunes auditeurs, l'objet d'une attention très-soutenue et d'une compréhension très-nette. Les jeunes esprits ont plus de portée qu'on n'est enclin à le présumer, et peut-être les hommes feraient-ils bien quelquefois d'être aussi sérieux dans leur vie que les enfants le sont dans leurs études.

Teaching by word of mouth is, however, a very different matter from teaching out of a book. Given a competent narrator, and it is wonderful what children will listen to, and even, as the author remarks, follow with keen interest. We have no doubt that M. Guizot's audience did, as he describes, hang on his lips, and thoroughly take in his meaning; but the results may not be the same when ordinary children are set down to read the book without the advantage of having the historian in person to give it life. More dash and vigour, more description, more story, as children say, are required to make a book popular with young people; and M. Guizot is rather a philosophical than a descriptive historian.

* L'Histoire de France, depuis les Temps les plus reculés jusqu'en 1789. Racontée à nos Petits-Enfants. Par M. Guizot. Tome premier. Illustré de 75 gravures dessinées sur bois par Alph. de Neuville. Paris: Librairie Hachette et Cie. 1872.

Considering the work without reference to any special class of readers for which it may have been intended, its interest will be found to lie, not so much in the actual facts narrated, which are sufficiently familiar, as in the passages which deal with cause and effect, and in the general sketches of political development. The book is in truth rather a succession of essays connected by a slight chain of history, and it is for these that it will be read. The French language has the advantage of being admirably adapted for composition of this description. We are vain enough to believe that our own tongue surpasses it in a kind of Biblical majesty and in dramatic vigour, but in the power of putting things neatly and crisply, and of making them clear to the mind, there can be no question as to the special fitness of French. The subject of chivalry is one which is particularly well treated, the pitfalls on either hand being skilfully avoided. On the one side there is, or perhaps rather was, the school whose "heroes were stripplings in armour," and "heroines damsels in white," which took chivalry at its own valuation and believed in all knightly virtues. On the other there is the school which, seeing only the crimes of the middle ages, regards chivalry either as utter humbug or, with Arnold, as the spirit of Anti-Christ himself. M. Guizot takes what we think a very fair course between these two extremes. The moyen âge, he truly says, was a brutal and coarse period, lawless, licentious, and violent, but at the same time some shadowy idea of better things was afloat. Look back to the Homeric heroes, they are apparently satisfied with themselves, and the not very elevated standard of virtue to which they have attained; "rien dans leur âme ne surpasse les faits de leur vie"; while in mediæval France, full as it was of disorder and crime, men yet cherished lofty ideas of virtue and justice; "un certain idéal moral plane au-dessus de cette société grossière, orangeuse, et attire les regards, obtient les respects des hommes dont la vie n'en reproduit guère l'image." Theory and practice, in short, were, as they usually are, very far apart; but it was a great thing that there should be such a theory. The type of the perfect Christian knight was, in the opinion of contemporaries, realized in the person of Tancred, the gallant Crusader whom Tasso made famous as the lover of Clorinda and the beloved of Erminia. Fantastic and sentimental as is the hero in the Italian poem, he nevertheless preserves the lofty and unworldly character of his original. Surpassing the young in his skill in arms, the old in the gravity and sobriety of his manners, coming to speak ill of any one even in retaliation, and knowing no passion but that of glory, the accomplished warrior was nevertheless much exercised in mind by a religious difficulty such as we are apt to think characteristic only of modern times. The Gospel, so he reflected, "nous invite à donner notre tunique et notre manteau à celui qui vient nous en dépoûiller; l'obligation du chevalier est d'enlever tout ce qui reste à celui à qui il a déjà pris sa tunique et son manteau." These contradictory principles chilled Tancred's warlike ardour, until he at last found a way of satisfying both the religious and military sides of his nature by going on the Crusade—a resource no longer open to the perplexed, although the difficulty of reconciling the evangelical precept with the exigencies of actual life has not much diminished.

Another passage deserving of attention is the account of the feudal system, and the reasons for the bitter hatred with which it is regarded in France. In England we have no such vivid remembrance of it, simply because feudalism was always kept down in this country. William the Conqueror and Henry of Anjou held it well in hand, and it is because we saw so little of it that the word has no evil sound in our ears. In France, where they knew better what it was, it has ever been odious to the public mind, and this antipathy does not date merely from the great Revolution. Go back as far as you will, the feudal system has ever been considered by the mass of the population as a deadly enemy, and every one who has struck at it has been popular. The cause of this hatred is not wholly to be sought in the sufferings of the people under the feudal régime—"le malheur n'est pas ce qui détestent et redoutent le plus les peuples." So, at least, says M. Guizot, though we are inclined to think that miseries such as those portrayed with such terrible power in Erckmann-Chatrian's Histoire d'un Paysan are sufficient to explain and to justify the general detestation. The peculiarly odious nature of feudalism as it affected the mass of the people is, however, forcibly brought out. It was not the despotism of a single man, which, though inevitably demoralizing in the long run, may be endurable, nay, even welcome, at the moment, if it gives order and peace; it was not the despotism of an aristocratic body, which can hardly be as capricious and arbitrary as a single ruler; but it united the most obnoxious elements of both. It was a collection of individual despotisms wielded by isolated microcrats, who had, indeed, duties and rights towards each other, but who possessed each man an arbitrary and absolute power over his subjects. The despot was not the Lord's Anointed, with a religious claim to respect; neither was he one of Mr. Carlyle's "Kings of Men," ruling by right of being the only person competent to rule. He was merely one of a class, able to protect himself, but not to ensure his dependents against the attacks of his neighbour tyrants. A ruler who lets nobody but himself oppress his people may be endured, but the feudal baron had not even that recommendation:—

Le despotisme était là comme dans les monarchies pures, le privilège donné dans les aristocraties les plus concentrées; et l'un et l'autre s'y produisaient sous la forme la plus offensante et la plus crue, si je puis ainsi parler: le despotisme ne s'éloignait point par l'éloignement et l'élévation d'un trône; le privilège ne se voyait point dans la majesté d'un grand corps: l'un et l'autre appartenait à un homme toujours présent et toujours seul, toujours voisin de ses sujets, et jamais appelé, en traitant de leur sort, à s'en-tourer de ses égaux.

We must notice, by the way, the spirit with which this idea has been caught by the artist in a vignette representing the Seigneur issuing from his castle with his retainers behind him. The hard, indifferent bearing of the armed and mounted noble, the looks of fear without respect cast on him by the wretched peasants who turn out of his road, are admirably expressed.

On the other hand, M. Guizot, with laudable impartiality, points out that when we turn from the subjects to the masters, we see that feudalism had its merits, that in many respects it was a good training, and at any rate paved the way for something better. It will perhaps occasion some surprise to find that he devotes the greater part of a chapter to the Norman Conquest of England; a great and glorious achievement, the work, so he says, like the Crusades, of feudal chivalry and Christianity combined. The effect it had upon the future history of France is, however, sufficient justification for the space which it occupies, and the tale is told with spirit, William's character being hit off in a few words—"dur sans haine et clément sans bonté." The consequences which the Norman Conquest had for France and for England are also exceedingly well brought out, though the passage was evidently written before recent events. M. Guizot speaks, as one who has had experience, of that rivalry of France and England which sprung from the long wars between them, and of the ever-increasing necessity of establishing "a policy of mutual equity and peace in place of a policy of hostile regulations and continuous opposition":—

J'ai assisté, dans le cours de ma vie, mes enfants [he adds], à ces deux politiques: j'ai vu la politique d'hostilité systématique entre la France et l'Angleterre pratiquée par l'empereur Napoléon 1<sup>er</sup>, avec autant d'habileté et d'éclat qu'elle en pouvait avoir, et je l'ai vue aboutir au plus grand désastre qu'ait jamais essayé la France.

The rivalry with England seems now to be an old story, forgotten in the newer rivalry with another and a harsher foe; and the disaster in which the first Napoleon's policy culminated has been overshadowed by that which his nephew has brought upon the land he ruled.

As might be expected from the historian of the English Civil Wars, M. Guizot traces with interest the effect which the Norman Conquest had upon the constitution of our own country, and shows how in the end, by the triumph of their language and of their ancient freedom, "the English conquered their conquerors." The great advantage of England over France lay, as he admits, in the fact that it always preserved the tradition of freedom. Patriots in England never thought that they were winning their liberties; they were only preserving and securing them. On the other hand, the Romanized Gauls had nothing to lose—"point de pouvoir fort, point de liberté vivace; les classes inférieures en servitude, les classes moyennes ruinées, les classes supérieures avilies"; and their conquerors, Goth, Frank, and Burgundian, were disorganized barbarians, who could bring them nothing but anarchy. France, says M. Guizot, or a party in France, as we should rather say, has ever been seeking for free government under the form of constitutional monarchy, and has failed to attain it, because it had no ancient foundations to build upon. To obtain even that "modest amount of internal order without which society could not subsist," France has been constantly forced to have recourse to Royal authority and an almost absolute monarchy. M. Guizot however concludes, after the manner of his countrymen, hopefully. Before the Revolution the difference between the political fates of France and of England might have been a melancholy subject of contemplation for a Frenchman; but now it is another matter:—"Les progrès de l'égalité sociale et les lumières de la civilisation ont précédé en France la liberté politique; elle en sera plus générale et plus pure." These words were written in 1823; but M. Guizot in 1870 declares himself to feel the same confidence in the future of his country, and, as a patriot is in duty bound to hope all things and believe all things, we have no doubt that he feels it still. Foreign observers, however, are well nigh weary of waiting for this brilliant future, which seems as much as ever an object for the exercise of faith.

We shall look forward with interest to the veteran statesman and historian's account of the French and English wars. That spirit-stirring drama in which the Black Prince and Bertrand du Guesclin, Henry V., and the Maid of Orleans play their parts is a tale of which neither nation need be ashamed. If we are proud of the dazzling though short-lived successes which our knights and yeomen, fighting side by side without fear or jealousy, obtained over arrogant and indisciplined feudal nobles, the French have equal cause to be proud of that spirit of nationality which Joan of Arc, "inspired of God," as M. Guizot boldly describes her, called forth with the sacrifice of her own life, and which enabled them to shake off the foreign yoke.

We have already, in passing, mentioned one of the designs by M. A. de Neuville with which the book is profusely illustrated. They rouse a certain feeling of envy in us. Why can French artists draw men who stand on their legs and know what to do with their arms, or rather why is it that our artists are so apt to fail in these requisites? Why are French woodcuts clear and vigorous when English vary between being smooth and weak, or scratchy and confused? We do not mean to say that none of these illustrations are open to criticism. Some of them are exaggerated, and too suggestive of scenes in an opera; and a few err, as French pictures often do, on the side of horror. We protest especially against that of the execution of Esquarrand de Marigny upon the gibbet of Mont-faucon. A mediæval Fairchild family might have derived edification from contemplating five hanged men in various stages of decomposition with carrion crows hovering about; but the mere picture is enough to afflict a child of these more sensitive modern days with bad dreams. So, again, it is unpleasant enough to know that Richard Cœur de Lion had on one day some thousands of Mussulman prisoners beheaded, without being presented with a lively portrayal of the event. As a rule, the vignettes surpass the more ambitious full-page engravings, but of these latter two may be noticed as particularly good; the one representing the moment of the famous question, "Who made you a count?" and the tu quoque retort, "Who made you a king?" the other illustrating the story of St. Louis looking at the bread distributed by his orders in alms, and observing, as if with a feeling of self-reproach, "C'est d'assez dur pain."

BAIN'S FIRST ENGLISH GRAMMAR.

DR. BAIN is Professor of Logic in the University of Aberdeen, and his name is well known as the author of works on the more abstruse branches of mental science. But we did not know him as one who had come down from those heights to the humbler processes of grammar. It seems however that, though this book is designed as a "First English Grammar," it is not the first English Grammar that Dr. Bain has written. We do not know to what heights his "Higher English Grammar" might lead us, but we should judge from this "First Grammar," this "Elementary Grammar," which is to prepare the way for the larger and complete works, that they must soar very high indeed into the cloud-land of metaphysics. Dr. Bain seems to have forgotten that those who begin the study of grammar have but seldom the years or the tastes of a Professor of Logic, and that much will be dark, dull, and dry to them which is clear and captivating to the author of treatises on the Emotions and the Will. Dr. Bain omits entirely one division of grammar, and he chooses for his omission exactly that "division" which is most useful and most attractive to those for whom he is writing. The division which he omits entirely is no other than that of "Derivation." Now whence language comes and whither it goes is a subject which it is easy to clothe with all the interest of a tale or a sport. If "Derivation" is taught with any kind of truth and life, beginners in grammar delight in it. But Dr. Bain tells us presently with professorial dignity that "Grammar is a science or nothing. It has the outward form of a science, and its difficulties spring out of its scientific character." Now we have not the least notion whether grammar, as we are used to look on it, would or would not be looked on as "a science" in the eyes of Dr. Bain; so we are quite ready to take the other chance of its being looked on as "nothing." But we must let Dr. Bain explain himself:—

The chief peculiarity in the plan of the present work lies in anticipating the unavoidable difficulties of the subject by a previous handling of certain elementary notions (belonging to all science), without which no one can hope to understand the scope or method of Grammar. This preparatory portion explains, by the help of familiar instances, first, the meanings of Individual, General, Abstract, Class, Genus, Species, Co-ordinate, Subordinate, and Definition; secondly, the constituents of a Proposition, and the kinds of Propositions; and lastly, the Sentence, from which are evolved the Parts of Speech.

Here is one crumb of comfort for us. If Dr. Bain succeeds in beating the scientific meaning of the word "individual" into his pupils' heads, there will be less fear of their using it as a vulgar synonym for "man." But one error runs through this sentence, as through the whole of Dr. Bain's book. Grammar is undoubtedly a science, and it cannot be successfully dealt with except according to a scientific method. That is to say, the teacher or writer must follow a scientific method in his own classifications and arrangements. But it does not follow that he must needs expound every detail of his method to beginners at the very threshold; still less that he need burden them with a mass of uncouth abstract terms, which may no doubt convey an idea to a practised metaphysician, but which a beginner in grammar, if he keeps them in his head at all, will keep only by an arbitrary act of the memory. Fancy the unhappy beginner in grammar who, when he comes to the harmless preposition of, is set to study its "partitive," its "attributive," and its "reference" meaning. Surely one who is so skilful as Dr. Bain in devising hard words might have hit on something with an adjective ending to express this last, whatever it is, instead of using the substantive "reference" in this awkward way. But Dr. Bain is not satisfied with making his victims learn the names "partitive," "attributive," and "reference"; they are further to try to understand them, and we feel sure that in the attempt so to do anybody short of a Professor of Logic at Aberdeen would get a sad headache for his pains. It seems that when we speak of "the Mayor of London"—and we presume of the Provost of Aberdeen also—we are using "of" in its "partitive meaning." "In such phrases as—The Mayor of London, London is viewed as a whole—houses, streets, people, institutions—and the Mayor is part of that whole." Who was it who tried, but tried in vain, to reach to a perfectly abstract and philosophical conception of a Lord Mayor? Dr. Bain also has evidently tried, but we cannot say that he has not succeeded. For as the "partitive meaning" of a Lord Mayor is too deep, but surely the civic potentate is set below his proper place when he is put on a level with "the trunk of the elephant" and "the leg of the table," both of which, it seems, are cases of the partitive meaning of being "used to relate [sic] the part of anything to the whole." In the "Attributive meaning," of is used to connect an abstract property or quality with the concrete—the breadth of the road; the clearness of the sky; the meekness of the dove." Here Dr. Bain tells his beginners that "breadth," "clearness," "meekness," are not actual parts of the road, the sky, the dove; but abstract qualities, named by abstract nouns." Meekness is not an actual part of the dove, but the Lord Mayor is an actual part of the City. All that comes home to us is that we suppose that we have been using the preposition of in a "partitive" and an "attributive," and, for aught we know, in a "reference" meaning also, for a great many years without knowing it. But we are more concerned with what goes a little before:—

The prepositions—of, to, for, from, by, with—express meanings that were given in the classical languages by case-endings.

Now this is really provoking. A golden opportunity is thrown away of setting forth the whole history of the matter. Why the "classical languages" only? If Dr. Bain's beginners are advanced enough to be told about the classical languages—we should say, if they are advanced enough to puzzle their brains with "partitive" and "attributive"—they are surely advanced enough to learn something about the history of their own language. It is with beginners that impressions are most lasting, and therefore the greater pains should be taken to convey to them no impressions but such as are perfectly accurate. Now Dr. Bain's readers or hearers would be very likely to go away with the belief that case-endings are a thing which the classical languages keep wholly to themselves, and with which English and its fellows have nothing to do. It is plain that Dr. Bain has, after all, some notion of the history of the preposition of which he is talking, for he says very truly, "The original import of this root was 'proceeding from,' which easily led to the meaning now most generally signified—namely, 'belonging to.'" Of course, whenever we suggest the historical study of language from the very beginning, we are met for the ten thousandth time with the objection that what we propose would be too hard for a beginner—that is, we suppose, for a child. This objection always comes from those who do not know that what seems hard to a teacher who has himself been badly taught is quite easy to a child who has not been taught at all. And as for hardness, no one need talk about that under the cold shade of Dr. Bain's metaphysics. If we took a child of reasonable sharpness, and showed him the case-endings in Ullilas—the datives plural, for instance, with their long tails—and then showed him the endings in the same cases in Old-English, in modern High German, and the small vestiges of them in modern English, we believe that he would find it a great deal easier, and a great deal more interesting, than to be talked to by Dr. Bain about "partitive," "attributive," and "reference" meanings.

The odd thing is that, though Dr. Bain throws aside such opportunities as this for putting his subject in the most attractive and instructive point of view, it is plain that he is not ignorant that there is such a point of view, and that he does not look on it as wholly foreign to his subject. He has a head of "Inflexion," where, if nowhere else, one would expect to find some slight notice of the history of the language and its relation to other languages. Nothing of the sort is given in any systematic form, but scattered up and down the chapter are little references to "nouns of Anglo-Saxon origin." We are told that "best" is contracted from Anglo-Saxon bet-est, and, less accurately, that among ways of forming the plural, "adding en to the singular" "was the prevailing mode in Anglo-Saxon." Now if the beginner is fit to be talked to, not only about "classical languages," but also about "Anglo-Saxon," by fits and starts, it is plain that he is fit to have the real history of his native tongue clearly set before him. Or rather, incidental references of this kind would seem to imply that those who are to use the book have already taken some steps in philology. But the book is for beginners, it is "a First Grammar," an "Elementary Grammar," "preparing the way for the larger and complete works." And moreover it is a Grammar which omits entirely one division of grammar—"Derivation." Yet here we have just enough derivation to make any one ask for more. And as Dr. Bain's readers—readers of a First and Elementary Grammar—are expected to understand references to the "classical languages" and derivations from the "Anglo-Saxon," it would seem that he looks on comparative philology as something which is to be mastered at a stage of the study of grammar earlier than the beginning.

If indeed Dr. Bain's fashion of teaching grammar is to be the beginning, we cannot say that we object to the arrangement which places philology before the beginning. At all events the understanding ought to have reached its most highly matured state before it is set to work on "Co-ordinating" and "Subordinating Conjunctions," of which the "Co-ordinating" are either "Cumulative," "Adversative," or "Illative," while the "Adversative" again are either "Arrestive," "Exclusive," or "Alternative." We can make something out of all this by the help of Dr. Bain's examples. When we are told that "the strong form of opposition given in the word 'But' makes an 'Arrestive Adversative

"Coordinating Conjunction," we get some faint idea of an "Arrestive Adversative Coordinating Conjunction," but our ideas of the word "But," and "the strong form of opposition given in" it, are in no way enlarged or made clearer. But conceive a beginner set to make his way through all these break-tooth words. Conceive his being burdened and tormented with "the Coordinating Relative of Persons," the "Coordinating Relative of Things," and "the Relative of Restriction, for both Persons and Things." Elsewhere Dr. Bain tells us that Snowdon and Paradise are "singular and meaningless nouns." We must confess that "Arrestive, Adversative, Coordinating Conjunction" sounds to us a very singular and a very meaningless group of adjectives; but what can Dr. Bain mean by applying those names to Snowdon, Paradise and a crowd of other proper names? We can hardly fancy that a Professor of Logic can himself really believe that proper names are in their origin meaningless; but his way of talking might easily lead a beginner to fancy so. And one or two sentences really look as if he thought so himself:—

"Snowdon" is the peculiar and exclusive name of a certain mountain. The name "Snowdon" is not significant—it is meaningless; it might have been given to a river, to a country, or to a horse.

Now surely it is a great thing that beginners should be taught that no proper name is really meaningless. It may be meaningless to us, but, if so, it is simply because the meaning is to be found in a foreign language or in an obsolete stage of our own. But Snowdon is eminently a name of another class; it is a name which is still descriptive in our own language; the name of Snow-down could be given only to a hill; it could not "have been given to a river, or a country, or a horse." Are we to suppose that Dr. Bain would say that the name Blackwater could have been given to a mountain, or does he fail to see that Snowdon is as much a descriptive name as Blackwater? It may be that one who "omits entirely one division of grammar—Derivation" may really fail to see that dun, down, don, down, are all the same ending. But if derivation is omitted, poetry might have helped him. Snowdon is not "the peculiar and exclusive name of a certain mountain." There are at least two other heights in the Isle of Britain—probably several more—which bear the name, besides the more famous one in Caernarvonshire. And one of these at least ought to be known in Dr. Bain's part of the world. Can it be that a Professor of Aberdeen has never heard that Snowdon's Knight was Scotland's King?

Other proper names are treated in the same manner; but it is perhaps enough to add that Dr. Bain seems to look on the following sentence as English, or at least whatever language is spoken at Aberdeen:—"They say that the Prince leaves this to-morrow; would you have believed it?"

MEMOIR OF JOSHUA PARRY.*

THE life of a Nonconformist pastor in a small country town, how great soever his local repute or private worth, can scarcely be thought to promise much material for awakening the interest of the public after a century of repose. Nor is there much either in the private incidents of his career or in its points of contact with men and things at large to satisfy the curiosity of those who may be moved by the sight of a good-sized volume, going so far back into the past, to ask who or what was the Rev. Joshua Parry resuscitated in this Memoir. It may be that a keener ambition or a lot in life more imperatively urging him to exertion might have led to his achieving a place amongst the divines and thinkers of his time more in accordance with his undoubted abilities. As it is, however, there is quite enough of value in the literary remains now brought to light to make us regret the comparative oblivion under which one well fitted to make his mark upon the theological belief and philosophical thought of his age has so long been suffered to lie.

The subject of this Memoir came of an old and respectable stock long connected with the Welsh Border. Memorial brasses of members of the Parry family, far back in the sixteenth century, are found in more than one church in the counties of Hereford and Brecon, and the handsome tomb of Henry Parry, Bishop of Worcester, who died December 12, 1626, is to be seen in excellent preservation in his own cathedral. At what time or under what influences the family connexion with the Church of England was severed we fail to learn. At Llangham, in the county of Pembroke, where Joshua Parry was born June 17, 1719 (O. S.), his great-grandfather held so much property, added to estates in the neighbouring county of Carmarthen, as to be popularly called thereabouts "owner of the whole world." The family domain, however, had sadly dwindled from this fabulous vastness by the third generation, having had to undergo the process of subdivision amongst twenty-one children, of whom Joshua was one of the younger sons. Losing both father and mother in infancy, he was brought up under an excellent classical tutor, Mr. Davis, at Haverfordwest. At what period he left his native county was not known to his grandson and biographer, but from a note in Sir J. Hawkins's

Life of Johnson, we learn that Joshua Parry was one of a knot of promising young men at the academy of Mr. John Eames, in Moorfields, maintained by Dissenters for the supply of candidates for the ministry. Eames, besides being well known as the friend, correspondent, and assistant of Newton, had been the continuator of the abridgment of the Philosophical Transactions by Jones and Lowthorp, and turned out many pupils who became distinguished in science and letters. The knowledge acquired by these teeming young brains was poured out, we are told, as fast in letters to the Gentleman's Magazine upon mathematics and other branches of science, or polite literature in general. Among those whose friendship young Parry formed thus early were Canton, afterwards known for his discoveries in magnetism and electricity, and as the friend of Franklin; Collings, a good Greek scholar, besides being the inventor of artificial magnets; Densham, an excellent mathematician, and Hawsworth, the compiler of Cook's Voyages, and coadjutor of Johnson. With Mr. Ryland, a merchant in Moorfields, a relative of Hawsworth, and one of the nine members of the Beefsteak Club formed by Johnson, Parry resided in 1738. As early as this he is seen to have been engaged in literary pursuits, and contributing under assumed names to the periodicals of the day. In a letter dated soon after this time, he speaks in a somewhat light vein of the Methodists, who were just then springing up, as a "sort of religious knight-errantry." The missionary efforts of their founder are described as "the achievements of a renowned champion of theirs, the very mirror of knighthood, who has traversed a great part of the globe in search of adventures." But "whether this dreaming of giants, monsters, distressed damsels, and enchanted castles, this marvellous and sublime in temper and conduct, is not likely to bring contempt on common sense and plain honesty," he leaves to be determined by all able divines and moralists. That Parry was Arminian rather than Calvinistic in his doctrinal tendencies, and of social rather than ascetic temperament, would appear from the report of Mr. Williams, a London minister, who, writing in February 1742, after Parry had acted for a year as minister at Midhurst in Sussex, describes him "as a most agreeable preacher, who from the courteousness and affability of his behaviour is suited to any station." He was thought to show undue levity when, being wished by Doddridge much of the presence of God in his chapel, he laughed and said, "Why, doctor, that's everywhere!"

In March 1742 Parry took up his ministry at Cirencester, whence no solicitations, however flattering, could induce him to move for the rest of his life. By many friends of influence and judgment, Hawsworth among the number, he was urged to betake himself to London, to enter the ministry of the Church, or to devote his talents to literary undertakings on a large scale. Disclaiming in his replies the love of applause or the desire of publicity, he was content with the sphere of usefulness afforded by his pulpit, or by the journals of the day in which he found an utterance for his opinions upon political and social, no less than literary, themes. Those were the palmy days of the controversy on the nature and origin of virtue and vice. Cudworth's eternal and immutable morality, having superseded the utilitarian doctrines of Hobbes, and having been supplemented in the scheme of Clarke and Price by the assertion of the existence in the understanding of the simple and necessary ideas of right and wrong, fit and unfit, had of late given way to Hutcheson's theory of the moral sense, the intuitive or instinctive acknowledgment of ideas or actions as in themselves essentially good or evil. Of the moral sense Mr. Parry avowed himself from the first an ardent champion. Extracts from his correspondence or from manuscript fragments dating from this period indicate the share he took in the controversy. Right, fitness, congruity he scouts, as not only "hard to explain, but absolutely inexplicable." Whether simple or complex, the idea of fitness, he argues, must proceed mediately or immediately from a sense. The metaphysics of Hume, reducing all ideas to images or impressions of sense, appear to him far more accurate and elegant than those of Hutcheson; albeit Hume, it is well known, rejected the notion of the moral sense in favour of the combined theory of intellect and instinct; such qualities as reason discovers to be useful or beneficial to society being immediately approved by an instinctive principle of benevolence or sympathy. In Parry's survey of man's nature, and his analysis of the principles of morals, the influence of Butler's writings, then recent, is clearly to be traced. Both in this and in the other short treatises inserted in the appendix, such as that on "Natural Theology" and the "Short Defence of Christianity," the writer shows himself well abreast of the ethical and intellectual movement of the time, while his style is marked by a balanced gravity and pomp of phrase, which seems somewhat old-fashioned nowadays.

In 1752 a marriage with Miss Hillier, the daughter of a wealthy dealer in wool and extensive proprietor of land at Cirencester, a man of good repute in the county, opened to Mr. Parry a position of more than independence, which was enhanced in the following year by the falling in of his father's estates at Upcott and Wiltington to the extent of many hundred acres. He then became a man of position, with ample leisure for the pursuit of his literary and philanthropic tastes. The period of his courtship is marked by effusions in the grandiose style befitting the grave and intemperate divine of the age, beginning with "Loveliest of Womenkind," and ending with "My dearest Lady, Dearest than my life, thou the most ardent of all Lovers, &c. Whatever he reads "in the way of lively description or lofty sentiment" he applies instinctively to her. He imagines her the universal subject of philosophers and historians, authors and poets, whether ancient or modern. "Plato and Xenophon, Cicero and Ovid, Bacon, Shaftesbury, and Pope have all written in your praise." He begs on his knees a long epistle, being in despair because his "perverse, lovely, dear cavalier" found fault with his last but one, and she is implored to "away with your 'real friend,' and such pretty Quaker-like formalities." We can hardly feel surprised to hear of his passion breaking out in poetry, of the quality of which we may perhaps judge from the sample selected for us out of an elegy on the death of General Wolfe, with whom, when quartered at Cirencester, the writer had contracted a close friendship. The upheaval from beneath the sea of one of the group of the Azores is described, apropos of Wolfe's voyage to America, in a style of versification which at the worst is such as becomes the stage of our national poetry at which Tate and Rowe were followed as Laureates by the Rev. Lawrence Eusden:—

See where remote the Azorian rock appears,
And lifts his conic head among the stars;
There a strange isle, begirt with rocks around,
Emerged by earthquakes from the vast profound.
Eight times the space that mortals wake and sleep,
Earth tottered underneath th' incumbent deep;
Such at the enormous birth were nature's throes.

Not less characteristic is another effort of Mr. Parry's muse, Erastes: an Ethic Poem in Defence of Love: a Fragment; whether published or not, we fail to gather from his biographer's notice. Upon the heads of "some late scribblers" of the '45 he poured the vials of polemical wrath in the Character of a Jacobite, rising to the somewhat equivocal climax:—

'Twere vain to answer every quack that rhymes,
And with his doggel thinks to purge the times.

Its chief light was shed upon a life otherwise devoid of incident by Parry's admission to intimacy with Lord Bathurst, and with the political and literary circle of which that courtly patron of the wits and poets of the day was the centre. With that nobleman, when busy in London with affairs of Parliament or Court, as well as with his son, afterwards Lord Chancellor, Parry maintained a correspondence which serves to illustrate many special passages in the political and social history of the period, besides contributing much to our general impressions of contemporary life and manners. At Lord Bathurst's table he mentions his meeting Hume, with whom he sat an hour and a half, and his being shown a long note intended for the new edition of the History of England, in refutation of Walpole's estimate of Richard III. Pope was a frequent visitor at Oakley Park. Among others whose friendship Parry made there were Lord Bathurst's son-in-law, General Urmoston, a man of literary talent with whom he corresponded through life; Dean Tucker; Edwards, author of the Canons of Criticism; Thomas Scott, Sir James Porter, Doddridge, Chandler, and Amory. With George Lewis Scott, a fellow-visitor with Hume at Lord Bathurst's, a friendly debate sprang up through the medium of letters forwarded by his lordship, touching points of what was then known as the "first philosophy," such as the eternity of matter, the creation of the universe, and the reality of space, with a critical discussion of the views of Descartes, Hobbes, Newton, and Berkeley. Scott will be remembered as an eminent mathematician and a pupil of De Moivre, the friend and correspondent of Gibbon, and of Simeon, the editor of Euclid, as well as the writer of the Supplement to Chambers's Dictionary. He was christened after George I., at whose Court, when Elector of Hanover, his father had served many years in some official capacity. He was himself for some time sub-preceptor to the Prince of Wales, afterwards George III. After many passages of arms between the two combatants, involving various points of mathematical as well as metaphysical fence, the general result seems to have been, besides a conviction that much was to be said on both sides, an enhanced feeling of friendliness and esteem for each other's intellectual and moral worth. Lord Bathurst's own letters, by the marks of confidence in which they abound, bear ample witness to the value he set upon his correspondent's judgment and discretion. They deserve to be read with even greater attention for the details which they furnish of party tactics and of minor goings-on behind the scenes of public life.

In the enjoyment of lettered ease and the sense of personal usefulness which, if not wide or conspicuous, was appreciated in his immediate sphere and generation, Mr. Parry's days passed tranquilly away. The death of his friend and patron, in his ninety-first year, preceded by nearly a twelvemonth his own quiet end, from an apoplectic seizure, in the autumn of 1776. The materials for the life of Lord Bathurst in the Biographia Britannica were mainly put together for Dr. Kippis by Mr. Parry. His letters show him maintaining to the last an interest in the affairs of the world in the widest sense, whilst turning his inmost thoughts more and more towards the life which was still future. There is something worthy of note in his expressing himself, within a year of his death, as "wonderfully entertained" by Daines Barrington's scheme for exploring the North Pole, the nearest approach to which was made by his own grandson, Sir Edward Parry, half-a-century later. Of Mr. Parry's large family, many, both sons and daughters, have shown themselves inheritors of his manifold gifts and bright example. Of the varied learning which he combined with habits of philosophical thought and a power of humorous expression, relics survive, we are told, in many fragments of a classical kind, as well as in a Hebrew grammar in manuscript, of the critical value of which we have misgivings when we hear of the Phœnician origin of the Welsh language forming one of his favourite crotchets. Lord Bathurst's estimate of his logical or forensic powers was shown in a remark that Mr. Parry, had he gone to the Bar, would have risen to be Lord Chancellor. Of his merits as a moralist and divine those will be inclined to judge most highly who have most carefully read what the loving care of his grandson has brought together of his fragmentary writings and his unobtrusive, but by no means wasted, life.

EREWHON.*

IN some indefinite colony not long ago an anonymous person was keeping sheep. The pastoral part of the territory was limited by a large mountain range, beyond which no discoverer had hitherto ventured to advance. The rivers which descended from it passed through steep and narrow gorges, and rose from wild glaciers which it was by no means easy even to approach. The shepherd, however, was animated with a lively desire for exploration, and he endeavoured to obtain some light upon the condition of the interior by cross-examining a native called Chowbok. Chowbok's knowledge was limited, but the very mention of the distant land evidently threw him into paroxysms of terror. The traveller's curiosity was of course stimulated by these manifestations, and he at length succeeded in persuading Chowbok to guide him to the foot of the range. Here, however, the native deserted him in a panic, and, forced to trust to his own resources, it was not without great danger that he reached the summit of the ridge, and thence descended into the strange region of Erewhon. A little ingenuity in the solution of anagrams will perhaps qualify our readers to discover for themselves the geography of this anomalous district. We may say, however, that it will probably be found in any map which defines the position of the valley from which Prince Rasselas started, of the country to which Candide was carried by the subterranean river, and of the islands first made known to us by the daring researches of Captain Gulliver. The peculiarities by which its inhabitants are distinguished from those of regions subdued by Cook's tourists and described in Mr. Murray's Guides are such as we never remember to have encountered before. Some of them show a considerable originality on the part of the people themselves or their discoverer, whilst of others it is not very easy to detect the precise object. On the whole, however, the Erewhonians may be described as an amusing race of people, and it may occasionally do us good when laughing at their grotesque habits to remember that our habits may seem equally grotesque to them. When travellers laugh at the Chinese for cramping their ladies' feet, the Chinese retort that we are still more silly for cramping our ladies' waists; and the reporter of Erewhonian habits intends to convey to us a series of similar rebuffs. We will mention one or two of the most striking peculiarities of this original people.

The traveller was struck by the extraordinary beauty and the generally healthful appearance of the people. On becoming familiar with them, he discovered that this was owing to a singular confusion in their ideas. Unlike Europeans, he says, they regard disease as sinful, and bad character as simply due to disease. He was imprisoned on his first arrival, chiefly, as it would seem, because he appeared to be in bad health from the effects of his perilous journey, and he was let out when he showed that he had completely recovered. At a later period he witnessed the trial of a man accused of being in a consumption, and he gives a full report of the charge delivered by the judge. Though the penalty of death had been abolished, the prisoner was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment, and to receive two table-spoonfuls of castor oil daily. On the other hand, a rich merchant with whom he stayed for a time was universally respected for his perfect physical health; but he was undergoing a course of banishment for some unfortunate moral delinquencies into which he had been betrayed. In fact, he had embezzled the whole fortune of a poor widow under circumstances of peculiar atrocity; the kleptomaniac—as we presume his complaint would be called in this hemisphere—had gradually risen to this height in consequence of his foolish neglect of some slight earlier symptoms. The friends of the family expressed the warmest sympathy with the unfortunate sufferer, and indeed manifested so much kindness that he declared playfully that he almost felt disposed to have a return of his complaint, in order that he might again be the object of so much warm sympathy. The treatment adopted in this case appears to have consisted chiefly in repeated floggings, which were however considered in the light of surgical operations, and not as involving any degradation or general loss of esteem. Various other whimsical consequences of this peculiar inversion of ideas may easily be imagined. A lady, for example, who is manifestly out of order, endeavours to persuade her friends that she has been taking to drinking; whereas unkind persons are severe enough to say that the taste for drink is entirely fictitious, and that she is really suffering from some constitutional disorder. Bodily ailments, we are told, are regarded as more venial in proportion as they have been produced by causes independent of the constitution. Thus, if a man runs his health by drinking, the bodily disease is considered to be part of the mental disease to which it was owing, and therefore counts for little; whilst such illnesses as fevers or consumptions, which to us appear to be beyond individual control, are treated with the utmost severity, and subject the sufferer to fine and imprisonment.

The modes of punishing convicted invalids have recently become less barbarous than formerly, when no physical remedies had been provided, and a man once punished for some trivial complaint was very frequently an inmate of the gaols for the rest of his life. A great prison reformer, however, had arisen, who persuaded the public that a legitimate policy would admit the cure of complaints. He succeeded in obtaining a partial instalment of reform, in virtue of which all diseases were divided into three classes, according as they affected the head, the trunk, or the lower limbs. Diseases of the head, whether external or internal, were to be treated with laudanum, those of the trunk with castor-oil, and those of the legs with an embrocation of strong sulphuric acid and water. Some of the more energetic reformers are anxious to carry these principles further, and regard the classification and the remedies adopted as inconclusive.

The satire conveyed upon some of our institutions is easy enough to be interpreted in this last instance; but it may be doubted whether any very intelligible moral is to be derived from the general notion of substituting physical for moral diseases. Considered as a mere play of fancy and a whimsical upsetting of old associations, such as may take place in Looking-Glass Land or other similar regions, it is quaint and amusing enough; and some of the consequences are worked out with considerable ingenuity. We have a suspicion, however, that the author intends to be profoundly satirical; he very properly keeps any direct expression of his moral to himself, and will laugh at the obtuseness of critics who fail to draw the inferences which he intends, or who draw others of which he was not thinking. We venture, however, to assume that his moral would be something to the effect that we ought to treat crime as a disease, and that a disposition to commit murder being just as much a necessary consequence of certain antecedent causes as a tendency to catch fever, we ought in both cases to effect a cure, instead of inflicting a vindictive punishment. The Erewhonians are illogical in regarding a fever as criminal; we are just as illogical in not regarding a crime as morbid. Now, even assuming that the philosophy of this is unimpeachable, and that human actions are subject to invariable laws of causation, the conclusion does not quite follow. We hate a man, it is suggested, for being murderously disposed; why not hate him for being consumptive? or rather, why not regard him with pity in both cases, as being the victim of external circumstances? The reason in the case suggested is obvious enough. A murderer is apt to hurt us, whereas the victim of consumption is injurious only to himself. Regard one man as simply the plaything of a bump on the back of his head, and the other as having some defective arrangement of the lungs, and the murderer will still be the more hateful, because the more mischievous. But place the two complaints on a level in this respect—suppose, for example, that consumption should be a highly contagious complaint—it is true that we should still feel sorrow rather than anger for its victim. If indeed he had voluntarily incurred it owing to some morbid propensity, we should begin to dislike him; and yet the morbid propensity would be just as much a matter of causation as the complaint. Without entangling ourselves in the labyrinth whose borders we have thus reached, we may say that there is a simple practical answer to the difficulty. It is essential that certain qualities should be the objects of extreme disapproval, because that disapproval is the best means of keeping them down. Disapproval, unhappily, has very little tendency to suppress consumption, though it may and ought to suppress some practices which lead to consumption; and therefore it would be a waste of good hatred to detest an invalid; but it does and can have a most potent effect upon checking the development of murderous and other immoral propensities, and should therefore be stimulated in regard to them as much as possible. All this is independent of the perplexities about free will and necessity which seem to have been puzzling the author of Erewhon, if indeed he is not simply playing with a good old difficulty that has perplexed the minds of many generations.

The Erewhonians have sundry other peculiarities, equally queer, of which we have not space to give a detailed account. They have given up the invention of machinery, which will probably please Mr. Ruskin, though their reason seems to have been fanciful. The law against machines created much ill-feeling; but it was finally settled that none should be employed which had not been in use for 271 years, that period having been determined by a series of compromises, and chiefly in order to excuse a certain mangle-machine much used by Erewhonian washerwomen. Then there are the Colleges of Unreason, which are specially devoted to the study of hypotheses; that is to say, to the theory of what might have been, which is a much wider and more elevating study than the theory of what actually has been. In these colleges the youths are forced to spend many years in learning a language which has not been spoken for many centuries, and they cannot stop at that, as soon as it has been learnt. This is not a very brilliant bit of satire; but the author reserves his most powerful satire for the established religion of Erewhon, which it appears is a compromise between the worship of a certain goddess whose name, by a slight change of letters, may be converted into Grundy, and a variety of other gods, in whom nobody believes very much, but whom everybody treats with profound respect. The goddess Ydgruz always gets the best of it, but her claims upon the worshippers conflict with those of the rival deities. In this part of the work we feel bound to give due notice that the author appears to be anything but orthodox; and indeed we are inclined to guess from some of his expressions that he is a bit of a positivist. We cannot follow him into those regions, especially as there is always a difficulty in arguing against a parable, and especially against a parable without a key to it. There are, however, a good many ingenious remarks and some caustic hits in the book; elsewhere it degenerates into somewhat commonplace and easy satire; and, on the whole, the allegory seems to be rather too far-fetched and complicated to have the desirable brilliancy of effect.

FATHER GERARD.*

NEITHER the title-page nor the lettering on the back gives any adequate idea of the contents of this volume, and there is no preface or introduction to inform us what we are to expect. It consists of two parts, the first extending to 262 pages, comprising a Life of Father John Gerard, and the second being the Narrative of the Gunpowder Plot, written by himself. Now as the date of the plot is 1604, and Father Gerard left England in 1606, it is somewhat of a misnomer to describe such a volume under the title of "The Condition of Catholics under James I." If it had been called "Gerard's Narrative of the Gunpowder Plot," to which is prefixed the Author's Autobiography," we should have known what to expect. But it is only at the very end of the first portion of the volume which contains the Life that we learn anything of the literary history of the work.

The autobiography is a translation by Father Kingdon of a MS. entitled Narratio P. Joannis Gerardi de tota vita sua. The original no longer exists. The copy from which the translation is made is at Stonyhurst, and purports to be a copy from an original at the Novitiate of St. Andrew, in the hands of Father Francis Sacchini, the historian. Portions of it have from time to time appeared in The Month. It was composed in 1609. The narrative of the Gunpowder Plot was originally written in English during the latter part of the year 1606, just after the author's escape from England. It is a folio volume of about 300 pages, and in 1789 was in the hands of the Rev. John Thorpe, by whom the editor conjectures that it was given to Father Stone at Liège, and by him brought to Stonyhurst, where it is at present preserved. Dr. Lingard had access to this MS. and made considerable use of it, but does not, as far as we know, refer to the autobiography. The editor's reason for prefixing it to the narrative is that he wishes to claim for the writer the credibility which is due to his life and character. And though a biography composed by another person would be more valuable for this purpose than an autobiography, still, as he justly observes, it is a circumstance most favourable to the formation of an accurate judgment respecting Gerard, that he should have spoken of himself at considerable length, and entered into many and minute details of his own life.

The Life, as it is here presented to us, is made up of a translation of large portions of the Latin autobiography, with a few passages interspersed to fill up the gaps in the narrative. We should have been glad if the learned editor could have made it consistent with his plan to give the whole work, either in the original or in the translation. The omissions, we do not doubt, have been judicious, and in one instance almost necessary; for the Jesuit Father had given a summary of his narrative of the plot, which of course would have been entirely superfluous in a volume containing the whole narrative at length. He protests in his Life, as it is well known from history that he did publicly before the world, his entire ignorance of the whole affair till it was discovered. He was one of the three Jesuits against whom a proclamation was issued by name; but though the other two were aware of the existence of the plot, Gerard was not in any way in the secret. Garnett knew it in general terms, from the confession of the other Jesuit, who probably knew in confession most of the details of the plan for blowing up the Houses of Parliament. Nevertheless Gerard narrowly escaped with his life, having lain hid for nine days, during which the house in which he was concealed was watched by guards day and night, sentinels being posted for three miles all round the house to prevent the chance of escape. When the immediate danger of being taken was past, he left England, May 3, 1606, and soon afterwards composed the narrative of the plot and his own autobiography. The editor has given in addition a brief account of the remaining thirty-one years of Gerard's life, after which he proceeds to institute a deliberate defence of his veracity, and enters into the general question of equivocation and direct lying under certain difficult circumstances. The dissertation seems to us wholly superfluous. The whole question has been discussed with unequalled delicacy and refinement in Dr. Newman's Apologia, and the treatment it received from that master-hand is familiar to all who care anything at all about the subject.

over, Gerard's narrative stands in no need of any such defence. It speaks for itself, and is its own guarantee for its truthfulness. There is no reason whatever for suspecting the writer of the narrative of falsehood, because he details in it minutely the artifices by which, when travelling through England in disguise, he attempted to elude the observation of officials who, if they had caught him, would have brought him to a trial which would have ended in his execution. There may be persons perhaps who may think that a man is not justified in having recourse to deceit in order to preserve his life from his enemies, but, without entering into that question here, it is at least evident that a man may avow that he thinks otherwise without prejudicing his general veracity on ordinary topics in a case where telling the truth exposes him to no danger. And, as we have said, Father Gerard's narrative not only carries on its face all the appearance of artlessness, but its details are so minutely confirmed from contemporary documents now in the Public Record Office, that a defence of his veracity is wholly unnecessary. We have, therefore, neither the occasion nor the inclination to enter into disputable questions of casuistry, and shall confine our observations to the two narratives of Father Gerard's own composition—the History of the Gunpowder Plot and his autobiography.

The Life itself is full of interesting particulars, both as regards the writer himself and many other Jesuits who were employed on the English mission during the reign of Elizabeth. Though he had been imprisoned in 1584-5 for more than a year in the Marshalsea, for declaring himself a Catholic, he returned in 1588, having been in the interval ordained priest and admitted into the Society of the Jesuits. His account of his arrival in England, and of the shifts to which he was obliged to have recourse to escape detection, has all the interest of a romance. All the three priests who landed with him suffered execution. Two of them were condemned under the statute of Eliz. an. 27, for exercising priestly functions in England, after having been ordained beyond seas. Here it must be remembered that the prohibition of the statute did not extend to the English priests who had been ordained during the previous reign. The third escaped for eighteen years, and was at last executed for supposed participation in the Gunpowder Plot.

Gerard landed somewhere, he does not say exactly where, on the East coast, and made his way to London, always avoiding the high roads and the villages, so close a system of espionage being kept up that no stranger could pass through any town or village without being subjected to inquiry as to what he was and where he came from. He at last reached London after many narrow escapes, having kept up the deception all the way that he was a gentleman's servant in search of a lost falcon. He had learned the terms of falconry in order, first, more successfully to practise this deception, and secondly to enable himself more easily to ingratiate himself with the country gentlemen with whom he might hereafter have to deal; for he observes that they had no other ideas than such as were connected with field-sports, and that all their conversation, excepting what was blasphemous and obscene, or slander of the Pope and Roman Catholics, was confined to these subjects. One of the most remarkable features of the narrative is the large number of conversions to the Roman Catholic faith made by him in various parts of the country where he was from time to time domiciled. But, besides this, there is an immense amount of information about different persons, which is not to be met with in any other printed work. Amongst others who were converted during the first few months of his residence in this country, was a lady who was sister to Sir Christopher Yelverton, whose name he does not mention, but who is easily identified as "a judge who even now is the most firm support of the Calvinist party," and by the insertion of the name in the margin. And here he gives an anecdote of the highest interest as throwing light on the already considerably damaged character of Dr. Perne, Master of Peter House and Dean of Ely, who, the author observes, had changed his religion three or four times under different sovereigns. We may remind our readers that his name was subscribed as one of the six King's chaplains to the Forty-five Articles of Edward's reign, of which we gave some account in our issue of October 28, 1871. It is well known that this weathercock managed to adhere to the religion professed by Henry VIII., veered round into the extreme of Zuinglianism which was fashionable in the time of Edward VI., became a Catholic again in the reign of Philip and Mary, and adopted Calvinism to keep his preferments at the accession of Elizabeth. Under these circumstances the following entirely new story about him will not be thought quite incredible. It occurs at p. xxvi. of the Life of Father John Gerard. Speaking of Yelverton's sister he says:—

Being very anxious as to the state of her soul, she went to a certain Doctor of the University of Cambridge, of the name of Perne, who she knew had changed his religion some three or four times under different sovereigns, but yet was in high repute for learning. Going to this Dr. Perne then, who was an intimate friend of her family, she conjured him to tell her honestly and unadulterately what was sound orthodox faith by which she might attain Heaven. The Doctor finding himself thus earnestly appealed to by a woman of discretion and good sense, replied, "I counsel you never to discuss to another what I am going to say. Else then you have promised to answer as if I had to give an account of your soul. I will tell you that you can, if you please, live in the religion now professed by the Queen and her whole kingdom, for so you will live more at ease and be exempt from all the vexations the Catholics have to undergo. But by no means let out of the faith and communion of the Catholic Church, if you would save your soul." Such was the answer of the poor man, but such was not his practice; for, putting off his conversion from day to day, it fell out that, when he last expected, on his return home from dining with the pseudo-Archbishop of Canterbury, he dropped down dead as he was entering his apartments, without the least sign of repentance or of Christian hope of that eternal bliss which he had too easily promised to himself and to others after a life of a contrary tendency.

Amongst other very curious pieces of information with which this book abounds, we may mention the account of the death of Essex's sister, Lady Penelope Devereux. She is known as having been married by William Laud to the Earl of Devonshire, for adultery with whom she had been divorced from her first husband, Lord Rich. The allusions in Gerard's narrative are very vague and indistinct. He is evidently unwilling to speak of the lady's misconduct; but he describes her as having gone so far as to fix a day for her confession to him, preparatory to being received into the Church of Rome, and being dissuaded from taking the step by one "who had loved her long and deeply"—i.e., Charles Blount, Lord Mountjoy, who was created Earl of Devonshire in 1603, and died in 1606, little more than three months after he had persuaded his chaplain Laud to marry them. Gerard says of him that he died of grief, "invoking, alas! not God, but the goddess his angel, as he called her, and leaving her heiress of all his property." His widow afterwards began to think of her former resolution, and just about the time when Gerard was informed of this, and was on the point of writing to her, she was carried off by a fever; "not, however," he observes, "before she had been reconciled to the Church by one of ours."

We can scarcely within our limits give even a faint idea of the interest of the narrative, which details so many hair-breadth escapes of the writer. On one occasion he was hidden in a dark closet for four days, with nothing to eat but a few biscuits and some quince jelly. But though there was a traitor in the house in the person of one of the servants of the family, he could not be found, and the search was given up, under the idea that he must have made his escape. Soon after this he was caught through the agency of the same traitor, and imprisoned for some years, during which he was several times had up for examination, and frequently put to the torture, being left hanging up to the roof of a cell by ropes tied round his wrists, without any support to his feet. His own account of his proceedings whilst under confinement, and his successful escape from the Tower by means of a rope which crossed to the opposite side of the moat, is the most interesting part of the whole narrative. So considerate was he, that, as he was effecting his escape, he left a note for his gaoler, explaining that, if he wished to escape also, and so avoid the danger of having been thought an accomplice in furthering his prisoner's plans, he had provided a horse for him, and gave him directions which road he should take to avoid detection. The gaoler embraced the offer, and managed to live unmolested in the country for some five years. Gerard himself managed also to preserve his incognito till the time of the Gunpowder Plot. Though proclamations against him by name were issued, the Government could not catch him, and he soon afterwards left England, and never returned, though he survived more than thirty years.

We reserve for another occasion our notice of the latter and somewhat larger half of the volume, which gives the history of the Gunpowder Plot.

A MAN'S THOUGHTS.*

IF Fielding is rightly described as the prose Homer of human nature, no less rightly may Mr. Hain Friewell be described as the prose Tupper of human philosophy. There are many persons who no more think that it falls within their capacity to understand poetry than a child thinks that it falls within its capacity to understand a sermon. Such people, if on opening a book they see that it is printed like poetry—the lines of unequal lengths and a capital letter at the beginning of each line—quietly close it again, and, if their love of literature is not somewhat chilled by this unexpected incident, continue their search after prose. No doubt, in many cases, if they had had courage to read a few lines of the poet they lighted on, and had once got used to the capital letters occurring in the middle of a sentence, they would have found that poetry is wonderfully like prose, and could often be turned into it by the aid of the printer alone. Nevertheless, while readers are so cautious and so distrustful of their own powers, it is well that between the poet and the people there should come a kind of factor, whose duty it should be to bring the wares of the one within the easy reach of the other. Such is the pleasing task which Mr. Friewell seems to perform for the author of Proverbial Philosophy. We do not in any way mean to say that the book before us is a conscious adaptation of Mr. Tupper's great work. Nevertheless it is clear that the younger writer has drunk deep of the Tupperian spring, and, thoroughly saturated with the latest form of that philosophy, is rather removing its difficulties for the sake of the uninitiated than originating any new form of thought himself. He is not indeed the only disciple Mr. Tupper has had, who devotes himself to the pleasing task of expounding his philosophy. Just as Socrates had Plato and Xenophon, so our English Socrates, Mr. Tupper, has, on the one hand, the author of The Gentle Life, and, on the other hand, the no less pleasing author of the Recreations of a Country Parson. Let none despair.

* A Man's Thoughts. By J. Hain Friewell, author of "The Gentle Life." London: Sampson Low & Co. 1872.

Those who cannot understand Mr. Tupper can surely understand A. K. H. B., and those who cannot understand A. K. H. B. can at all events understand Mr. Friwell. Our author, with plentiful quotations from the Book of Judges and from Milton, explains to us first who the Philistines were, and next who are the Philistines of Mr. Matthew Arnold's writings. We may mention, by the way, that any one unfamiliar with the story of Samson will find it given at full length, as his jawbone and all, in Mr. Friwell's pages and in Mr. Friwell's language. Now if any modern Philistine should suddenly get inspired with a zeal for Mr. Arnold's "culture," and giving up his Daily Telegraph should cry, What shall I read to be cultivated? we would advise him to begin cautiously and to try A Man's Thoughts. He might advance onwards to A. K. H. B., and so reaching Mr. Tupper prepare for still higher efforts. There is, however, some cause for alarm when we come to recommend the work before us as a Primer of Culture, if we may so term it. Just as any boy who has once seen frogs pelted can pelt frogs himself, so any one who has once read such an author as Mr. Friwell can himself turn author. Some arts are so easy of attainment that little more is required for their successful practice than the wish to excel in them. Now to write in the style of the Daily Telegraph, like going to Corinth, does not fall to the lot of any man you please. Cultivation, no doubt, may do a great deal, but a Special Correspondent of the paper that has the largest circulation in the world cannot be raised from any stock, any more than the prize ox of the Cattle Show. To read therefore the Daily Telegraph is comparatively safe. We are told in old legends of only one man who tried to imitate the thunderings of Jupiter, and in old fables of only one frog who tried to swell himself out like an ox. Mr. George Augustus Sala has perhaps rather more imitators than his forerunners, whether in legend or in fable; but of the 190,000 subscribers to the Daily Telegraph—we forget the old numbers—there are, we feel sure, but very few who would be presumptuous enough to try to imitate him. The case is very different when they turn to Mr. Friwell, and find that the chief part of an author's art can be imparted by the writing-master. The scribbling itch will then seize all alike, and as each man has his thoughts as well as Mr. Friwell, we shall have no restraint left on the multiplication of authors except the indolence of those who have acquired the art of penmanship. Mr. Friwell will of course always remain the prose Tupper, but he will be the head of a very extensive tribe. How many hundreds of thousands must there already be, even before compulsory education has been brought to bear on the masses, who could, if they chose so to waste their time, write passages equal in originality and in expression to the following:—

Half the nostrums of the world, which wise men, or those who deem themselves wise, put forward to cure the evils of society, will be put out of course by self-restraint. No one except the most ardent teetotallers would argue that it is a sin to taste wine. The sin consists in the excess, and although vegetarians have a much better cause, for on the face of the question it seems cruel to kill animals to feed on them, perhaps they might listen to reason where moderation is exercised. Self-restraint will make every kind of enjoyment lawful in its proper time and place, will induce good health and satisfaction in life; will make our work a pleasure, our exercise delightful, our rest and sleep refreshing. In these, also, we should be careful and moderate. In fact there is nothing in life that can be indulged in to excess without hurt to soul and body. In like manner there is hardly anything in life that need be shunned as a sin or a folly if taken properly—used and not abused.

Mr. Friwell would seem to have readers, for he goes on bringing out what he would call, we suppose, new works. One of his books too, as we learn from the advertisements, has gone through ten editions, and "deserves," in the language of an admiring journal, "to be printed in letters of gold, and circulated in every house." Increase of appetite may grow in certain cases on what it feeds on. We should have thought, however, that every one throughout the country must have at least two opportunities every Sunday of satiating his desire for that kind of hash of moral sentiments and that kind of travestying of Bible stories which we find in these pages, without going to the expense of buying them from Mr. Friwell on week days. As far as our experience goes, preachers have not yet left off telling us that "there is nothing in life that can be indulged in to excess without hurt to soul and body," nor have they grown weary or ashamed of telling in their own feeble language what stands already told in the noblest language ever written. It is true that Mr. Friwell, by the help of that "independent scholarship" which the Nonconformist finds in him, and which we, so far at all events as the independency is concerned, willingly concede to him, at times throws additional interest on moral teaching and Bible stories. He tells us that it was just when "Philistia was at the culmination of her complacent power" that Samson arose, who, we learn parenthetically, was as "mighty as the fabled Hercules, if indeed he was not he." We regret to learn, however, that Samson, whether Hercules or not, was "stained somewhat, as our new morality makes us think, with the sins of the flesh." About the Philistines and their country we get some information which is, we fear, scarcely more exact in its geography than in its grammar:—

The Philistines, as we should properly call these people, then inhabited the plain of Philistia; and bounded on the north by Phœnicia and Syria, and on the south by Egypt and Arabia, the fertility and the position of their country gave them enormous wealth. So far they were like England.

However, as Mr. Friwell's readers perhaps never heard of Phœnicia and have not the least conception where are to be found Phœnicia and Syria, or Egypt and Arabia, no great harm is done. Mr. Friwell may also, we can well believe, "cite the Latin summa jura," and yet not lose that reputation for "independent scholarship" with which his readers, on the authority of the Nonconformist, will credit him. He is not, however, always independent; for at times he is condescending enough to appeal to authority. On the derivation of the word conscience he has a good deal to say, and while telling us that some "derive it from scientia communis, the common or general in-dwelling knowledge of man," he adds that "Gessner says it may be derived from con, together with, and scire, to know; so that you at once know what you have done." We hardly know which to admire the more, the happy audacity or the excessive caution of Gessner, who, while lighting on the track of the derivation of so obscurely compounded a word, yet is not carried away by the zeal of the etymologist, but only ventures to hint at the possibility of the correctness of his view. Passing from words to facts, those who have never heard the story of Alexander and Diogenes will find it twice told in Mr. Friwell's pages, with such improvements in the second narrative as are naturally suggested in a twice-told tale. In p. 76 we are merely introduced to Alexander as "that great conqueror surrounded by a glittering corps of courtiers, generals with short flat clanking swords that struck against their mailed buskins with a pleasant rattle." But in p. 193, while the courtiers have disappeared, we have Alexander himself described "as the swaggering captain in his clinking arms, his nodding plumes, gold helmet, and glittering sword." We are glad, however, to say that the well-known sunshine remains the same in both narratives. We have already shown how, out of the wealth of his stores of knowledge, Mr. Friwell contrives to throw in information parenthetically. The second account of Diogenes is properly introduced by a dissertation on the Cynics and a defence of Antisthenes, as the first account was no less properly introduced by a dissertation on tubs. We quite agree with Mr. Friwell when he tells us

It would be wrong to suppose for one moment that Antisthenes, who at Cynosarges (whence some say the name of the sect) founded this school of philosophy, intended it to degenerate to what it did.

We never yet heard of any founder of any school who "intended it to degenerate to what it did." We should be glad, however, of an opportunity of putting Mr. Friwell a question or two as to the place that he spells Cynosarges; and we would suggest that before he next presumes to write about the founders of schools of philosophy, he would do well in the first place to consult his biographical and geographical dictionary, and in the second place to acquire the art of copying correctly. Mr. Friwell, we should imagine, knows only two stories out of Greek history; for if he knows more, why does he tell these two twice over? We have Leonidas and his three hundred, as well as Diogenes and his tub, brought in to do duty in two separate chapters. We have felt it our duty to be rather severe upon him; but, to show that we are not ill-disposed towards him, we will in a moment supply him with materials for two or three new chapters, if not indeed for a whole book. Let him get down his Biographical Dictionary, or his Goldsmith's History of Greece, and look up the stories of Croesus, of the Seven Sages of Greece, of Lycurgus and Spartan broth, and at the same time let him read up some of the obscurer parts of Bible history—the story of Joseph, for instance—and he will have, we feel sure, nothing left but a title to select, a preface to write, and a publisher to find.

Mr. Friwell does not expound only the Bible, the classics, philosophy, and Mr. Tupper to his readers. He knows political economy after the school of Mr. Ruskin, much as Chaucer's Prioresse knew French "after the scole of Stratford atte Bowe." Till now we had always thought that in ignorance of political economy Mr. Ruskin was unrivalled. But the disciple has surpassed the master, and as long as Mr. Friwell lives Mr. Ruskin can boast that there is in his favourite subject one man who is more ignorant than he. Mr. Friwell, while accepting all Mr. Ruskin's doctrines, has his own grand remedies for the corruptions and miseries of society:—

We shall have a noble outcome in the far-distant future from all this turmoil; but it is yet too early to ask women to vote. We must do away with open voting, and substitute voting papers (as they have done for the graduates of Oxford or Cambridge) before that day comes; and meanwhile we must go on educating the people, and endeavouring not only to raise every man and woman, but every child. We can at least educate them in silence and in patience; as we are now, almost every one, without a thought wasted or spent about a matter, pronounced on it.

This "noble outcome" bursts upon the reader with a most pleasing abruptness. Nothing had been previously said about votes for women, nothing about voting-papers, nothing about education. However we will not object to that, and we are quite content meanwhile to go on educating the people, till the far distant future comes when, after all this turmoil, women will have votes and voting-papers; and education, which has only been a means to that glorious end, can be given up as being of no further use. We would suggest, however, that as the best step towards this education "in silence and patience," Mr. Friwell had better leave off writing. The Spartans, as Mr. Friwell will learn when, following our advice, he reads his Goldsmith, certainly were said to try to deter their children from drunkenness by making their slaves drunk. In like manner it is just possible that the silliness of Mr. Friwell's tedious garbality may tend to disgust his readers with garbality in general, and so we silence them in silence. As regards patience, however, there had been doubt that, unless that virtue requires to have exercise artificially found for her, the education of critics will be the more complete the less they have to do with Mr. Friswell.

CRANSTOUN'S TIBULLUS.*

MR. CRANSTOUN has done a good service to letters in seeking to atone for the slight hitherto put by English translators on the neatest and most elegant of Latin elegiac poets. Translation may not be the grandest of fields, but it is something to occupy it with taste, judgment, and discernment, and to select such portions of it for cultivation as are least exhausted, and therefore most likely, if well dealt with, to bring credit to the cultivator. This seems at any rate to have been Mr. Cranstoun's opinion when, regarding the versions of Horace and Virgil which have within the last fifteen years issued so profusely from the English press, and the versions of Catullus with which his own very meritorious translation has to compete—regarding too the indications of popular toleration even for translations of the unequal and tedious Propertius—he determined to put in a plea for the refined and tuneful Tibullus, and by the publication of his Studia Tibulliana in the form of an elegant metrical version, with an introductory life and survey of the poet's works, and an appendix of illustrative notes (which are almost a florilegium of classical translation in themselves), to bespeak a reconsideration of the rank to which the lover of Nemesis and Nereia is entitled. Surely to an English ear strains cannot fail to be welcome which represent a poet who may seem to have combined Goldsmith's love of nature and simplicity with the grace, finish, and elegiac tone of the statelier Gray; and inasmuch as the sole competitor in the field is an almost forgotten Mr. Dart, whose version of a century and a half ago is at best respectable and passable, we may congratulate Mr. Cranstoun on having occupied a place for which his poetical skill, no less than his manifest classical training and acquirements, abundantly fits him. It is not always, especially in the reproduction of the classic poets, that we can honestly commend endeavours of which the best to be said is that they are well meant; but in this version of Tibullus the copy, no less than the model, is thoroughly acceptable. Mr. Cranstoun has retrimmed Tibullus by aid of the best ancient and modern commentaries, thought out the meaning of doubtful passages, and weighed the pros and cons about disputed arrangement and authorship. Hence, so far as it goes, his volume is a valuable chapter in the history of Roman literature (which, by the way, has yet to be written as a whole), all the more valuable because of the fulness, taste, and pertinency of its parallels and illustrations; and the reader is made to feel that while his guide is obviously an enthusiast, he is never so much so as to let his zeal bias his judgment. If Tibullus does not henceforth hold high favour amongst English readers of the classics, the fault will be in their own taste, and not in the presentment of him by his new translator.

The data for a life of Tibullus are conveniently succinct. An Elegy of Ovid, an Epistle of Horace, and a life by an old grammarian, supply materials which illustrate, and are illustrated by, the internal evidence of the Elegies themselves. We get the idea of a genial, handsome, refined, but not foppish, Roman knight, very early in life his own master, and yet tenderly attached to his mother and sister, and, for a Roman in his position, a singularly domestic character. Through all his poetry, even when it is most erotic and at the laxest, there breathes a true elegiac plaintiveness; and the impression grows with the perusal of it that this slave of one mistress after another might, under other conditions and another creed, have found the ideal he sought. As it was, it is not proved that Nemesis, Delia, Nereia, and Glycera (with this last we credit him on the showing of Horace, and not on his own confession) were chargeable with being a drain upon his patrimony, which had been reduced by confiscations on the death of Cæsar. Just before his early death he threatened to sell his possessions to gratify capricious Nemesis, but this may have been no more than a figure of speech, and Horace's Epistle (l. 4) compliments Tibullus on his secret of uniting a calm mode of life with the true art of enjoyment. An intimate connexion with a great patron, Messala, obliged him to accompany that general, perhaps more as the bard of his exploits than as the aide-de-camp of his campaign, against rebellious Aquitania in B.C. 31; but when it came to an expedition to Asia, a convenient illness cut short the poet's war-service at Corcyra, and henceforth he gave to Venus the homage which we cannot suppose he ever heartily rendered to Mars. His loves, in fact, constitute his history. Nereia jilted him; Delia's intercourse was a case of "quarrel again and make it up again," till on his return from Corcyra he found that she had forsaken him for a richer and less jealous lover. Of Glycera we know little save from Horace's epithet, but she probably preceded Nemesis, the rapacious beauty who saw the last of him, and met another of his enslavers, Delia (or Plania) at his funeral pyre. As each of these held sway over him in succession he thrilled to their praise songs of far deeper feeling than the light, skin-deep effusions of Horace or Catullus, who, as Mr. Cranstoun neatly puts it, engrave the names of their mistresses "on shells of rare beauty, it is true, but still on shells only." We are not aware that it is a serious drawback to the poetic reputation of Tibullus that Dr. Arnold coupled him as a bad poet with Propertius, and that Niebuhr thought scorn of his sentimentality. Ne auctor ultra credidim. Mr. Cranstoun has a better right to be heard in the field of poetic art, and we cannot imagine a truer estimate of Tibullus than that which he has given in the following passage:—

Tibullus cannot, it is true, soar into the blue heaven and gaze upon the sun in his meridian splendour, like that eagle of the Alps "the young Catullus"; he has not the vast learning, nervous vigour, and sparkling brilliancy of Propertius; nor the exquisite pathos, richness of imagery, and intensely sensuous feeling of the many-minded Ovid; neither can he play with the affections like Horace in his own, or Martial in a later day—poets who could tease and fondle Love by turns, as a lady would a lap-dog; but he evinces throughout a simplicity, a naturalness, a tenderness, and a tenderness particularly his own; and herein lies his charm.

His love of home and friends, his enjoyment of the country, of hills and dales, of shepherds and sheepfolds, of smiling meadows and murmuring rivulets, of purple vineyards and yellow corn-fields, and of the innocence and simplicity of earlier days, combined with that tender melancholy that over, cloud-like, threw a shadow o'er his brow, gives him an almost romantic interest in the eyes of the modern reader; and will always secure for him, with lovers of rural scenes, one of the most enviable positions among the sons of ancient song.

We have scarcely space to glance at the matter of the excursus on the authorship of the Third and Fourth Books, or at Mr. Cranstoun's argument against the views of Lachmann, Dissen, and Milman, who refuse to ascribe these to Tibullus. The most difficult argument to answer is that which is based on El. III. v. 17 and 18, which seems to fix Tibullus's birth in the year of the Battle of Mutina (B.C. 43), "cum cecidit fato consul uterque pari." The first line of this couplet runs "Natalem nostri primum videre parentes," or, as some MSS. read, "Natalem primo nostrum," &c. Our translator holds that Tibullus reckoned his years in reference to so singular a chronological landmark as the fact of two consuls, Hirtius and Pansa, meeting their deaths on the same day of the same month, just as a man the fifth anniversary of whose birth fell on the day of Waterloo might say he was five years old at that date. So far so good. But he would further for "primum" read "decimum"—not so simple a transcriber's error, we fear, as he accounts it. It would, no doubt, simplify matters could we venture to adopt a suggestion which would remove one hindrance to the establishment of the Third Book as genuine, and yield a sense on this wise:—

My parents saw their boy's tenth natal day
What morn one fate both consuls swept away.

Leaving, however, to the curiosity of readers the arguments for and against the ascription of the later books to Tibullus, we pass to the examination of Mr. Cranstoun's work as a translator, more especially as regards the earlier and undoubted elegies. And first let us cull from that sweet elegy to Delia, written in sickness at Corcyra, passing by, though of exceeding beauty, the English counterpart of the familiar lines about the old Saturnian rule, vv. 35-44. We quote the poet's vision of what is in store for him should his illness prove fatal. (See vv. 57-66.)

But me, the facile child of tender Love,
Will Venus waft to bliss Elysium's plains,
Where dance and song resound, and every grove
Rings with clear-throated warblers' dulcet strains.
Here lands untill'd their richest treasures yield—
Here sweetest cassia all untended grows—
With lavish lap the earth, in every field,
Outpours the blossom of the fragrant rose.
Here bands of youths and tender maidens chime
In Love's sweet lures, and pay the untiring vow—
Here reigns the lover, slain in youthful prime,
With myrtle garland round his honoured brow.

In this metre, which we recognize as the fittest to represent the Latin elegiac, the first five elegies and many of those that follow are rendered; and rendered, it should be added, with singular felicity. The sixth elegy of the First Book, addressed to Delia and, as Mr. Cranstoun surmises, to Tibullus's successor in her affections, is broken up by the translator into two. The theory is plausible enough, but it seems to us unlikely that the poet would have troubled himself with inditing "cautions" in verse to a fortunate rival; we think it more probable that the whole was addressed to Delia, though the latter half was designed to work on her fears and vanity, and the former to suggest to her, banteringly, what he could tell, if he chose, to her temporary possessor. It is not necessary to suppose that for other than Delia's eye were meant the ingenuous confessions—

Ah, me! I taught her first her guards to fall,
And now on me, alas! my arts recoil.

'Twas I, I'll tell the honest truth outright,
At whom your mastiff used to bark all night.

Another variety of metre is seasonably called to Mr. Cranstoun's aid when he translates the graceful and spirited elegy (l. vii.) on Messala's birthday. The fourteen-syllable ballad metre might seem at first too roomy for the gist of the elegiac couplet, but a comparison of Latin and English in the two lines of each which we quote as a test-point will probably satisfy those who take interest in the problems of translation that the experiment is in this case successful:—

An te, Cydne, canam, tacitis qui leniter undis
Ceruleus placidis per rada serpis aquis?

O! Cydne, shall I sing of thee, through thy shallows creeping slow, Thy placid streams, thine azure gleam, and thy wavelet's noiseless flow.

* The Elegies of Tibullus. Translated into English Verse. By James Cranstoun, B.A., Author of a Translation of "Catullus." Edinburgh and London: William Blackwood & Sons. 1872.

Each feature of the original is caught, each trait represented with a skill holding the happy mean between freedom and servility. Later in the same elegy occur some good lines descriptive of the praise due to Messala for his talents as a road-maker, displayed upon the Via Latina (I. vii. 57-62):—

While of yon splendid road the sons of Tusculum shall tell,
And they who in the ancient homes of white-wall'd Alba dwell;
For by thy wealth the gritty rock was hither brought and strown, Compacted here and joined there, with skilful art, each stone.
For now they never lose their path, nor stumble by the way.

Yet another metre is used with excellent effect to render the "Praise of Sulpicia" in the second elegy of the Fourth Book, and we had marked a stave or two for quotation; but it is due to the more appropriate representative of the Latin elegiac to give preference to a quatrain or two from the tenth elegy of the First Book ("The Blessings of Peace"), out of which we extract Tibullus's pathetic contrast between the tangible present and the to-the-heavens drear future (I. x. 33-44):—

Ah me! why court dark death in war? all round
It creeps unseen and silent, ever near:
Below, no crops—no vines—but the fierce hound,
And the grim boatman of the Stygian mere.

And there, with sunken chaps and half-burnt hair,
By the dark lake the wan-faced tenants roan;
Far happier he, who with his own may share
In age and competence the joys of home.

He tends the sheep, his son the lambs, and aye
His loving wife her weary husband cheers.
So may I live, and see my hair grow gray,
And tell, when old, the deeds of early years.

Perhaps the italicized epithet in the fifth verse scarcely represents "percuressia," which rather means smitten by the wailing shades, acting as their own "præficio"; but otherwise we do not see how such stanzas as these could be mended. In the third elegy of the Second Book on "Nemesis in the Country," one couplet sent his mistress, whom he likens to Venus ruralizing with her son (vv. 3 and 4), is a picture in itself:—

Verbaque aratoris rustice discit Amor.*

For Venus' self has sought the happy plains,
And Love is taking lessons at the plough.

What a subject for a vignette! A little further on (vv. 17-20) there is a vision of Diana meeting her brother Apollo when he was herdsman to Admetus, which is thus prettily rendered:—

How oft pale Dian blush'd and felt a pang
To see him bear a calf across the plain!
How oft, as in the deepening dell he sang,
The lowing oxen broke the hallow'd strain.

In single lines too Mr. Cranstoun very frequently exhibits great ingenuity of translation, as where it is said of Juno's tempter, Ixion, that in Tartarus

*Versantur celeri noxia membra rotâ
Ixion . . . bound

Against the merits which we have noticed there are, of course, a few slips to be set off. E.g., in I. vii. 4 we find a hypermetrical line repugnant to our ears; unless indeed "sacred" can be taken for a monosyllable in the verse—

Whose might should make sacred Atax quake in terror to the main; and in II. i. 28 we should prefer some other rendering of "solvite viacula cado" instead of "the Ohian cask unbind." Nor can we acquiesce in the rendering of "agricolis coelitus" by "vernal powers." In I. ii. 81

Nun feror incestus sedes adlisse dororum
is rendered:—
With sacrilege can mortal blast my fame?

where it is too much to expect the readers to understand that "sacrilege" means "a charge of sacrilege." There are several other slips of a similar nature which a little careful revision would amend. But, on the whole, when we take into account the mass of verse-translation from Tibullus and his compeers, as well as from their Greek models, here and there, with which this volume is enriched, it is matter for wonder that the errors are so few. As for the beauties, they are creditably abundant, and every one who cares for Latin elegy or its English representations may be safely recommended to study Mr. Cranstoun's Tibullus.

A RETROSPECT OF THE AUTUMN MANŒUVRES.*

WE have no right to conjecture who "A Recluse" may be, but we may safely say that the Retrospect of the Autumn Manœuvres would do no discredit to the name of any of our best military authors. Calmly and logically written, suggestive without being dogmatical, and displaying considerable acquaintance with history and a powerful grasp of his subject, the book before us is a valuable contribution to British military literature. We cannot say that we always agree with the author, but we do say that everything he has written is worthy of careful consideration. It is naturally difficult for those who have been brought up in a particular school to accept the fact that their previous training has not only done them no good, but has even done them absolute harm. English gentlemen, and above all English officers, are, as a rule, conservative; the latter are also, and with reason, proud of those special characteristics of the British soldier which enabled Wellington so often to overthrow with a thin two-deep line the dense columns of the French. As a nation, too, we love to close with our enemies, and the bayonet has always been the favourite weapon of our army. These traditions, this attachment to the arme blanche, are declared by our author to be, in the altered conditions of war, most pernicious, and it must be admitted that his words supply matter for serious reflection. The problem is one the solution of which is both painful and difficult. Painful because, if we adopt the solution of the author, we must confess that the years spent in bringing our army to the perfection of a machine have been in great part wasted; and difficult because of the undeniable fact that a military system, to be thoroughly effective, must be adapted to the peculiarities of the nation. It is, however, of the utmost moment that we should take advantage of the period of peace which we are at present enjoying, and decide now after what fashion we shall carry on war when war comes; for to defer the question until hostilities break out would be an act of suicidal folly. War no longer affords its own school, but is simply a test of the training received in peace. We must therefore, if we wish to preserve our laurels, determine what system shall in future be adopted.

The author tells us that "our tactical system must be radically changed," and "that the British bayonet and French élan lie buried in the same grave." That our tactical system must undergo some change we do not doubt, but we are by no means convinced that the change need be radical. The history of the late war supplies, it is true, arguments in support of this radicalism, but on a close inspection their value becomes seriously diminished. At St. Privat the Prussian Guard, advancing for some fifteen hundred yards across a valley and up a slope completely exposed to the fire of the French, who were sheltered by garden-walls and rifle-pits, were repulsed with great loss, but so probably they would have been under the old conditions of war. We do not, therefore, consider that the result of this often-quoted episode proves conclusively that formed bodies of troops should never advance within two thousand paces of the enemy's fire. Yet this is the rule now followed in the Prussian army, and the author wishes to see it adopted in our own. He seems to be of opinion that skirmishers, supports, and reserves should all attack a position in extended order. Though he does not expressly say so, he allows it to be inferred that lines should be altogether proscribed. He forgets, however, that the French who repulsed the attack on St. Privat were in line formation, and our deduction from this fact would be that the line was particularly adapted for defensive positions. Let us now take the case of an advance to attack a stationary foe. Generally speaking, an intelligent leader will be able to procure, as he advances, much cover from the nature of the ground, nor will he attack till his artillery has somewhat shaken the enemy. Still it is certain that long lines advancing without firing would be destroyed before they could come to close quarters with the foe. A fire to cover their advance and distract the attention of the enemy, while supplementing the effect of the artillery, would be supplied by clouds of skirmishers, and in future skirmishers will no doubt be much more freely employed than formerly. Nevertheless the fact remains that the deployed battalions would offer marks which it would be easy to hit during the advance. It follows therefore that all the troops heading the attack should, if not especially favoured by the ground, be either extended as skirmishers, or broken up into fractions less than even half-battalions. The second line might, however, be formed of battalions advancing in line. The enemy could not very well fire at four ranges at once—it would have to fire at three ranges against skirmishers, supports, and reserves—and consequently the deployed battalions would in reality be exposed to a comparatively trifling danger. At the commencement of the advance the second line might follow at a considerable distance, diminishing it gradually as the first line drew nearer to the position, and the advantage of supporting the necessarily disordered rush of the skirmishing bodies by regularly formed lines, of improving by this means a first success, of repelling a counter attack, or of covering a retreat, would be incalculable. We have always thought that the Prussian line, if possessing as little solidity as is alleged, offered an excellent opportunity for a counter attack; and we believe that by a flank our lines during the autumn manœuvres could easily have been pierced.

The fact is, the new Prussian mode of fighting has not yet been fairly tested. The French made their few counter attacks in a lumbering awkward manner, and had discarded their old dash tactics without having acquired the conditions which distinguishes the British soldier. Besides, they had as little as possible. British troops would never, we may say, have allowed their main line of battle to be approached by a flank, but weak clusters of skirmishers they would have brushed them away by a short charge, or have manoeuvred sent out skirmishers to keep those of the enemy at a distance. The Prussian mode of fighting is, after all, but formulated and scientific bushwhacking, and would be innocuous against firm, well-led soldiers. If the fighting on both sides is to be restricted to skirmishes, a battle would resolve itself into a continual dribbling on to the scene of contact, and the struggle would be indefinitely prolonged; and rendered much more sanguinary than is the case at present. With regard to the size of the tactical units recommended to be employed in future, it must not be forgotten that if one of our battalions, with an establishment of 800 rank and file, organized in eight companies, sent out two companies as skirmishers and two as supports, the remaining four companies would be little stronger than two Prussian companies without the third rank, and that a half battalion would scarcely exceed the strength of a single Prussian company. We are glad to find that the Duke of Cambridge still maintains that the line formation is the best suited to the British soldier. We may imagine him arguing as follows:—"There is a considerable difference between the British and the Prussian soldier. The former undergoes twice as long a training as the latter. The British soldier is also individually less intelligent than the Prussian. The Prussian system is suited for highly intelligent trained men of short service, who would be incapable of manœuvring with precision in large bodies. Our method is better for old well-drilled, but less intelligent, men. We will not wantonly throw away our special advantages." For some time after the American war mounted riflemen were cried up as the expense of regular cavalry; the fact being that the theatre of war was often unsuited for the latter, even if there had been time to train them, which there was not. The Americans had to choose between contenting themselves with mounted infantry and having no horsemen at all; and it is possible that the Prussians are in a similar situation. Again, as to the bayonet; if two opposing bodies are equally determined to close with each other, the moment of actual contact must arrive at last, and then the side which possesses confidence in the bayonet will assuredly prove successful. Besides, the moral effect of a line advancing with bayonets fixed and rifles at the charge is very great. In a pamphlet by General von Moltke, recently translated into English by Lieutenant Crawford, continual mention is made of the bayonet as a useful adjunct to fire, and as the weapon with which to decide an action. In the latest Prussian drill-book, also, there is as frequent reference to the bayonet as in our own Field Exercise. On the whole, therefore, though more tact than hitherto will be required in the use of the bayonet, we do not believe that the weapon is obsolete any more than we believe that cavalry will be replaced by mounted riflemen.

The importance of the subjects of line formation and the use of the bayonet is so great at the present moment, when such extensive modifications of the art of war are taking place, that we make no excuse for the length of our remarks on that portion of the book before us which relates to it. The other chapters, however, which consist of a record of the autumn campaign and a series of able criticisms on it, are scarcely less interesting. "The general idea" promulgated at the commencement of the campaign was not, in our author's opinion, sound. It was assumed that Carey at Hartford Bridge Flats, though equally strong with Hope Grant, was alarmed because the latter threatened his communications with Staveley at Woolmer, and consequently fell back on the latter. But the author correctly points out that Carey had no reason for fear, and that Hope Grant ought to have avoided placing himself within a day's march of two armies each as strong as himself. He is not less severe on "the general idea" issued for the guidance of the opposing generals on the 16th September, the date of the first battle of the mimic campaign. He points out that, as we remarked at the time, it was an error for Hope Grant to detach, as in compliance with the programme he did, a skeleton force representing two thousand men in the direction of Hangry Hill. That body, completely isolated, would, in rank war, have been certainly disregarded and captured. The order that Carey should take 10,000 men against this weak detachment appears to have been equally in violation of the principles of military science. Indeed it was a mistake to turn Hope Grant's right, instead of his strategic flank, his left. The author concludes from the events of the day that Grant, recognizing the defects of the Hangry Back, a bald narrow ridge with the front (from the broken nature of the ground) most favourable to the attack, determined only to occupy it with a rear guard. It is certain that he did only occupy it with four battalions, a regiment of cavalry, and half-a-dozen guns, and determined that his main position should be Gravel Pit Hill. The author justifies Grant's feeble defence of the Hangry Back, but we find ourselves unable to adopt his opinions in full. That the ridge was narrow, and exposed to distant artillery fire, is true; but the reverse slope of the hill furnished ample cover for his supports, and the banks and hedges on its front slope and on the summit afforded good opportunities for a stout rearguard fight. The retreat moreover of Grant's battalions would have been covered by the fire of the artillery on Gravel Pit Hill, which was distant not more than three thousand yards from the summit of the Hangry Back. The attack on Gravel Pit Hill was, we agree with the author in thinking, decisively repulsed, "but his retreat had been pre-determined in order to comply with General arrangements." Indeed throughout the campaign the enemy General seems to have acted as a drag on the military operations. We must also refer to the manner in which the hands of the Irish generals were tied by directions issued from Headquarters, to an extent quite inconsistent with the declaration that "the most unhesitating control in the strategical and tactical handling of the troops committed to their charge was delegated to the commanders of divisions."

The comments of "A Recluse" on the battle of Bixley Common are exhaustive and instructive, but we can only notice one or two points. Grant failed to derive full benefit from his superiority in artillery, which was ought to have been disposed as we to bring a converging fire on the débouches from the tunnels under the railway embankment. Lysons, commanding one of his brigades, owing to a misapprehension due to a loose definition of the boundaries, extended his troops too far to the right, and had some of his battalions put out of bounds. He also neglected one of the bridges over the canal. Grant took up too long a line, and made preparations rather for a stout defensive battle than for an action to cover a retreat, which was inevitable. On the other hand, Staveley did not properly concert his movements with Carey, and commenced his front attack before Carey had come up on Grant's flank. This error was chiefly due to the fact that the two attacking divisions were not placed under one commander. The end of the affair was, as we know, that Grant fell back in disorder to Chobham Common. The chapter devoted to the battle of Chobham Common is full of clear criticisms and instructive disquisition on questions of tactics. The action is thus tersely summed up:—"As a sight it was grand and enjoyable; as a preparation for the field it was worse than useless. It was calculated to convey impressions which are not real, and to confirm prejudices which are based upon ignorance of present warfare."

The final chapter treats of the last combat of the campaign, the battle of Fox Hill. The umpires pronounced Carey, who commanded the assailants, to have been victorious. Our author challenges their verdict. We confess that we share the opinion of the umpires. The author says that Carey's leading brigade under Lysons would, when it reached the summit of the plateau, have been swept away by Staveley's artillery. We believe, however, that a short movement to the rear would have provided Lysons with cover, furnished by the edge of the plateau, and that he could have remained there in comparative safety until the concentric movement had been completed. Moreover, he had surprised the wood bordering the Farnborough Road, and the skirmishers he threw into it could have checked any counter-stroke on Staveley's part. According to the author, Carey's conception was admirable, and was properly carried out until the plateau was crowned. Then occurred the error which might, and in his opinion would, have led to failure. That error consisted in not closely supporting the leading brigade with artillery and cavalry. Speaking of cavalry, we are glad to take this opportunity of clearing a gallant old soldier, Sir Thomas McMahon, from the blame which almost every critic has imputed to him. It is said that, if the cavalry had been properly handled, Carey's surprise would have been impossible. Now we happen to know that Sir Thomas repeatedly asked permission to send his cavalry out to scout, and failed to obtain it.

We could willingly, if space permitted, extend our notice of this book, for it is clearly and powerfully written, and every assertion is supported by arguments which, if not always convincing, are invariably entitled to consideration. Among the many valuable results of the autumn manœuvres not the least valuable is this able and instructive "Retrospect."

TWO MINOR NOVELS.*

Y<sup>OUNG</sup> acquaintance with German literature has enabled the author of Linked at Last to produce a very fair imitation of the real thing. It has of course the necessary defect which belongs to all imitative work, in the evidence it gives of a certain sense of effort after accurate local colouring, which is quite different from those half-unconscious touches which mark the scene and express the author's inbred familiarity with what he describes more vividly than any amount of conscious labour can do. But, apart from this inevitable drawback, it is a creditable performance enough, and depicts the quiet life of a German village with both grace and pleasantness. The happy, dreaming, romance-weaving life of childhood of course comes in as part of the picture; the pure love of youth and maiden, of the kind which the "little sister who dwelt beyond sea" typified in her three gifts, has its fitting idyl. In contrast to this comes the commonplace betrothal of two heavy, lumpy souls, where her dowry and his golden count for everything, and human affections for nothing. The village inn-keeper, a person as important as the village miller or the very pastor himself, and the small intrigues and ambitions of the village aristocrats, with their sons to marry where rich portions have been saved up, and their daughters to settle for life where fertile fields and substantial farm buildings are the hereditary possessions of the family and likely to pass to the eldest son, are also brought before us as the circumstances which belong to the typical German picture of which Linked at Last assumes to be one view.

If the loves of weak-willed Heinrich and Rosa, fond, devoted, but dowerless, are less nationally characteristic than might have been, they are fairly interesting, albeit sad, at least for one of them. To be sure they are not German, but they are human; and catholicity of drawing is perhaps as good as correct local colouring. Of the two pairs of lovers represented, Heinrich and Rosa, and Newton and Nesta, the men alone are substantially constant. Heinrich has the look of some lapses of virtue in that direction, and as if he were about to play false with poor oppressed little Rosa for the sake of Marie Dreuser's money. Perhaps he might have been led on to the final act of perfidy if he had had the chance, since he was not a youth of much moral firmness; but as Marie jilted him and transferred herself and her wealth to a rival, Heinrich was free to be constant long after Rosa had replaced him by another. When the former slighted Cinderella has found her fate and happiness as the wife of an honest English farmer, and as the mother of seven children, Heinrich Müssinger pines away in his native Auerbach, and dies quite as much of grief as of consumption. And in the loves of Newton and Nesta, Nesta, though confessedly a type of constancy, does forget Hugh Arden when he is dead, and does solace herself by the love of the living. But Newton is constant all through, and so we may suppose Hugh Arden has been. The loveliest person in the story is this calm and saintly Nesta. She always composes well, and sheds a peculiar tenderness on all with which she is related. She is like one of Retzsch's outline figures—a sweet and tender maiden, whose love has no passion, and her sorrow no bitterness. From the introductory scene, which in point of chronological arrangement should have been the last, and all the way through, she is delightful. As the young bridesmaid in her wraith of roses, as Hugh Arden's girlish lover, as the sweet and patient "Tante Nesta," ever ready to help the little ones, and dearer to them than their own mother, as the womanly sympathizer with poor Rosa, as the lay sister tending the sick and dying, she is always a sweet and pure object, whom doubtless the young, for whom the book is best adapted, will appreciate. And as the sentiment with which she is invested is not mawkish—at least not unbearably so—no harm will be done to counteract the elevating tendency of the character. Else a high-flown story full of impossible morality is not always the best kind of reading for the impressionable young. There are many pretty little bits in this book. The slight touches indicative of Heinrich's love for pretty Rosa, while she is the mere slave and drudge of Frau Müssinger, his mother, whose shrewdness, keenness, eternal scolding, and unsympathetic but eminently just nature are evidently drawn from the life, are tenderly put in and not over-elaborated. Then the scene at the Kirchweih, where Heinrich dances with Marie Dreuser, while Rosa looks in at the door as disconsolate as a short-waisted Peri before the closed gates of Paradise, and then vanishes like a ghost, overpowered by the Frau's cruel, if accurate, method of adjusting persons and places—this is also very lifelike, and portrayed with sufficient spirit; in fact, the book altogether is pretty and pleasant, and, if slight in workmanship, is thoroughly sound in feeling.

Three stories bound together by the thinnest possible thread make up the staple of Sisters and Wives. The first tale is the history of Justina Chester, the second that of her sister Janetia, and the third that of Sophy, their half-niece, when they are both elderly women, and "poor Jack's" orphan child has to be provided for. These three women form a chord of character very distinct and well done. Justina, whose little history of love that looks like hate, and sharp criticism that means more real appreciation than any amount of flattery or contemptuous indulgence could do, is a woman of both depth of feeling and steadiness of purpose. She is the right hand, and more, of her thriftless, vain, sloppy mother, and of her back-boneless sister; and she it is who brings order into the affairs of the one, and supplies the moral support so much needed by the other. Her love affair with Dr. Holz, an army surgeon on his way to the Crimea, is very nicely told. The doctor thinks well of her, in fact loves her, but desires to prove her; and his proving takes so much the tone of censure that Justina accepts it as censure, and holds herself as lowest in his esteem. Not that she much cares, she says to herself after the manner of young girls—in novels—who love undetected by their own consciousness; still it annoys her. And so the little game goes on, with the reader standing by as a kind of benevolent old uncle, perfectly aware how things are, and how they will end.

The scene in the beginning of the book, where a number of fair maidens and youthful matrons, all more or less silly, are making up bandages and lint for the wounded, with Dr. Holz as general superintendent, and a "Sister" as the indulgent, if half scornful, lady president of the endeavour, is very pretty and life-like. And though, on account of the shortness of the story, all the subordinate characters are merely sketched in, yet they are wonderfully distinct, and so far help in the animation of the picture. Janie Seabrooke is especially good, if she herself is less charming morally than she might have been; and the airs of the youthful matron, Mrs. Vallance, "who had not yet recovered from the effect of her marriage," and whose one panacea for all ills was "If a married woman had been there," are charmingly indicated. The story is a mere sketch throughout, but it is as delightful as an artist's outline, and more pleasant than more elaborate work. In this first "book," as Miss Tytler calls her novels, the ground is laid for the personages and events of the other two. Thus the scapegrace Jack, Justina's half-brother, whose orphan child Sophy forms the motif of the third story, meets with an accident, and dies at St. Anne's, close to Three Elms, where Justina is paying a visit and making bandages and lint; and Justina sees him, and is reconciled to him. Here, too, Rowley Musgrave, who is also turned to account in the third book when a mature man, is brought before us a hobbledahoy fond of quarrelling with girls a few years his seniors; while foolish Mrs. Chester, and pretty, childish, weak-minded Janetia, are merely spoken of, to be more fully represented in the second story. But save for the reintroduction of names, the stories are substantially distinct, and have no real connexion with each other.

In the second book, called also "Won in an Hour," the heroine is Janetia Chester, and the hero one Mr. Duke, a prosperous tradesman of St. Anne's. It had been one of Justina's greatest efforts, before she married Dr. Holz and went off to try conclusions with life on her own account, to keep Janetia from sinking into a lower social grade than that into which she had been born. And in consequence of her success Janetia, at thirty or thereabouts, with her beauty on the wane, and her character becoming daily weaker under the urgent tyranny of her mother and old Sarah, is Janetia Chester still, and likely to remain so. But the Perseus whom time brings to this Andromeda of gentility is in every way different from the ideal she has pictured for herself, or that Justina would have chosen for her; and Miss Tytler has shown considerable skill in rendering the marriage of the faded, well-born beauty with the good-hearted, underbred, and prosperous shopkeeper possible even under the exceptional circumstances described. One sees, too, the difference she has intended between the unintellectual gentility of the lady and the well-read, well-educated, large-minded, and (conventionally) vulgar tradesman. The whole story is nicely told; and if, like Richard III., Mr. Duke's wooing was of the quickest, like his also it did its work and prospered. The little hitch that follows in their affairs comes in well as an exponent of character and a bettering of relations; and the way in which Janetia, even when most heroic, retains all her old ladylike weaknesses, and is as feeble as ever notwithstanding her sudden accession of resolve, is a very life-like, and telling point.

Sophy, the niece, is the third and last of the portraits, and the least amiable. She is an ill-tempered, perverse, and ungrateful young person, who is brought into a wholesome state of mind through tribulation of a sharp kind. At one time we had no hope that she would ever reform. There seemed to be no elements of good in her; but Miss Tytler's kindly philosophy overcame the apparent difficulty, and Sophy develops in the end into a being worthy of her aunt Justina. But how that desirable result is produced we must leave in the dark. The book is thoroughly wholesome reading for the young, for whom, like Linked at Last, it seems to have been especially written; and to say that a work has fulfilled its intention is to give it sufficient praise.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

THE practical interests of Europe may be but remotely affected by the issue of the recent war in Paraguay*, yet the struggle itself deserves the attentive study of persons interested in the problems of political and military organization. History, in fact, scarcely presents a more memorable example of what may be accomplished by discipline, patriotism, and valour against a vast superiority of force, or a more striking instance of the development which a nation's resources may receive from a long-continued course of sagacious administration directed by an iron will to a single end. In the eyes of a thorough disciple of Mr. Carlyle, this Japan of South America, where everybody was fed and nobody was idle; where the wisest head took thought for all the rest, and the very maximum of service to the State was as cheerfully rendered as inexorably required; where the wheels of Government were never clogged by the hesitation of the rulers or the resistance of the ruled, but performed their functions with the regularity of a machine—such a polity must appear an unapproachable model, the envy of Prussia herself. In reality, however, the history of Paraguay teaches a very different lesson, evincing the radical vice of any system of government which entrusts the destiny of a country to a single man. The accession of a ruler with a taste for war proved the ruin of Paraguay, and the marvellous coherence of her organization only served to prolong and aggravate her calamities. Few histories have been more systematically disfigured by party spirit, the opinions of European journalists during the contest having been usually determined by their republican or monarchical sympathies, and the few unbiased eyewitnesses being justly characterized by Herr Schneider as military tourists rather than historians. His own endeavour at an impartial and methodical narrative is laudable, and in the main satisfactory, although it is impossible to ignore a decided Brazilian bias, to be accounted for perhaps by his information being mainly derived from Brazilian sources. At the same time we believe that his leaning is in the right direction. The defensive attitude of Paraguay throughout the greater portion of the contest must not blind us to the fact that this was not a matter of choice, but of necessity, and that the war began by a flagrant aggression upon her part. The pretext was afforded by Brazilian interference in the distracted Republic of Monte Video, but it can scarcely be doubted that the real motive was President Lopez's desire to find employment for the splendid military instrument which, on his inauspicious accession to power, he found fashioned to his hand. With moderate political dexterity he might probably have enlisted the other Spanish American States of the Plata on his side; but his violence and arrogance united them against him, and his country, attached to him less by his personal ascendancy than by the iron bonds of a military discipline unexampled since the days of Sparta, perished along with him in the unequal strife. Herr Schneider's circumstantial narrative commences with the intricate but necessary detail of the civil commotions of the Republic of Uruguay, the very apple of discord to all the conterminous States. It is not perhaps generally known or recollected that Brazil at one time endeavoured to incorporate this relatively small, but geographically and commercially most important, tract into her own dominions; and there can be little doubt that the resumption of the attempt upon some favourable opportunity will sooner or later occasion a most sanguinary conflict between this Empire and the Argentine Republic. This might have been precipitated on the present occasion if the Paraguayan President had played his cards with more adroitness. His rashness in assailing the Empire and the Republic simultaneously brought about the triple alliance of these States with Uruguay and the grand campaign, unique in the military annals of South America, but offering no little analogy to the sieges of Richmond and Sebastopol. The first stage of this, up to the passage of the Parana by the allies, is described in the volume before us; the most interesting and characteristic portion is to come. Herr Schneider possesses many of the attributes of a good historian; his chief defect is an over-copiousness of detail in minor matters. The occasion of his undertaking the work was his engagement as rédauteur of Paraguayan news for a Berlin newspaper; and, besides access to all published works and documents, he has had the advantage of information from German officers employed in the Brazilian army.

Georg Hiltl's history of the late war*, being designed for popular reading, is too one-sided for the exigencies of historical criticism, and the original sources of information to which the compiler has had access do not seem to be of much importance. It is, however, a creditable specimen of its class, fairly written and handsomely printed.

Theodor Fontane's tour in the North of France and the recently annexed provinces† was performed at the Easter of last year. It has afforded material for an entertaining pair of volumes, not remarkably profound or instructive, but written in an excellent spirit, and attesting a lively faculty for observation. Herr Fontane candidly admits the extreme disinclination of the people of Alsace and Lorraine to accommodate themselves to the new order of things, and apparently considers that it is more likely to be aggravated than mitigated by the administration of the German officers set to rule over them.

It is beginning to be understood how deeply Germany is indebted for her present greatness to the philosophers and serious thinkers whose imputed want of common sense has so frequently been the butt of superficial criticism. Professor von Sybel‡ has laid his countrymen under a real obligation by his earnest and by no means unnecessary warning against the temptation of undervaluing their vanquished enemies. In a brief but pregnant pamphlet he rapidly characterizes the fundamental distinctions between Germans and Frenchmen, both in their nature and in their external manifestations, and points out with admirable good sense what Germany may learn from French example, alike to imitate and to avoid.

A brief history of last year's agitation for shortening the hours of labour in England§, translated from an English manuscript, and accompanied by versions of the most important leading articles and letters to newspapers on the subject, is an able, concise, and candid summary of this episode of our industrial annals.

The interest of the subjects already announced for discussion, and the names of the writers, afford sufficient promise of the importance likely to attach to a series of pamphlets on the principal controverted questions of the day, produced at Berlin under the experienced editorship of MM. von Holtzendorff and Oncken.¶ The series is opened by Dr. H. Lang's "Life of Jesus and Church of the Future," a summary of the researches of the Tübingen school in New Testament criticism; it is clear and comprehensive, but makes no attempt to discriminate between the actual demonstrations, the adventurous generalizations, and the ingenious paradoxes of that brilliant but unsafe body of critics.

The present instalment of Dr. Otto Meier's history of the ecclesiastical relations of Rome and Germany in the nineteenth century‡ is devoted to the Bavarian Concordat of 1821. The book is terribly dry, but the subject is no doubt important from its bearing on the legal status of the "Old Catholics."

The genealogy in the tenth chapter of Genesis enumerates the Canaanites and Phœnicians among the children of Ham, whereas their language was demonstrably identical with that of the Semitic Hebrews. The most obvious way out of the difficulty is the supposition that the Hamitic and Semitic languages are branches from a common stem, and that the distinction of family is rather political or religious than ethnological. To establish this, the affinity of Egyptian with Hebrew must be proved, and we believe that philological inquiry tends rather towards this result. Assuming this relationship to be ascertained, Professor J. G. Müller* endeavours to account for the distinctions still subsisting between Semites and Hamites by a theory which regards the former as a branch of the Aryan family domiciled in Syria, which had adopted the language of its Hamite neighbours. This singular hypothesis is evidently the result of elaborate investigation, and is maintained with great sobriety of style, and a perfect command over the resources of erudition. The difficulty is to perceive the connexion between the facts adduced and the conclusions which they are considered to support.

Few men unendowed with creative genius have laid the literature of their native country under such obligations as Johann Heinrich Voss, and his life is sufficiently rich in incident and in characteristic traits to repay the labours of a biographer. The narrative has been admirably commenced by W. Herbst, whose sole apparent defect is to be even too exempt from the besetting failing of indiscriminate admiration, and scarcely to make so much of his hero as he fairly might. It must be admitted that the excellent Voss was singularly prosaic for a poet, but the massive worth and rugged independence of his character impose where they fail to attract. The sterling, but homely, tissue of his intellect presents a strong affinity to that of his English contemporary, Crabbe; like Crabbe also he owes his celebrity less to any distinctive eminence of genius than to the fortunate recognition of a peculiar department of art unoccupied before him, and entirely adapted to his powers. Crabbe found that the everyday life of the English peasant remained to be painted, and he painted it. Voss discovered the facility with which, alone among modern languages, the flexible and sonorous tongue of Germany could adapt itself to the reproduction of classical metres; and he endowed his native literature with the faculty of assimilating the literature of Greece and Rome. His negligent versification may have been surpassed by his successors, but his place in the annals of German letters, as well expressed by Niebuhr, is that not of a copyist, but of a re-creator of classical literature. His idyl Luise, though soon surpassed by a greater poet, and not much read at present, constitutes nevertheless an era in German poetry marking the triumph of nature over pedantry no less decisively than the kindred works of Cowper among ourselves. When to these services are added his successful conduct of the Musenalmannach, his philological labours, and his manifold relations with the eminent men of his time, involving sundry most vivacious and determined controversies, it will be apparent that the materials for an excellent literary biography are at hand, and Herr Herbst has turned them to good account by an admirable arrangement and a pregnant style. The first volume comprises the record of the young scholar's early struggles, his marriage and establishment as schoolmaster at Otterndorf, and his first attempts at original idyllic poetry and Homeric translation. The most generally interesting section perhaps is the description of the sturdy, healthy, but thoroughly prosaic, character of persons and things at Otterndorf, the place of all others most congenial to the idiosyncrasy of Voss himself.

Like most of the publications issued by the house of Teubner, Dr. Henkel's little treatise on political science among the Greeks† is characterized by lucidity and unpretentious thoroughness. It offers, in the first instance, a manual of the literary history of the subject, treating both of the extant and the lost productions of ancient writers. Their various theories, classified as pre-Platonic, Platonic, Aristotelian, and post-Aristotelian, are then analysed at length; and the last section treats of the dawn of political science, when the principles supposed to be established by that investigation of physical nature which was originally regarded as the sole mission of philosophy began to be applied to the ethical relations of men, first as individuals and subsequently as members of the community.

The educational system of Switzerland appears to be generally acknowledged as a model. The interesting volume of M. Aladár Molnár‡, the Commissioner specially appointed by the Hungarian Government to examine and report upon it, contains exceedingly full details of its organization in the cantons of Zurich, Bern, and Basel, with additional particulars respecting the normal, agricultural, and charitable schools of Switzerland and Bavaria. The volume is full of interest and instruction.

siders himself to have made, but which we can hardly suppose to be original with him, that the processes of thinking and of expressing thought in language are entirely independent of each other, and are probably performed in and by different departments of the brain. He has been guided to this conclusion by his experience of the rare malady aphasia, or a loss of the power of expression, while the reasoning faculties continue unimpaired. Several remarkable instances are cited, and the work is in general entitled to respect from its candour and perspicuity. In psychology Professor Jessen is a disciple of Locke.

Dr. E. Askenasy's criticism of the Darwinian theory illustrates the reaction against it in many quarters, not in favour of the doctrine of special creations, but from the growing perception of the inadequacy of the hypothesis of natural selection to explain all the phenomena. Dr. Askenasy's views seem not to differ very materially from those of Mr. St. George Mivart, although the resemblance is to a considerable degree obscured by the writers' fundamental discrepancies in thought and style. He argues forcibly against the derivation of organic existence from a single original germ, admits the theory of spontaneous generation as at least plausible, and considers that the process may still be in operation. Professor Weismann†, regarding the variability of species as established, argues against Moritz Wagner's theory, that it is principally due to the isolation of individual members. He is an entomologist, and his illustrations are principally derived from his own department of scientific research.

"Clear and True"‡, a series of popular geological lectures by Professor Quenstedt, relate especially to the geology of Swabia. They contain nothing original, but set forth the accepted geological doctrines in a very lively style, and are copiously illustrated by wood engravings.

The preface to the collected musical essays of A. W. Ambros§, a well-known musical critic, bespeaks a naive apprehension lest the writer should peradventure be found too entertaining. These essays are in fact pervaded by a Heine-like striving for effect not always quite distinguishable from frivolity; but it is easy to excuse exuberances which are so evidently the mere overflow of an ample reservoir of technical knowledge. There are about twenty essays in the book, all very readable and interesting, and not the less so for numerous sallies of polemical vivacity. The most important, perhaps, are those treating of the romantic career of the Italian master Stradella; of Robert Franz, a lyrical composer little known here, but highly appreciated in Germany; of Wagner, who is assailed with considerable vigour; of Liszt, as a resident in Rome; and of the visits of German musicians to Italy, especially with a view of unearthing the grand old ecclesiastical and operatic music so generally condemned to oblivion by the Italians themselves.

"Curious Stories"||, by T. Piderit, is a little volume of little tales, well conceived for the most part, and promising some substantial literary achievement, but which all fall flat at the last from the author's apparent inability to give them a point. "Souls of Fire"¶, a collection of tales designed to illustrate abnormal psychological conditions and exceptional situations in life, is in general powerfully written, and attains the impressive without falling into the melodramatic. "The Squires of Wendenburg"**, a novel of incident, is on the other hand ostentatiously melodramatic; but, if making no sort of pretension to the refinements of art, is at all events passably entertaining.

Alfred Meissner's Werkherus†† is a narrative poem founded on the legend of a German troubadour who was also, strange to say, a monk, and returned to his convent after a brief and unhappy experience of the world. The tale is told with simplicity and pathos, in powerful language and verse remarkable for harmony. Fluency and harmony also distinguish Adolf von Schack's metrical romance of Lothar‡‡, but the subject seems hardly adapted for poetry. It would have made a good novel with more concentration of interest, and more attention to the delineation of character. The Oriental scenes, sketches from the writer's own experience of travel, are the most attractive portion. The same author's tragedy of "The Pisans"§§, founded on the story of Ugolino, is a meritorious work in respect of polish and elegance of diction, and fidelity in the representation of national manners, but fails in the tragic power requisite for the treatment of so tremendous and revolting a subject. Everybody is far too sensible. The lyrics of P. J. Willatsen* are pretty, musical, and by no means over-weighted with thought.

THE ALABAMA CONTROVERSY.

AS it is ascertained that the latest American despatch will arrive in London early next week, the Ministers probably exercised a sound discretion in declining to answer questions as to their intentions if the answer should prove to be unsatisfactory. It is well known that, in accordance with general expectation, the American Cabinet has adhered to the determination of presenting the indirect claims to the Geneva Tribunal. It is well that Parliament should plainly indicate to the Government the policy in which it represents the universal opinion of the country. There is no reason to distrust the assurances given by Mr. GLADSTONE and Lord GRANVILLE that the Government has never wavered in the decision which was announced on the first night of the Session; and if it is true that the United States positively refuse to withdraw from their false position, it would be almost impossible that the English Ministers should retract. The general anxiety as to their firmness relates to the contingency of some overture on the other side of a compromise which must be necessarily unsatisfactory. An offer to fix a maximum amount, which the Arbitrators should not be entitled to exceed, might possibly have furnished a temptation to statesmen who are naturally solicitous to prevent their Treaty from becoming utterly abortive; but any admission of the principle of the preposterous demands which were invented by Mr. SUMNER would be entirely inconsistent with national self-respect. The original departure from the meaning of the Treaty could in no way justify a proposal that the powers conferred on the Arbitrators should be even partially extended. It would seem that the opinion of the more enlightened classes in the United States differs little from the universal conviction which prevails in England. Even the most determined opponents of concession admit that no serious argument could be urged in favour of the claim on account of the pretended prolongation of the war. The obvious inference that the demand ought to be abandoned is only drawn by politicians of calm judgment, and some cultivation of taste is required to appreciate the ill-bred acrimony of Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS's mischievous invention. It seems to be the popular wish that the whole question should be referred to the Tribunal, in full confidence that the indirect claims would be summarily rejected. It is not surprising that the immediate issue should be misapprehended by careless or imperfectly informed minds. That a litigant who is certain that he is in the right should refuse to abide by an impartial judgment would be unreasonable if human tribunals were infallible; but an appeal to an arbitrator involves the implied possibility that he may decide for either party. If the English Government were to proceed with the reference, protesting at the same time against the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, the Americans would resent more bitterly a refusal to abide by any judgment which might be delivered than a preliminary withdrawal. It must also be remembered that the Arbitrators have the power of awarding a sum in gross for damages; and that they would not be bound to apportion their award between the legitimate and the inadmissible portion of the claims.

The Government judged rightly in preparing and presenting at Geneva the Counter Case which will remain on record as the English answer to a large portion of the American claims. The advantage which the adverse litigant may attempt to take of a further recognition of the authority of the Tribunal would probably have been taught by other means, if the pleadings had terminated at an earlier stage. Neither party was bound to answer the original arguments on the other side, and the American agents might have contended that the English Government had elected to rely on the statement of facts and arguments, and on the doubted weakness of the act of accusation. The second part of the pleadings displays the same contrast which was so remarkable on the former occasion, but the American draughtsman is perhaps a little less vituperative than in the original Case, and the English agent is sometimes forced to express a polite surprise at the preposterous doctrines which are propounded by his opponent. All reference to the indirect claims is properly and carefully excluded from the English answer, but the whole of the first American Case, with the exception of half-a-dozen pages at the end, teems with pretensions only less intolerable than the demand for damages for the prolongation of the war, because they are perhaps not outside the terms of the reference; yet it is difficult to understand how the claims for losses caused by the Sumter and other Confederate vessels fitted out in their own ports can be said to arise from the acts of the Alabama and her consorts. The American agent is apparently unable to understand that the belligerents whom he thinks fit to designate as rebels were, after the issue of the QUEEN'S Proclamation, as fully entitled as the Government of the United States to claim the performance of all neutral duties. In the late European war the German Government attempted, with little success, to introduce into public law the novel element of benevolent neutrality; but it is scarcely necessary to argue that impartiality is not compatible with a practical preference of either belligerent. The English Government, if it had been capriciously or litigiously disposed, might have suggested that many matters besides the indirect claims are submitted to the Arbitrators although they had never been included in the reference. Proofs of the pretended unfairness and ill-will of the English Government are utterly irrelevant to the question of damage arising out of the acts of certain vessels. It would be idle to engage in a controversy whether the English Government wished well or ill to the United States, because the Tribunal has no power to award damages for any kind of feelings. On the assumption that the inquiry may by some possibility still proceed, it would be improper to discuss by anticipation the arguments which really bear on the issue. If American politicians could be induced to study the English Counter Case, they would perhaps be surprised to find how much is to be said against doctrines which they have been accustomed to regard as obvious and unquestionable. It may be fairly asserted that the English agents have done justice to their case; and they have, unlike their opponents, carefully avoided any unnecessary imputations on the conduct and motives of the hostile litigant.

When the English Government has finally retired from the inquiry, the American agents will probably urge on the Tribunal that it is bound to proceed ex parte with the reference. It is a question of secondary interest whether a body of persons whose judicial authority has, according to the English contention, wholly lapsed, will think proper to engage in a laborious and useless investigation. It is possible that the Arbitrators may deem themselves competent to give judgment on the scope of the reference; and it may be presumed that the result of an inquiry into the meaning of the Treaty would be a recognition of the right of England to decline their jurisdiction. If the Tribunal enters into the merits of the question, its award will necessarily be disregarded by the English Government if even the smallest amount of damages is given on account of the direct or indirect claims. A decision absolutely in favour of England would be witnessed with satisfaction; but it would not operate as a settlement of the American dispute. The people and Government of the United States would in such a contingency angrily and stubbornly declare that England was entitled to no benefit from a decision which would not have been acknowledged as valid if it had been of an opposite character. Unless some change takes place in the policy of the United States within a fortnight or three weeks, the Treaty, as far as it provides for the Alabama arbitration, will have utterly and finally failed. The Americans may, if they think fit, agree nevertheless to maintain the other provisions of the Treaty, including the San Juan reference to arbitration and the complicated question of the Canadian fisheries. The English Government having, by no recent fault of its own, failed to settle the main controversy, would gladly set at rest any minor disputes which might otherwise serve as causes of a quarrel; but the Americans would have a right to retire from all the engagements of a Treaty which had in one of its principal provisions unfortunately proved imperative. There can be little doubt that they would prefer to keep all disputed questions open. It was only in consideration of the appointment of the High Commission to treat for the settlement of the Alabama claims that the PRESIDENT consented to negotiate on the Canadian fisheries or on the San Juan boundary. The same motives will induce his Government to withdraw its reference to the German EMPEROR, notwithstanding Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS's courtly professions of admiration for the august Arbitrator. Congress will probably refuse to pass the laws which were necessary to give effect to the Canadian provisions of the Treaty; and thus both parties will be relegated to the position of unfriendly doubt from which they believed themselves to have emerged. It may be hoped that, notwithstanding the menacing peroration of the American Counter Case, there is no immediate danger of a war which would be one of the most grievous of crimes on one part and of misfortunes on both; yet it is impossible not to feel anxiety in the knowledge that a conspirator or a hot-headed fanatic may perpetrate by land or sea some outrage on English subjects or the English flag which it would be impossible to tolerate. A malignant faction in the United States is bent on the forcible annexation of Canada, and the first step to the gratification of its cupidity would be a rupture on any pretext.

THE GOVERNMENT AND MR. FAWCETT.

THE course pursued this week by the Government has occasioned much irritation and excitement. The Daily News was instructed or authorised to publish on Monday morning an alarming manifesto, informing the world that before another Sunday came, a Conservative Government might be in office, with the prospect of a long lease of power. The Cabinet, it was stated, had decided last Saturday to make the carrying of Lord HARTINGTON's Instruction to divide Mr. FAWCETT's Bill into two parts a test of the confidence of the House in the Government, and had resolved that, if beaten, they would resign. Apart from the mode in which they chose to make this announcement, and from their previous treatment of the question of the Dublin University, the Government came to the right conclusion, we think, as to the line they were to take on the matter. They are quite entitled to say that Irish education is a subject which, to be dealt with satisfactorily, must be dealt with by the Government of the day. They are right in opposing Mr. FAWCETT's Bill as a partial and ineffectual method of solving a very difficult problem. They are right in saying that it was impossible for them to take up the large and thorny subject of Irish education this Session. They are also right, if they think proper, in declining to state in detail how they will treat the subject when they do take it up. Further, if they are to defeat Mr. FAWCETT's Bill, they must treat its possible success as a very serious matter, for it secures the assent of a large number of Liberals, and of the majority of the Conservative party; and, if the Government did not make a great point of winning, they would be sure to be defeated. The Government knew that, if left to itself, the House would have rejected Lord HARTINGTON's Instruction. The Bill is at once a Liberal Bill and a Conservative Bill, and is therefore very strongly supported. To oppose it is to incur the reproach with English and Scotch constituencies of being an ally of the Ultramontane clergy; to support it is to clear away religious distinctions, to make a University self-governing to the governing body of which men of all creeds are eligible, and at the same time to give Protestantism a pleasing advantage by letting it start with the actual governing body under its control. No wonder, then, that the Bill is a popular Bill, and that the Government runs great risk in endeavouring to defeat it. It has indeed only one mode of defeating it, and that is by letting it be known that the continuance of the Ministry in office depends on the whole subject of Irish education being left in its hands. The screw must be put on, and the screw has been put on, and effectually. Directly it became known that the Government would go out and that there would be in all probability a dissolution if Lord HARTINGTON's Instruction were not carried, two very powerful agencies began to work in favour of the Ministry. Liberals began to think with terror of losing their seats, of upsetting a Government of their friends, and of letting their enemies triumph. The Opposition also must necessarily have taken it into their consideration whether this was a question on which it would at all suit them to come into office, and we may be quite sure that they would have hesitated greatly before they would have staked their chances of success on the issue of an Irish question. They must mean, if they turn the Ministry out, to come into office, and if they come into office they will have to govern Ireland. Mr. DISRAELI knows how very difficult a business it is to govern Ireland, and he could not be placed in a worse position at the outset of a new Ministerial career than by having to take up the subject of Irish education after it had been made the battle-ground of party, and after circumstances had made its settlement by easy and pacific means almost impossible.

But although the Government was right in getting Mr. FAWCETT's Bill rejected by the only means at its command, the mode in which it has chosen to proceed is open to very serious objections. The whole system of manifestoes through special favoured newspapers is a bad one. A Prime Minister should either say what he has to say in Parliament, or should call his supporters together and explain his views openly and fully to them. Mr. GLADSTONE says that if he had waited till Mr. FAWCETT's Bill came on to state in how very serious a light the Government regarded its possible success, he would have been accused of using a menace. He certainly has not escaped this accusation by uttering his threats through the medium of the Daily News; and if he had candidly explained his mode of regarding the situation when Mr. FAWCETT's Bill came on, he would have so obviously been taking a line which he had a right to take that his party must have listened to his appeal. But he did something more than use a newspaper to make an important communication which he ought to have made himself; he refused to give Mr. FAWCETT an opportunity of trying the very question of the confidence of the House in the Government which he himself had chosen to raise in a most extraordinary way. This was both unfair and impolitic. Mr. GLADSTONE affected to treat the Dublin University Bill like any other Bill brought in by a private member, and told its author that he must get a day for pushing it forward when he could. But he himself had not treated this Bill in anything like the manner in which Bills brought in by private members are ordinarily treated. He had chosen, and properly chosen, to regard it as a very serious matter, so serious that it was necessary that the Government should point out very clearly the consequences which must ensue on their being defeated with regard to it. He threw down a challenge to the Opposition, and to the Liberals who in this matter go with the Opposition, and then seemed afraid to have this challenge accepted. It would have been far simpler and more straightforward to offer every facility for the discussion of what seemed in the eyes of his Cabinet a matter of extreme importance. A night or two would have been lost for the purposes of ordinary business, but he would have placed his Government in a much better position than that which it now occupies. As it is, the menace of resignation on a point which is carefully kept out of discussion has the air of being a general menace on all points of divergence between the Government and its supporters. Last week the Government sustained three severe defeats, and Mr. GLADSTONE is a Minister who does not like being defeated. If he wishes to remind his flock that he has got a rod in his hands, and will use it as he likes and when he likes, he could not have taken a more effectual means than to make a great parade of his intention to resign in the event of his being defeated in a contest which he was secretly determined should never begin. The Liberal members who dread a dissolution—and there are scores of them who do—have had a good fright, which Mr. GLADSTONE may hope will do them good and correct and determine their general behaviour. But this is a great strain to put on the attachment of a party, and even although it may answer for a time, it is sure to engender much bitterness, and to destroy the feelings of pride and confidence with which a leader should endeavour to inspire his supporters. Mr. GLADSTONE, say, if he had let Mr. FAWCETT's Bill come on in the usual manner, and had then explained the views of his Government, would have had an opportunity of indicating in general terms the policy of the Cabinet with regard to Irish education. No one has a right to ask that he should say what is the particular scheme for dealing with this subject which he may think the best. A Government should never pledge itself to details unless it puts them into the shape of a Bill. But the general principles on which a Government is prepared to treat a great question may be, and ought to be, indicated. If Mr. GLADSTONE had convinced Parliament and the country that he meant to deal with Irish education on just and liberal principles, accepting all that is good in what now exists, and having due regard to the religious feelings of the people without truckling to the Ultramontane clergy, and had then shown the shortcomings of Mr. FAWCETT's Bill, he would have easily satisfied his party and the country that the whole subject had better be left in his hands and stand over until the time had arrived to treat it effectually, should he then be in office.

The main question at issue between Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. FAWCETT led to the discussion of two subsidiary points of some importance. It was said that the manner in which the Government had treated a Bill brought in by a private member made all efforts at such legislation impossible. If every Bill which the Government disapproves is to be snuffed out by the Government threatening to resign unless it is withdrawn, it cannot be worth while for any one except a member of the Government to try to bring in a Bill. There does not seem to be much foundation for this criticism. Bills brought in by private members are, speaking generally, only useful to a very limited extent. They are useful sometimes in order to air a new subject; sometimes to prepare the way for Government action by testing how the House regards a matter of minor importance; sometimes to get a subject on which the two Houses are not in accord debated in both, without the Government being defeated if the Bill is rejected by the Lords. As a general rule they may be regarded as hints for legislation submitted to the Government and the country to see what is thought of them. So long as they do not interfere too much with the course of public business they are convenient instruments for keeping up the freshness of political interest, and of bringing contributions from various quarters to the materials for political thought. It is the business for the Ministry to make the most of the conveniences, and to prevent as much as possible the inconveniences, that attend them. On the whole this is done by most Ministries with a tolerable degree of success, although, as more work is every year thrown on the Government, there is a growing determination on the part of Ministers to let Bills brought in by private members take up as little time as possible. Every now and then, however, there is a private member's Bill which affects to take out of the hands of the Ministry a subject of great importance with which it proposes itself to deal, and then the Ministry has to consider whether it can allow this to be done. If, as in the case of Mr. FAWCETT's Bill, it decides that it must keep the subject under its own control, it has to regard this Bill in an exceptional manner, and get it defeated by the exercise of extraordinary power. The mass of Bills proposed by private members are in no danger of being treated as Mr. FAWCETT's Bill has been treated, because they do not present at all the same difficulties to the Government. On the other hand, there is equally little force in an objection made to Mr. FAWCETT that he was playing into the hands of the Opposition. If members of the Liberal party are to have any independence of thought and action, they must be allowed to give hints for legislation without too curiously inquiring whether the Government will disapprove, or the Opposition tender their support. If Mr. FAWCETT thinks that he has hit on the right mode of treating Dublin University, he is not to be blamed for submitting it to Parliament on the ground that Dr. BALL happens to be his way of thinking. Exactly the same reproach was brought against the Government during the passing of the Education Act. If neither a Liberal Ministry nor independent Liberal members were ever to support anything which Conservatives supported, the consequence would be that the Liberal party would be entirely under the control of the Government, and the Government would be entirely under the control of the extreme members of the Liberal party. Nothing could be more disastrous to a party which proposes to itself to be at once popular, practical, and progressive, and few members of the Liberal party have done more than Mr. FAWCETT has done to prevent it from assuming a character as unworthy of it.

GERMANY AND FRANCE.

REPORTS were circulated a few days ago that Prince BISMARCK was most seriously displeased with the utterances of M. THIERS, that the Germans were afraid a French war of revenge was going to begin at once, and that an order had been sent from Berlin to Versailles commanding the French to lay aside such wild notions and behave with proper modesty and submission. Shortly afterwards it was discovered that Count ARNIM, the supposed bearer of this message, had not left Berlin, and the official journals of France and Germany loudly contradicted the whole story. It is impossible to discover whether a newspaper Correspondent, anxious to achieve notoriety for himself and his employers, bases sensational telegrams on a minute fraction of fact or on no facts whatever. The general and public relations of the countries about the policy of which reports are spread is much the best guide in testing the probability or improbability of what is alleged. No doubt M. THIERS a short time ago seemed inclined to stimulate the military ardour of his countrymen, and to encourage them with the hope that they would soon have a large and well organized army at their disposal. In a moment of great financial embarrassment he has also thought it wise to increase, rather than to diminish, the military expenditure of France. But the French, not the Germans, are the persons entitled to object to a policy which threatens to draw them from the consideration of what it is primarily necessary for them to do in the present very painful position of their country, and which seriously increases the enormous burden of their taxation. So long as they fulfil their engagements to Germany, that is all that Germany has a right to look for at their hands. Prince BISMARCK has over and over again declared that Germany has no claim to meddle in the internal affairs of France, or to keep her permanently humiliated. If France does but pay a hundred and twenty millions sterling more, she is perfectly free to arrange her taxation and organize her army as she pleases. The raising of this huge sum is a matter of deep interest and difficulty to the French Government, but it is entirely for the French Government to decide how it shall be done. It may be wise to put the country in good spirits, and to fascinate it with the hope of being at an early date as strong in a military point of view as it ever was, in order that it may cheerfully make the efforts and bear the sacrifices which the raising of the rest of the German indemnity will require. If there was the slightest reason to suppose that the French Government had no real intention of paying the promised sum, and was seeking in a new war the means of escaping from it, Germany would of course have a right to remonstrate, and, in case of need, to act, in order to secure what is due to her. But the French Government is notoriously doing everything it possibly can to pay the remainder of the indemnity long before it is due. There is, indeed, only one ground on which Prince BISMARCK may have thought himself justified in whispering a word of caution to M. THIERS. It is exceedingly desirable for both countries that the relations between the conquerors and the conquered in the occupied districts should not be rendered more painful and perilous than they are now, and if the French Government were supposed to be encouraging the French people to speak and think of a war of revenge, the population of the occupied districts might be stimulated to words and deeds against the German soldiery which would necessitate very severe and hostile measures in return. Possibly a representation to this effect may have been made by the German Government, but Prince BISMARCK knows perfectly well what he is and what he is not entitled to ask, and he is not at all likely to have issued an edict forbidding France to do anything which by the Treaty she is at perfect liberty to do.

When the indemnity has been paid in full, the French army will be raised, organized, equipped, paid, and stationed exactly as France may think best, and Germany will not have a word to say. When the armies of two neighbouring countries have acquired what may be termed their normal position, a change in that position is generally thought a ground for inquiry as to the motives of the Government which thus shows that it has some new designs to work out. If Russia were to place her army suddenly on a war footing, and hurry large bodies of troops into Poland, and draw them up on the German frontier, the Court of Berlin would naturally and properly ask what was meant by this strange and alarming conduct. But the French army has not as yet got a normal position, although, when the proper time comes, it will of course proceed to have this. France will settle for herself how many troops she likes to keep on a war footing, how they shall be armed, and where they shall be placed. It will be absolutely necessary for France to employ a great portion of her military strength to protect herself against Germany, and the Germans have no right to object to this. The most furious German will allow that France has a clear right to make any preparation she pleases to protect herself against a German attack. But now that Metz is in German hands, the military preparations needed to make France tolerably safe against such an attack will be of a very extensive kind. New fortresses will have to be built, and large garrisons formed at no great distance from the frontier. There is no help for this. Germany may at first be disquieted by seeing the military strength of France turned in a direction that seems to point to a renewal of hostilities, and nervous persons and alarmists and sensational telegraphists will find abundant opportunities of discovering that things look very serious, and that the war of revenge is going to begin in twenty-four hours. But the Germans have in the main quite sense enough to see that they must put up with the consequences of having taken Metz and driven France behind the Vosges. They have taken away the French frontier because they considered it a useful, serviceable frontier, and thought they should like it themselves. They have forced France to make a new frontier, and the very object of all their efforts has been to deprive France of the possibility of having a frontier nearly so good for military purposes as that which Germany now possesses. But France will, they must be aware, try to make the best of the bad frontier she has got; and, in order not to be wholly at the mercy of Germany, France will have to make very elaborate and expensive preparations, to employ the services of a great many men, to spend a vast amount of money, to think much and to work hard. Metz, it must be remembered, is the key of Eastern France, and this key is in the hands of the enemy. In order to get this commanding situation, Germany thought it worth while to face the certainty of the bitter hostility of France for years to come, the anxiety of holding in permanent subjugation an unquestionably French population, and the reproaches of a large portion of Europe. France, having lost the key of her Eastern provinces, and seeing her enemy in a position of such extreme advantage, cannot fail to wish that, if she cannot have the excellent defence on the East that she once had, she shall have the best that ingenuity and perseverance and courage and money can give her. Not only, therefore, has Germany no title whatever to complain of the military arrangements now being made in France, so long as the position of Germany in the occupied districts is not made worse, and so long as the indemnity is paid at the stipulated time; but, after she has got her money and her troops are gone home, she is bound to bear with equanimity the spectacle of France making great military preparations of a defensive kind on her immediate border.

If Germany can keep calm while France is doing all that she has a right to do, the rest of Europe will learn to read alarmist reports with serene indifference. That Germany will for a number of years, to which no limit can be assigned, have to make counter preparations, and to think constantly of a new war, and provide against it, is obvious. This was the state of things to which Germany looked forward, and which she deliberately chose as better for herself than foregoing Metz and the frontier of the Vosges. With that frontier, and with such a fortress as Metz, Germany calculated on being able to defy France for the future. If this was a wise choice and a prudent calculation, the vague projects of a war of revenge, which fill so naturally the French mind, have nothing in them disquieting to Germany. The French will get together a large army; so will the Germans; the French will buy the best guns, select the best generals, train their men in the best way; so will the Germans. Unless some unforeseen cause, the very nature of which cannot be imagined, interferes to give France an unlooked-for superiority, the end of all the efforts that France can possibly make will be that she will have a very large and very good army in a bad position, and Germany would have a very large and very good army in a good position. No position that France can secure will in the least equal that held by Germany; but it will be necessary for France, unless she is again to court a crushing defeat, to have a position tolerably good. In order to attain such a position she must labour perseveringly for years. The Germans have now, it is said, an army the nominal strength of which is a million and a half of men. They are devoting unceasing efforts and boundless stores of French money to equipping, training, and arming this army in the most perfect manner that experience can suggest or science devise. They have the advantage of being commanded by the greatest general of modern times, and, when they lose him, they will at least have the advantage of being commanded by men brought up in his school, and accustomed to act under his guidance. Lastly, with a vast array of fortresses as a second line of defence, they hold Metz and the Vosges frontier. Add these things together, and they make a total which shows how enormous is the task that France has to encounter if she wishes to be on anything like an equality with Germany. The Belgians might as well try to take Metz as the French until the whole military force of France is totally altered from what it is now. That some such change may not some day occur is what no one can venture to say. But it is very easy to underrate the difficulties that lie in the way of such a change. France is at present in sore perplexity how to take the first step towards it. Far from having an army at all likely to take Metz, the French cannot as yet determine what a French army ought to be. M. THIERS does not at all like the discussion of the subject in the Chamber. He has asked that it may be put off for three weeks, and has declared that there are several points on which he thinks quiet discussion with a Committee far preferable to open discussion before the Assembly. A large party in the Assembly wishes that every Frenchman should be made to fight, and that there should be a new army in France after the Prussian pattern. M. THIERS, and probably the majority of the Assembly, think that the old system is the best, and that there should be special people whose business it is to fight. Both parties, when they talk of the army of the future, think of it quite as much with reference to the exigencies of internal politics as with reference to a war of revenge. It is impossible for sensible Germans to be much alarmed at present, when such is the state of things in France; and they may be sure that Prince BISMARCK knows his business and theirs too well to be making useless demonstrations merely to show his importance and to fill his country with anxiety.

PROTESTANT ALARMS AND CATHOLIC GRIEVANCES.

NEITHER Mr. NEWDEGATE'S Bill for the vexation of monks and nuns, nor Sir COLMAN O'LOUGHLIN'S Religious Disabilities Bill, is a measure of vital importance; but toleration is, as it deserves to be, at present more in fashion than persecution. The Roman Catholics have of late years, through the prevalence of a policy hateful to their Church, got rid of all but one or two of the traces of the suspicion with which they were formerly regarded by the nation and the Legislature. Notwithstanding the imprudent resistance of the late Lord DERBY, the distinctive oaths which were imposed at the date of Catholic Emancipation were abolished several years ago. In the last Session the silly Act which was passed during the Papal Aggression panic was, after several abortive attempts, repealed. It is now as lawful for a man to assume a clerical title to which he has no legal right as to call himself a Count or a Baron, or to designate himself as "The 'MULLIGAN,'" or "The O'TOOLE"; yet, carefully looking round for a religious grievance, Sir COLMAN O'LOUGHLIN has discovered that a Roman Catholic can neither be Lord Chancellor of Great Britain nor Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. In the Bill by which he proposes to remove the disability he takes the opportunity of including a clause for the exemption of religious orders from the penalties to which they are nominally subject. Only the most furious Protestants would approve of a prosecution under the existing law of a Jesuit or a Dominican, but to some minds a legislative protest against a practice or institution of which they disapprove furnishes a strange consolation. It is pleasant to think that a monk is at the mercy of a common informer, although no one dreams of enforcing the law. It was by a singular coincidence that the House of Commons found itself in two successive sittings engaged in the discussion of monastic and conventual establishments. Ordinary Englishmen regard ascetic communities of men bound by irrevocable vows with a contemptuous repugnance which is a better security than any law against the spread of religious Orders. The sentimental classes draw a distinction, which is not altogether unfounded, between monks and nuns. The involuntary recognition of the inequality of the sexes which defies all the efforts of advocates of the rights of women encourages the opinion that an unwise and narrowing mode of life is less discreditable to the weaker sex. On the other hand, Mr. NEWDEGATE himself would perhaps allow that a full-grown monk stands less in need of legal protection than a helpless girl who has been coerced or frightened into the adoption of the so-called religious life. The Jesuits are especially regarded by the zealous Protestant rather with terror than with compassion. The superhuman craft which they are supposed to possess, their strict discipline, and their steady prosecution of the objects of their association, command a certain kind of respect. There is perhaps a certain resemblance between the celebrated Order and the more modern organizations which, like the International Society, are engaged in a permanent conspiracy against law and secular government. The Jesuits have for the present at their disposal a more effective instrument than the force of any revolutionary club. The Pope is, unless he is greatly belied, habitually guided in his spiritual and temporal policy by the Order which has from the first devoted itself to the aggrandizement of the Holy See; but it is at Rome, and not in England, that the Jesuits exercise the power which renders them troublesome or formidable.

Mr. NEWDEGATE is once more engaged in the task of trying to deprive English convents of the trust funds which may have been given or bequeathed for their support. The whole amount is probably trifling, but the secrecy which is maintained by the trustees and beneficiaries especially moves Mr. NEWDEGATE's curiosity and indignation. The trust funds are in the hands of persons in whose honour their co-religionists feel a confidence which is probably seldom misplaced; but an enemy of the system ought to find gratification in the possible risks to which monastic property is exposed. The patience of the Committee which investigated a part of the question in 1871 was exhausted by the fruitless pertinacity of Mr. NEWDEGATE's questions and cross-examinations; but it would be unreasonable to expect that he should be convinced of his error in persisting against the unanimous remonstrance of his colleagues. His present Bill, as he must be well aware, will never be passed into a law; but it for the moment frees a righteous soul of its burden, and it possesses the additional merit of having annoyed a few Irish members. There would have been much excuse for a rejection of the Bill in the first instance, especially when the proposer delivered an elaborate speech on the motion for leave to bring in the Bill; but ultimately Mr. NEWDEGATE had his way, and, if he is fortunate, he will have one more opportunity of repeating his charges against religious Orders. Even the imaginary wealth of English convents is less obnoxious to their assailant than the moral coercion to which their inmates are perhaps exposed. It is not easy to understand the bearing of a story of a German, falsely reported to be dead, who had some difficulty in tracing his daughter to a convent. An Englishman in similar circumstances might have adopted precisely the same course with equal facilities for reclaiming the fugitive, if she were willing to return home, or if she was a minor. The well-known case of a nun who refused to leave a religious life which she disliked, through fear of the disapproval of her friends and family, offers no proof of intimidation. The same kind of moral pressure is constantly applied to the relations of secular life, as when a young woman is deterred from a marriage of disparagement by the knowledge that the gratification of her own impulse will be followed by a separation from her family; but there is no use in arguing against impressions which have been proof against argument through a long and respectable life.

Sir COLMAN O'LOUGHLIN's Bill has naturally excited the alarm of a body called the Protestant Alliance. As the Secretary remarks, in a little pamphlet published on behalf of the Society:—"The question is no longer whether a fugitive 'Popemay, as a private person, find refuge in free England, but whether the Papacy itself is to be imported into the British Empire, and whether the people and Government of this country, hitherto Protestant, shall for the future 'be Popish—with all that history teaches—that means, 'priestly tyranny, superstition and national death.' The English nation is about to be converted to Popery, partly by the removal of the chains which fetter the activity of the Jesuits and other religious Orders, but chiefly in consequence of the frightful proposal that Roman Catholics should become eligible for the offices of Lord Chancellor of Great Britain and Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. Priestly tyranny, superstition, and national death would already have overspread the land if Lord HATHORLEY, Lord WATSON, or Lord STANLEY had unhappily professed the Roman Catholic faith. It happens, indeed, that an eminent member of the Roman Church is at this moment Lord Chancellor of Ireland, not perhaps to the satisfaction of the Protestant Alliance; but even before the passing of the Disestablishment Bill, the Irish Church possessed no ecclesiastical patronage, whereas some hundreds of livings, and half-a-dozen canonries, are in the gift of the English Chancellor. The Bill indeed contains a clause by which a Roman Catholic Chancellor is directed of the ecclesiastical patronage of his office, which is to be administered by a Judge of the Superior Courts; but it is hardly necessary to say that the craft of the Jesuits and their disciples would be equal to the evasion of any restrictive enactment. The Lord-Lieutenant has no longer a vicarage to bestow; but there is a more plausible case against the appointment of a Roman Catholic to the government of Ireland than to the promotion of a Roman Catholic lawyer to the wool-sack. Many years ago a liberal-minded Minister sent a zealous Roman Catholic to govern a colonial community which was deeply attached to the same religious persuasion. The consequence was an undue deference to clerical instigation, and a temporary aggravation of sectarian animosity. A wise Minister would take care that a Roman Catholic Lord-Lieutenant was, like a layman in France or Italy, entirely indifferent to the approval or censure of Cardinal CULLEN or any other spiritual authority. At the worst the Lord-Lieutenant is less powerful than the Irish Secretary, and he is under the orders of the Home Secretary; nor is there any law against the tenure of either or both offices by a Roman Catholic. The Lord Chancellor appoints a certain number of incumbents, but the Prime Minister, who makes bishops and deans, may hold any religious opinions which he prefers. Mr. WHALLEY, indeed, periodically accuses Mr. GLADSTONE of being a Roman Catholic, if not a Jesuit in disguise. It is hardly worth while to affront susceptible Roman Catholics by the maintenance of an arbitrary and isolated disability. The expediency of raising the question at the present moment is more questionable than the justice of the measure; but perhaps the Roman Catholics are the best judges of the importance which may be attached to the slightest badge of inferiority. A more solid and far more irremediable hardship consists in the obstinate prejudice of English and Scotch constituencies against Roman Catholic candidates. Several Jews occupy seats in Parliament without discredit to themselves or disadvantage to their constituencies, and one of them is a law officer of the Crown. Since the Papal aggression of 1851 only one Roman Catholic has represented an independent constituency in Great Britain. The exclusion of Roman Catholic lawyers from Parliament greatly diminishes their chance of rising to the wool-sack.

THE RE-OPENING OF THE FRENCH ASSEMBLY.

THE settlement of the order of business is not a matter about which the French Assembly usually gives itself much trouble. It is quite content that M. THIERS should play the part of the householder in the Gospel, and bring out of his treasury things new or old at his pleasure. On Tuesday the PRESIDENT had an additional claim on the forbearance and confidence of the Chamber. He was suffering from a cold caught in the service of his country during the recess. But the rumoured ill-feeling between the French and German Governments roused the Assembly to something like interest as to the place which M. THIERS meant to give to the Army Bill. The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR urged the superior importance of the new taxes and of the reorganization of the Council of State. M. GAMBETTA insisted that nothing so much concerned France as her military reorganization. The PRESIDENT thought it necessary to mount the tribune in person in order to answer M. GAMBETTA. He alleged three reasons why it was essential that the Army Bill should be postponed. In the first place, the Government and the Committee were not yet agreed on the details of the measure, and a little delay might lead to their becoming agreed. In the next place, if the disagreement between them should remain, there were political reasons why the issue should be fought out three weeks hence rather than now. In the third place, he would have to make a speech, perhaps many speeches, and nobody could expect him to speak with a cold in the head. There was ample matter for speculation in this mysterious little statement; but where very simple reasons exist for the postponement which M. THIERS desires, it is needless to go far afield in search of others. The cold in his head, of course, is not a simple reason, for it has long been a maxim of politics that statesmen are never ill without a purpose. But at this moment it would have been difficult to carry on the discussion of the Army Bill without some reference to the recent rumours. Whether this reference had taken the form of direct questions addressed to the Government, or of declamation against the attitude supposed to be assumed by Germany, would not have made much difference to M. THIERS. An excited Assembly is the worst possible partner in the conduct of negotiations which, however much their importance may have been exaggerated, must still require delicate handling. Three weeks hence M. THIERS may be able to report favourably of the intentions of the German Government as regards the evacuation of the occupied departments, and to provide food for patriotic enthusiasm in the shape of a new loan. The reference to the difference still existing between the Government and the Committee was probably made in perfect good faith. M. THIERS holds very firmly by an idea which he has once taken up, and his interest in military affairs is second only—if it be second—to his interest in politics. He may be trusted to fight to the last against the proposal of the Committee to abolish substitutes and to make personal service universal and compulsory. It is not likely that he will succeed, because upon this question the Right will be reinforced by the Left, and the President will not be able to play off one part of the Chamber against the other. The Assembly and M. THIERS are equally anxious to have a strong army, and probably are not much at variance as to the use they hope to make of it. But the Assembly can wait with more patience than M. THIERS, inasmuch as many of the deputies are young, and those that are not young are not impulsive. It is quite possible to have a sincere wish for the rehabilitation of your country, and at the same time to prefer that your sons rather than yourself should be the instruments appointed for the work. When the Israelites were in the Desert, some of the old men may have accepted with pious equanimity the forty years' respite which denied them a share in the conquest of Canaan. Nor can M. GAMBETTA be blamed if, believing that an army organized on the Prussian system will in the long run make France more powerful than any other, he is not sorry that by the time the new army is ready the power of directing its operations may have passed from M. THIERS to himself. Upon the need of an army there is a remarkable agreement between all sections of the Assembly. There have been some symptoms during the week of a wish—to be traced perhaps to Bonapartist inspiration—to breed discord between M. THIERS and the Republicans by representing him as designing the army for no other purpose than to keep the French people in order. Fortunately no such intention seems to be attributed to the President by the Left.

The hatred of M. GAMBETTA displayed on all occasions by the French Conservatives is neither creditable nor intelligible. Even so grave and moderate an organ as the Journal des Débats cannot speak of him with its usual composure. The one part of the war which did any honour to France was the part which was mainly organized by M. GAMBETTA's energy. He found the nation prostrated by the capitulation of Sedan, and he undertook to raise it up again. It was impossible that any man should not make great mistakes in compassing a task of this magnitude, and M. GAMBETTA's temperament naturally tended to exaggerate such mistakes. But the work he had in hand was one which needed something more than coolness and judgment, and though it would have been better if these virtues could have been combined with those which he actually possessed, it is hardly fair to blame a politician because he does not exhibit in his own person a union of qualities which is not seen once in a century. After every deduction has been made from M. GAMBETTA's reputation, it must still be set down to his honour that he did not despair of France when there was every apparent reason to do so, and that by an extraordinary effort he succeeded in giving her a chance of retrieving her position, which, small as it may have been, seemed absolutely unattainable when he descended from his balloon at Tours. It is a strange complaint in the mouth of a Frenchman that M. GAMBETTA was not content to let Sedan be the last act of the war. It is possible, no doubt, that better terms might have been obtained then than were to be had six months later. But the increasing severity of the German conditions as the war went on is in a great measure accounted for by the fact that, under M. GAMBETTA's guidance, France showed herself a more formidable enemy than the Germans had at first supposed. If the nation had sat down contentedly after Sedan, and acquiesced in a moderate loss of territory and a moderate penalty in money, there would have been good ground for supposing that its spirit had really been broken by twenty years of Imperialism. The campaigns on the Loire and in the North were conclusive evidence of the falsehood of this theory. Though military training and military resources were both wanting, there was no lack of military spirit. The new recruits who followed CHANZY and FAIDHERBE wanted only a little breathing space and one chance gleam of victory to make them good soldiers. The French Conservatives must have forgotten these facts, or they would never speak of M. GAMBETTA as the author of a great part of the misfortunes of France, and confound in a common condemnation the man who began the war and the men who continued it.

As regards M. GAMBETTA's Parliamentary conduct, the worst that can be said of it is that he rarely speaks. Considering how fluent an orator he is, it argues considerable self-restraint that he has been able to play this part. It is the fashion with the Right to attribute this self-restraint to a conscious incapacity for practical politics, but it is more charitable and probably truer to set it down to a desire not to embarrass the Government. M. GAMBETTA's Republicanism is of a different type from that of M. THIERS, but if he believes M. THIERS to be genuinely determined to establish the Republic, he may fairly be anxious not to impede this process by giving needless publicity to the distinction. His latest offence in the eyes of the Right is his telling the people of Angers and Havre that the Assembly no longer represents the country. To English ears this seems a very mild sentiment indeed. The same thing is said of the present House of Commons in every Conservative newspaper. Even in France there is no way of punishing M. GAMBETTA for giving utterance to this terrible doctrine; but the mayors of the two towns are public functionaries, and as such they can be censured for having anything to do with party demonstrations except such as are got up by the Government for the time being. This minimum of condemnation M. RAOUL DUVAL has succeeded in extracting from M. LEFRANC. Henceforth mayors may say that the present Assembly represents the country better than any other that could be elected either now or at any future time, without being considered to have transgressed the limits of political impartiality. But if they hint that the composition of an Assembly elected for a special purpose and under special circumstances can be improved upon when the purpose has been accomplished and the circumstances have changed, they will be set down as wanting in respect for law and order. When M. THIERS finds the Assembly impracticable, M. LEFRANC's reading of a mayor's duties will perhaps be somewhat modified.

MR. CANDLISH'S MOTION.

THE Secularist party in the House of Commons made a strangely poor appearance on Tuesday night. In point of mere numbers, indeed, they have gained slightly during the past six weeks. The minority in favour of Mr. DIXON's motion on the 5th of March was 94; the minority in favour of Mr. CANDLISH's motion was 115. But the precise figures of a minority are not of much importance until there is something like an approach to an equal balance of parties. What is of importance is the grasp the speakers have of their subject, and the evidence they give of having forecast the consequences of their arguments. It is when these qualities are looked for that the debate of Tuesday comes out so badly. Mr. DIXON was not so much bound to possess them when he brought forward his Resolution on the character and working of the Education Act. He did not propose to repeal or alter any of the clauses; he aimed only at giving the Government an instruction as to the spirit in which they should address themselves to the work. But Mr. CANDLISH had a more ambitious end in view. He asked the House of Commons to strike out an important section from the Act, and the least that was to be expected of him was that he should state how he proposed to meet the difficulties created by such a step, or the reasons he had for thinking that the anticipated difficulties would not arise. So far as his speech went, the 25th clause of the Education Act might be so much mere surplusage. For example, it never seems to have occurred to Mr. CANDLISH that the 25th clause and the 14th clause must stand or fall together. It is not in human nature that A. should go on making payments to a school in which B.'s religion is taught, after B. has refused to make any payments to a school in which A.'s religion is taught. Yet this is precisely what would happen if a rate continued to be exacted from the Denominationalists by the managers of School Board schools, after it had been made illegal to pay any part of the rate to the managers of Denominational schools. In this respect Mr. CANDLISH is less consistent than Mr. DIXON. The motion of the 5th of March did propose to amend the Education Act, not only because it allows School Boards to pay the fee in Denominational schools, but also because it "permits School Boards to use the money of the ratepayers for the purpose of supporting denominational schools." "gives instruction in schools established by local boards." Mr. CANDLISH dropped all reference to this latter grievance, and mainly suggested that the Roman Catholic ratepayer should continue to be taxed for the maintenance of Protestant schools after the Protestant ratepayer had refused to be taxed, not for the maintenance of Roman Catholic schools, but for the secular instruction of poor children attending Roman Catholic schools. The logical consequence, therefore, of his motion must have been the withdrawal of the liberty at present conceded to local Boards to give religious instruction in the schools they establish. We said in 1870 that this coexistence of voluntary schools teaching whatever religion they pleased, and of rate-supported schools giving only secular instruction, would have furnished the best attainable solution of the religious difficulty. But no one who is not blind to the clearest evidence of the course of popular sentiment can fail to see that even this partial recognition of secularism would have had no chance with Parliament or with the country. Mr. CANDLISH can hardly suppose that it would be more acceptable now than it was two years ago.

Those who spoke in defence of the motion were equally silent upon another important aspect of the question. Before long there will be some thousands of School Boards in existence, a large proportion of which will have undertaken to enforce the attendance at school of the children within their jurisdiction. In many cases the school accommodation already provided will be so nearly sufficient that the addition of one School Board school to the voluntary schools already in being will meet the wants of the case. This new school will of course be built either where the population is densest or where voluntary zeal has been least energetic. But in every considerable district there may be children whose parents are too poor to pay for their schooling, living in parts of the district where, owing to the abundant provision of voluntary schools, there is no call whatever for a School Board school. As these children are to be made to go to school, the cost of their schooling must be paid by the School Board. So long as the 25th clause remains in force no difficulty arises. The parents are ordered to send their children to the nearest voluntary school, and the Board pays the school fees to the managers. If the 25th clause were rescinded, the School Board would no longer be able to do this. The only way in which it could take upon itself the cost of a child's education would be to remit in its favour the fees charged at the School Board school. But in the part of the district where these children live there may be no School Board school, and, what is more, there may be none wanted. Either, therefore, the School Board must build an unnecessary school for the sole use of half-a-dozen children, or it must insist upon their being sent to its own school three miles off, though there may be a voluntary school within a few doors of them. As this difficulty has been repeatedly commended to the notice of the opponents of the 25th clause, and as they continue to take no notice of it, it must be supposed that Mr. CANDLISH and his friends see no objection to its being dealt with in one or other of these ways. In that case they cannot be complimented on their political foresight. What chance the Education Act would have in country districts when it was discovered that, in order to work it, the ratepayers would have to build schools and provide teachers where there was already a sufficient supply of both, may easily be guessed by those who have marked the increasing strength of the opposition to local taxation of all kinds. In such a case as has been suggested a School Board which built a school of its own in a part of the district where, except for the religious difficulty, there would be no need of a school, would have no chance whatever of re-election; and if there were many such instances, the clamour which would be raised against the Act would be such as to command the attention of the House of Commons, unless the Government found means to silence it by some measure of administrative relaxation. But even the feeling thus excited would be manageable in comparison with the wrath of mothers compelled to send their shoeless children three miles in snow or rain—passing perhaps three voluntary schools on their journey—because the School Board was forbidden to pay for their being taught reading and writing by a Denominational schoolmaster. A grievance like this well worked, and supported by a few opportune cases of actual hardship, would defeat any Act of Parliament. No majority would submit to have a great practical inconvenience imposed on them to gratify the groundless scruples of a minority. For it must always be remembered that we have to do with scruples which, however honest they may be, are still essentially illogical. There can be no more objection to a School Board buying secular instruction from the managers of a Denominational school because they also sell religious instruction, than there is to their buying paper and pens from a Denominational bookseller because he also sells prayer-books. A School Board has the best possible means of finding out what is the lowest sum at which the elements of secular knowledge can be taught to a child, because it knows what it costs to teach him in its own school. So long, therefore, as the fees paid to the voluntary school are no higher than would be charged in the School Board school, there is an absolute certainty that there will be no balance left over. The cost of such religious instruction as may be given in the voluntary school must be defrayed out of some other source than the pence contributed by the School Board. As yet the feeling of the ratepayers in many places is rather against the payment of fees, as being the only way of expending the school-rate with which they have become acquainted. When they learn that the choice lies, not between spending it in this way and not spending it at all, but between spending it in this way and spending a much larger rate in another way, they will subject these costly scruples to a very narrow scrutiny. If the agitators against the 25th clause are well advised, they will look out for some better evidence than the fees paid for secular instruction at a Denominational school are really paid for religious instruction than they have yet thought fit to adduce. When they can construct a plausible proof of this position, they may come forward with some chance of success. In the meantime it is not too much to ask them to allow religious animosities to go unfanned for a year or two, in order that such educational machinery as the Act provides may at least have a trial. It is not too much to ask of them, yet it seems to be more than there is any chance of their conceding. They seem to have forgotten that the object of educational legislation is to teach reading and writing, not to set barriers in the way of teaching religion. To insist on making the Act of 1870 do the latter work would be to incapacitate it from doing the former in the very cases where it is most needed. Is it quite incompatible with freedom of conscience to separate the two objects, and to allow the nation to pursue the one while the Secularists pursue the other?

CUBAN NEGROES AND ROUMANIAN JEWS.

A WEEK ago the House of Commons devoted the greater part of an evening to debates on the misgovernment of two remote foreign countries. A perfectly wise Parliament would carefully abstain from discussing matters beyond the range of its legislative power and political authority; but there is some excuse for occasional deviations from the strict rule of reticence, especially as motions such as those of Mr. HUGHES and Sir F. GOLDSMID have of late years gradually become rarer. The profound modification of the policy of England within less than twenty years has in some instances failed to modify the habits of thought which were familiar to a former generation. The Crimean war was the last practical expression of principles which had never been questioned during the long peace which followed the settlement of 1815. It was understood at home and abroad to be the right and duty of England not only to aid in maintaining the balance of power, but as far as possible to correct tyranny and oppression in all parts of the world. Interference with the prosecution of the slave trade was more especially justified by the treaties which had been concluded with various Powers at a time when English influence was paramount in Europe. The enthusiasm which had been roused by WILBERFORCE and CLARKSON survived their personal activity; and it was largely shared by the statesmen who had in their earlier years taken part in abolition and in emancipation. Lord ABERDEEN, Lord JOHN RUSSELL, and Lord PALMERSTON uniformly and earnestly exerted themselves to suppress the slave trade both by diplomatic influence and by material force; nor was their sympathy, whether theoretical or active, restricted to the wrongs suffered by negroes. In Italy, in Poland, and in Turkey Lord PALMERSTON on all occasions protested against injustice and tyranny. One of the speakers in the recent debates quoted a sentiment of Lord PALMERSTON's to the effect that opinion would ultimately prevail over armed force; but it referred to the opinion of a country which in his time had not publicly avowed the doctrine of non-intervention. There is no reason to suppose that English opinion will now be greatly regarded either by Spain or by the semi-barbarous provinces which acknowledge the precarious sovereignty of the Porte; and it would be unjust to blame philanthropic politicians who, actuated by generous impulses, repeat in altered circumstances the warnings which once had a practical meaning.

The propriety of the motion on Cuba, or rather of Mr. HUGHES's speech, was more questionable than the justice of Sir F. GOLDSMID's remonstrance against the scandalous outrages perpetrated in Roumania. Although the treaty for the repression of the slave trade was in former times constantly and openly violated with the connivance of the Colonial Government of Cuba, Lord ENFIELD was able to state that during the last five years no cargoes of slaves have been landed on the island. With the extinction of the slave trade disappears the English right of intervention. Nor is it even for the interest of the negro population that Spanish pride should be enlisted on the side of slavery. The system which was maintained in the English colonies till 1834, and in the United States till 1864, must be assumed to involve no violation of international law. The English Government never affected to have a right of protesting against American slavery, either during the long-continued supremacy of the party which defended the system, or when Mr. LINCOLN offered to the seceding States the strongest guarantees for the perpetual maintenance of their favourite institution. It is not because Spain is less formidable than the United States that the dignity of a friendly and independent Government should be infringed even by a censorious speech in the House of Commons. It is true that the American Minister in Spain has been repeatedly instructed to urge the more rapid emancipation of the slaves in Cuba; but if the Government of Washington has no right to interfere in the internal affairs of Cuba, it possesses a power of countenancing the rebellion and of promoting separation which renders its philanthropic sympathies at the same time suspicious and effective. It is not desirable that England, which has neither the ability nor the desire to dismember the Spanish dominions, should incur useless odium by verbal criticisms on the domestic policy of a foreign State. Mr. HUGHES and Serjeant SIMON, who seems to have been acquainted with Cuba for forty years, were not content with the traditional task of advocating the cause of negro slaves. They also took under their patronage the emigrants from China, and, with far less excuse, the white and coloured insurgents of Cuba. The military execution of a dozen students at Havannah seems, according to the newspaper reports, to have been an act of wanton cruelty; but it is difficult to imagine an outrage which less concerns the English Government or Parliament. A diplomatic remonstrance from Spain on the occasion of the Jamaica massacres would not have been gratefully received. Mr. HUGHES is simple-minded enough to attribute to purely philanthropic motives the sympathy of the Americans with the Cuban insurrection, although it is remarkable that the Government of the United States formerly took an equal interest in the affairs of Cuba on directly opposite pretexts. During the administration of Mr. PIERCE, Mr. BUCHANAN and Mr. SOULÉ, their Ministers at London and Madrid, were directed to hold a semi-public conference in Belgium to discuss the expediency of annexing Cuba in the interests of slavery; and Mr. BUCHANAN on succeeding to the Presidency openly recommended to Congress the acquisition of the island. A large party in the United States now aspire to the same object, because they are shocked at the proximity of a slave population, or for "any other reason why." Nevertheless, the American Government has not yet found that the insurgents have established any civil or military authority with which it is possible even to establish relations as with a regular belligerent. The convictions at which Mr. HUGHES has arrived by study, and Serjeant SIMON by acquaintance with the inhabitants of Cuba, may henceforth be advantageously withheld from Parliamentary discussion.

When gross inhumanity can be prevented or checked even by an irregular proceeding, it would be puritanical and absurd to insist on the observance of rigid political rules; and indeed it may be justly contended that where practical influence can be exercised it may be legitimately used for a benevolent purpose. The natural feeling which induces Sir F. GOLDSMID and Serjeant SIMON to resent the iniquitous treatment of the Jews in Roumania is the more worthy of respect because it is not incompatible with English patriotism. The outrages which they described bear the ordinary character of brutal fanaticism not unconnected with cupidity. The Jews in the Danubian Principalities, as elsewhere, are thrifty and prosperous; and they shock the Christian or Pagan associations of their idle and orthodox neighbours. The zeal of a pious mob of spendthrifts is quickened by an opportunity of attacking a pawnbroker's shop in which their pledges were deposited; and in some instances the Jewish victims are probably mortgagees of the property of the Christian cutthroats. The atrocities which were lately perpetrated in the Bessarabian town of Ismailia have perhaps a political significance, as the district was transferred from Russia to Wallachia at the close of the Crimean war. It is not impossible that the riots may hereafter be used at some Conference summoned for the purpose as a reason for abolishing the remaining stipulations of the Treaty of Paris. For the present the Roumanian authorities are responsible for the crimes which they commit or encourage, although it may be fairly assumed that Prince CHARLES is powerless to prevent persecutions of which it is impossible that he should approve. The weakness and the remoteness of the united Principalities afford in ordinary cases a sufficient security against the intervention of civilized Governments; but the treaties by which Moldavia and Wallachia enjoy a qualified independence may perhaps render it possible to exert a certain pressure on the provincial Government. Prince BISMARCK, when he lately undertook to urge the claims of certain German capitalists on the Roumanian Government, took advantage, with characteristic acuteness and vigour, of their jealousy of Turkish authority. Passing by the local Government, the German CHANCELLOR made a direct application to the Porte, which is naturally unwilling to receive a formal recognition of its rights. As it was evident that the SULTAN would be supported by Germany in any measures which he might adopt for the satisfaction of the claimants, the Roumanian Ministry and Legislature immediately proposed a compromise, which has since been effected. It is possible that by a similar method the delinquent functionaries in Roumania might be induced or compelled to protect life and property. The Servian Government is involved in the same culpability, and, notwithstanding its intimate relations with Russia, it might perhaps scarcely wish to incur a rupture with Turkey in a quarrel which would alienate the sympathies of the civilized world. The Turks, with all their faults, are not prone to religious persecution; nor is there any reason why they should approve of the murder and spoliation of Jews by so-called Christians. Fugitives from the violence of the Roumanian populace are assured of safety when they cross the Danube, and the Turkish authorities have a right to complain of the burden which is inflicted on their territory by the compulsory influx of a helpless and impoverished multitude. Sir F. GOLDSMID's object was rather to elicit an expression of opinion and to stimulate the activity of the Government than to recommend any definite form of interference. It could not be expected that the Jewish members of the House of Commons should refrain from a public protest against the cruelties which are inflicted on members of their race. Mr. HUGHES's discussion of the policy of Spain and of the relations of Cuba was far less relevant to the proper functions of the English Parliament.

BALLOT AND HANDCUFFS.

LORD PALMERSTON used to tell a story of an old gentleman who was a neighbour of his in the country, and who placed so many spring-guns and man-traps in his grounds that he was afraid to set foot in his own plantations, lest he should leave it behind him. His precautions against poachers were equally effectual against himself, and he was thus excluded from his own preserves, except at the risk of being maimed or shot. It would seem that the Government, if they had their own way, would treat freedom of election in a similar manner, and with a similar result. They appear to be anxious to surround the polling-booth with such a multitude of penalties and legal terrors of all kinds, that voters would be frightened to go near it. The trapdoors of the bridge which MIRZA saw in a vision were as nothing compared with the innumerable pitfalls which the Government would like to dig, if they were allowed, in the pathway of ignorant and bewildered voters. Although it is probable that we have now heard the last of Mr. LEATHAM's rash and inconsiderate proposal, it is not impossible that it may be revived at a subsequent stage of the Bill. In any case it is worth while to observe the nature and consequences of this new kind of political freedom.

The notion seems to have been to meet intimidation by intimidation, and to cure it homoeopathically. The voter was, in fact, to be intimidated into resisting intimidation, according to a nicely graduated scale of dynamical pressure. Personal influence was to be counterbalanced by the fear of imprisonment, while a still more severe punishment would doubtless have been found to be necessary as a main weight against the temptation not to vote at all. It is difficult to imagine the feelings of the typical British voter at an election with no bands, no beer, no nomination day, no hustings speeches; all the old fun and racket gone, and nothing to keep up his spirits except the prospect of three months at the treadmill if he didn't fold up his voting-paper nicely so that nobody could read it, or if in his perplexity he consulted anybody as to whether he had filled it up properly. While the returning officer was arranging about the secret nomination and the labyrinthine polling-booths, the justices would be in serious consultation as to the strength of the police force, and the amount of prison accommodation at their disposal. Handcuffs would have to be borrowed from adjoining boroughs and counties; and some means would probably have to be devised of procuring a general gaol delivery in order to make room for the throng of free and independent electors to whom the prison would have to be wholly given up for the next few months. Indeed it may be doubted whether the ordinary cells would be enough, and a temporary encampment would perhaps have to be formed on some convenient open space, where voters convicted of not being ashamed to tell how they voted would be tethered, under strong guards, on the "long rope" or any other system which the Horse Guards might recommend. As the dreaded day approached tearful wives would beseech their husbands not to expose themselves to the perils of the poll. A voter who had made up his mind to brave the worst would naturally put his affairs in order and arrange for his business being carried on in case he did not return; and when he started on his melancholy and dangerous errand he would be attended by his weeping family and anxious friends, who would await his return in an agony of suspense. It might be months before the reckless or heroic voter who plunged into the dark recesses of the polling-booth would be restored to the world. After the election there would be a pathetic list of missing men. One poor fellow, not quite sober, had flourished his paper in the face of the clerks. Two others, in nervous trepidation, consulting together as they filled up their forms, in order to make quite sure of being right, had been detected in the act. Others, having determined to vote as they had always voted, openly and manfully, had deliberately made martyrs of themselves. During a general election the police would of course have no time to spare for their ordinary functions, and it would probably be necessary to swear in the criminal classes as special constables to help in locking up the free and independent electors who refused to skulk under the secrecy of the ballot. It is impossible to imagine that the Ministry could have given two minutes' thought to what they were about, when they committed themselves to this wild and impracticable idea. It may or may not be right that there should be uniform secrecy in voting; but it is at least quite certain that compulsion could never be applied in this manner. Of two things, one—either voters are, as a rule, willing to vote secretly, and in that case no compulsion is necessary; or they are not willing to vote secretly, and, if so, no compulsion will avail.

In dealing with legislation of this kind it is necessary to remember the character of the people who will be affected by it, and the impression which they will probably form of its scope and consequences. If Mr. LEATHAM's amendment had been carried, many voters would have stayed away in fear, while others, from bravado or on principle, would have defied the law in order to bring it into contempt and to render it impossible to enforce it. Even as it is, the mysteries of the new system of voting will be sufficiently appalling to the ordinary voter, who may be a shrewd enough person in his own way, but is usually shy of papers and easily confounded by a multiplicity of forms. It is not every elector who will be able to nerve himself for the trying ordeal of the secret compartment and the bewildering bit of paper, the precise use of which he will have to determine for himself when shut up alone and "screened from observation." The solitude and silence of the operation, the sense of individual responsibility, and the variety of forms to be gone through, will be apt to weigh on the mind of a labourer or workman who feels the want of companionship, advice, and the stimulus of united action. It may seem at first sight that nothing is more easy than to tick off the names of one or two candidates on a printed form, make a mark in the corner, and then fold up the paper so that the writing shall be concealed. But last year, when the Ballot Bill was going through the House of Commons, Mr. FORSTER put a number of members to the test, and only one of them did the thing correctly. There is nothing more likely to happen than that a voter who has concentrated all his energies on filling up the paper should make a mistake about the folding, and should present it either open, or so folded that the marks can be seen.

If a voter in a moment of nervous confusion committed a blunder of this kind, or if in his anxiety to avoid it he happened to ask a friend who was voting at the same time, or one of the inspectors in whom he had confidence, to look at his paper and tell him whether it was all right, he might, under Mr. LEATHAM's clause, be sent to prison. It is obvious that if it got abroad that any slip or accident in going through the new-fangled ceremony of voting would subject a voter to be treated as if he had robbed a house or picked a pocket, the result would probably be a conspicuous falling off in the attendance at the poll. It may be plausibly argued that if secrecy is to be optional, and not compulsory, a voter will not be protected on every side against intimidation; but it has been justly remarked that absolute protection in this sense is hardly attainable. It might, for example, be intimated to a man that, if he voted at all, no matter on which side, he should suffer for it; and to meet a case of this kind, it would be necessary to extend Mr. LEATHAM's amendment so as to include a severe penalty for not voting. Indeed, the amendment would in itself have such a tendency to discourage voting that it may be doubted whether it would not be necessary, on that ground alone, to compel voters to go to the poll by making it felony to stay away.

It will be observed that the principle underlying Mr. LEATHAM's amendment is essentially the same as that upon which Sir W. LAWSON's Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill is based. There is a minority in the country who want to vote secretly, and who insist that the rest of the community shall be compelled to do the same whether they like it or not. In the same way, because a number of people think it necessary that they should be protected against their own weakness for intoxicating drink, it is supposed to be indispensable that other people who can take care of themselves shall be subjected to humiliating and oppressive legislation. It cannot be denied that the rights of minorities are highly important, and that in the present state of society it is especially desirable that they should have adequate protection; but majorities also have rights which should not be ignored. The Education question supplies another instance of the tyrannical disposition of intolerant minorities; and it is surprising that Mr. FORSTER, who has hitherto been firm in this instance, should have been so weak and inconsistent in regard to the Ballot. The Nonconformists, not content with liberty to do as they like, insist that this liberty is incomplete unless the rest of the country is prevented from doing as it would like, and is compelled to do as they choose to dictate. As a rule, these demands are all supported by the same set of politicians; and it is, oddly enough, only in the case of contagious disease, and under the influence of a morbid and fantastic sympathy with those who are professionally engaged in propagating it, that they are on the side of unrestricted freedom. Mr. LEATHAM and his friends, who are anxious that voting should be kept absolutely secret, are equally anxious that women should have votes, but they have not yet explained how, when they have gained their second point, they can possibly hope to make good their first.

ENGLISH LOYALTY.

THERE can be no doubt that the outburst of English loyalty which accompanied the illness of the Prince of Wales fell upon most of us with a certain shock of surprise. It is characteristic of the singular disinclination for political speculation which Englishmen oddly enough combine with a rare aptitude for practical politics, that, with the single exception of Mr. Bagehot, no philosophic observer has attempted to examine the character of the English monarchy as it actually exists, or to estimate its real hold upon the nation. On no subject was the ordinary politician so utterly at sea. Half an hour before the first bulletin was issued a very shrewd person would have been puzzled by a plain question as to the amount and warmth of the existing stock of English loyalty. Such a question is not likely to be asked now, but there are other questions which inevitably follow on the solution of this primary one; and the chief advantage which we have gained from recent occurrences is that they have set people fairly thinking over some of them. Even amidst the enthusiastic verbiage of the great mass of Thanksgiving sermons it was possible here and there to come upon such a thoughtful and temperate discussion as that in which Mr. Stopford Brooke traced the origin and characteristics of English loyalty. The whole subject, however, of our kingship requires a far closer and more thorough investigation than it has yet received. The popular notions of the Crown are derived in a vague way from Blackstone and the lawyers, and it is hard to say whether they are more untrue to history or to actual fact. The history, indeed, of English royalty has recently been cleared of a vast mass of traditional rubbish by inquirers like Mr. Freeman, but much still remains to be done in tracing the connexion between the present and the past, and in explaining the subtle process by which, at the lowest point of its political weakness, the Throne has acquired a hold on the affections of Englishmen such as it never won before.

The outlines of such an inquiry are perfectly clear, and it is only the outlines that we can give here. The "divinity that doth hedge a king" begins at the very outset of royalty. As the blood descendant of Woden, or some other divine progenitor of the race whom he ruled, the older Teutonic king was possessed, not merely of authority, but of a vague personal sacredness, the reverence derived from which only paled before the enthusiastic fidelity and affection sworn to him by the band of young comrades who followed him as their war-leader. Under the later feudalism this vow of enthusiasm died down into a mere bargain of fee and service between the vassal and his royal lord; and, oddly enough, the word that now embodies all the warmest feelings of devotion to the Crown really expresses this bargaining temper of mediæval obedience. "Loyalty" is simply the rendering of the service actually due by feudal law to the Crown. But even at times when the English king seemed to be sinking into a mere "first baron" of his realm, he retained a peculiar sacredness. If the conquest of the Norman had broken down the traditional reverence for the race of Woden, Christianity more than compensated for the loss by the solemn union and consecration which raised the monarch into "the anointed of the Lord." The ruin of feudalism, the fall of the baronage who disputed its authority, and of the priesthood who rivalled its sacred character, raised royalty in England, as elsewhere, to an unexampled height; the first of the Tudors remained the one political power in his realm, while the peculiar character of the English Reformation invested the second with a strange religious reverence as the head and legislator of the new Protestant communion. But there is nothing really akin to our modern loyalty in the king-worship which sprang from this union of secular and ecclesiastical supremacy. The loyalty of to-day dates, in fact, from the utter overthrow of this king-worship in the Great Rebellion. The sacred character of the Crown only survived the excesses of Charles II. to perish before the vulgarity of the first two Georges, and the idle foppery of the Fourth. Its political influence died as slowly away, to become almost extinct at the close of the reign of George III. But out of the wreck of the royal power sprang a loyalty far more ideal, as it is far more deep-rooted and universal, than the loyalty which surrounded the throne of the Tudors or the Stuarts. The new affection to the sovereign took its shape in the very reign which we have already assigned as the close of the older monarchy. In his later days of darkness and sorrow George III. was undoubtedly beloved as none of our kings had ever been beloved before. The quiet inaction of his two predecessors had won for the throne a national trust and confidence in which the older national jealousy of the prerogative, and even his own earlier attempts to extend it, were absolutely forgotten. The decay of Jacobitism transferred to him the chivalrous devotion to the person of the sovereign which had sprung out of the troubles of the Great Rebellion, and been consecrated by the scaffold at Whitehall. But it was in his own temper that we must look for the origin of a wholly new sentiment, which in a yet more special way than its fellow-feelings has produced in the English people their present warm affection for the Crown. The love of domestic life which George III. at all times displayed, his family affection, the quietness and piety of his home, won a strange regard amongst the most home-loving people in the world. From his time the most common incidents in the daily history of the Royal household became subjects of national interest. The birthdays of its members became as familiar to the ordinary Englishman as the birthdays of his own children. Their habits and mode of life are discussed with as real a concern as those of his sons and daughters. A domestic poetry, in fact, an idealization of the family life of the sovereign, endeared the one Royal home to every home in the land.

It is in the union of these three national sentiments, of personal affection, of political trust, and of domestic interest, that we find the peculiar character of English loyalty; a loyalty as unlike the loyalty of our own earlier history as it is unlike the loyalty of other peoples in our own day. The personal devotion, indeed, which is only enhanced by the misfortunes of the sovereign is common enough. But German loyalty would never find its ground in an absolutely powerless sovereign, and we know that the domestic temper of Louis Philippe won ridicule instead of admiration from his subjects. As in so many other instances, we have hit out something very odd, but not without a certain originality or fitness to our own national tendencies. Beneath all his outer roughness, an Englishman is the most sentimental of men, and it does not follow that his loyalty is the less strong because it takes a sentimental form. But it is plain that such a conception of kingship, and such a regard for the sovereign, has at once advantages and perils peculiar to itself. Take, for instance, the strength which the Crown derives from the quiet trust of the people in its fidelity to constitutional law. It is unique in its way. Were the Count of Chambord to mount the throne of France to-morrow, the most zealous of Legitimists would at once take up a position of silent suspicion. He would assume, as the most probable thing in the world, that the new King would wish to get more power than the Constitution gave him, and that even in the most loyal of subjects a certain jealousy on behalf of liberty was indispensable. In England the mere whisper that the Sovereign was deliberately planning to lessen the power of Parliament or to embarrass the Ministry would be regarded as a sign of insanity. It is impossible to estimate too highly the mere administrative convenience of such a confidence as this—the play and freedom, for instance, which it allows to our constitutional machinery at such awkward moments as that of a change of Ministry. Its value in lifting the idea of Government itself out of the range of party suspicions and controversies is of course still higher. But it is difficult to reflect for a moment on this confidence without seeing that its untroubled continuance is by no means such a thing of course as we commonly assume. It is only a hundred years ago that George III. was battling desperately, and for a time with good success, against sinking into the position which an English sovereign now occupies. It is still a position absolutely unintelligible to Continental politicians. No Frenchman can understand a king who reigns but does not govern, and a Hohenzollern would fight to the death before yielding to what he would believe to be sheer vassalage to his subjects. We trust, in fact, simply to the strength of our constitutional tradition, and to the good sense which has so long characterized, whatever may have been their other merits or demerits, the occupants of our throne. But it is a trust which would be readily shaken either by the accession of a man of great genius or by the accession of a fool. The first might very fairly be impatient of his exclusion from all direct influence on public affairs, while the second would be very likely to mistake the pomp and popular regard which are the accompaniment of his station as being the actual measure of his power. It is quite possible, again, as Mr. Disraeli showed us in his political novels some thirty years ago, that a party might yet arise in the country to revive Bolingbroke's old cry for a "Patriot King." In the case of a sovereign of known ability, such a cry would certainly be backed by the large and increasing number of persons who, in their ignorant impatience of the obstacles which must hamper the administration of public affairs in any free country, are anxious for the speedier methods of personal rule; while it would seem fair enough to the great mass of people who are really under the belief that the sovereign does take the chief and most effective part in the government of the country. In other words, it would be sure of the support of nine-tenths of our women, the whole of the army, and the bulk of the poor.

In the same way, it is easy to see that the domestic tone of modern loyalty, though it has added enormously to the strength of the throne, is not without its perils. It has added to the strength of the throne in the simplest and most direct way, by enlisting on its side the commonest and yet the deepest of English sympathies. There are few of her subjects who are from actual knowledge able to appreciate the startling worth which the Queen has shown in the discharge of the higher functions of her office. But the poorest peasant understands that she has been a good wife and a good mother. Every incident too of royal life, a marriage or a lover, excites a fresh emotion of loyalty, and gives a new warmth and vigour to the popular affection. But, simple as are the conditions on which this homely affection rests, it is only fair to remember in how few families they are continuously met. We never dream of the possibility of a direct feud between the sovereign and the heir to the throne, and yet the present instance is the first for centuries in which such a feud has not taken place. But a feud which in the case of "poor Fred" or the Regent simply gave a new impulse to political partisanship would now cause the keenest national distress, and might possibly issue in the creation of bitter social discussions. Our ordinary family experience in the world around us hardly warrants us in looking for perpetual peace in a royal home, any more than it warrants us in expecting that the occupant of the throne will in all cases be wise or good. No doubt the very anxiety with which the nation now regards every act of the Royal Family is in itself an immense check on excesses such as those of George IV.; but a George IV. is always possible. It seems to be agreed on all hands that the accession of a really worthless sovereign would now be a serious danger to the throne, and that the very strength of the domestic loyalty which is now its support would then become a political peril. It is not likely that any future Sir Walter Scott will treasure as a sacred relic the glass out of which the Regent had just imbibed his morning draught of brandy; or that any English loyalist would tolerate for an hour the infamies of Isabella of Spain. But after resting our loyalty on the personal character of the occupant of the throne, it will be less easy for us than it was for Sir Walter to fall back on the abstract sentiment of devotion to the throne itself. In perils such as these, no doubt, the practical good sense of English statesmanship will find timely resources; but it is as well to remember that such perils do exist in the very nature of our modern loyalty.

SWEET ANXIETY.

A SIGNIFICANT little scene was reported the other day in the corner of a newspaper, illustrative of the pertinacity with which the British public clings to some of its cherished superstitions. An infant had been accidentally smothered, and the cause of the inquest was to ascertain the parents from all blame. There was no reason, that is, to suppose that the death of their child was due to any fault of theirs, except the original fault of having brought it into the world. The doctor, who was consulted, was smart enough to observe that the parents had married too young.

it not a happy marriage? inquired the Coroner. The doctor admitted that there was nothing to be said against it on this score; but that the wife was only eighteen, whilst the husband was nineteen, and he considered, in his medical blindness, that at such ages they should not have been the parents of two children. The Coroner was fortunately of the sentimental school. He was fresh, we should imagine, from the study of Giles's Baby, or of some of the eloquent works in which the theories of the wretched Malthus are held up to execration. At any rate, he was equal to the occasion. He expressed his dissent from the doctor's view, and gave his reasons for the opinion. "It is better," he remarked, "for people to marry young than to wander about the world with no object in view. For my own part, I like to see young persons having children to take care of. It gives them a sense of responsibility, a 'sweet anxiety,' and makes them do what they can to advance. I have seen many doing worse things than marrying young." Now it is impossible to read these touching remarks without feeling regard for the Coroner considered as a man. He evidently summoned up before his eye an idyllic vision of two young persons bound together by tender affection, and with the natural exuberance of their years tempered by a sense of the helpless infants dependent upon them. Melted by the graceful picture presented to his imagination, the stern dictates of calculating prudence gave way to a natural outburst of emotion, and, in words fitter perhaps for a gushing curate than a grave official, he rebuked the officious harshness of the doctor. We too are men, and we have in our time hung over the pages of sentimental novels and been touched in heart by descriptions of sweet young mothers and affectionate fathers; though we have generally been sustained by a confidence, which we fear might in the present instance be misplaced, that they and their progeny would be satisfactorily portioned off at the end of the third volume. We can therefore sympathize with the Coroner's melting mood; and yet we feel constrained for a moment to test his charming theories by a brief appeal to fact. After all, a Coroner is one of the special glories of the British Constitution; he is surrounded by we know not what official halo in the popular imagination. "Crown's quest law" has, since the days of Shakespeare, been regarded by a large class as the ideal perfection of English jurisprudence; and perhaps the morality emanating from the same tribunal may be regarded with equal veneration. No profound utterance on social questions recommended by such authority should be suffered to pass unnoticed. The Coroner represents the voice of educated society pronouncing its final judgment on the causes of grievous calamities; and if educated opinion commits itself to rash opinions, whence are the uneducated to draw safe and prudent rules for their conduct?

With this apology we will venture to say a word or two on the Coroner's remarks. One or two of his sentences obviously admit of no answer. People, he says, may do worse things than marry young. That is undeniable. They may dispense with the marriage ceremony altogether; they may pick pockets; drink themselves to death; shoot at the Queen; knock their young friends into deep water and leave them there to drown; and, in short, indulge in various courses which are condemned not only by prudence but by plain morality. Still it is an imperfect justification of any action that you may possibly do worse. The Coroner seems to contemplate only one alternative to youthful marriage—namely, wandering about the world without any object in view. With all deference to his authority, we do not think that the field of human activity is quite so limited as this observation would imply. We know a good many young men and women under twenty, in various walks in life, and most of them have a very definite object, though few of them have a family to maintain. To mention no other motive for action, it is not quite out of the question that a lad of nineteen may be more usefully employed in preparing himself for marriage than in actually adopting its responsibilities. We have indeed been accustomed to think that that period of life is one which a boy may turn to the best account by qualifying himself for a position of future independence; and we are rather startled by the notion of the youthful generation of that age as divisible into two classes, one of married persons and the other of objectless wanderers about the world. However, we would by no means deny that marriage at seventeen or eighteen is likely to steady a youth considerably, and to give him abundance of what the Coroner, with an admirable turn for euphemism, describes as "sweet anxiety." Sweet anxiety, however, is one of those pleasant things of which it is very possible to have too much. For anything we know, a couple of babies may provide a man with sweet anxiety at nineteen; but if his family increases at this rate, we should like to know whether he would regard a dozen babies as a sweet anxiety at thirty. A babe in a house—we quote the admirable language of the inspired Tupper—is a well-spring of pleasure; but a spring may possibly continue flowing till there is danger of a deluge. Looking at the matter from the point of view of the children themselves, the advantages of such sweet anxiety are still more questionable. The young gentlemen in question was a telegraph clerk; we are not informed what are his earnings, but putting them at the highest figure, and remembering that saving is clearly out of the question for him, we fear that his means, divided into twelve equal parts, will go a very little way in providing for the whole family a few years hence with meat and drink and clothing to any nothing of schooling and other necessities of civil life. It is now perhaps a very forced hypothesis that one of the arguments which the Coroner may have to hold will be upon the body of some victim of starvation. The Coroner will probably look wise and make some touching remarks upon the horrors which lurk amidst our boasted civilization. If he will take the trouble, however, to inquire into the causes, he will be pretty sure to discover one of those stories which are so commonplace that we almost cease to study them. A youthful couple have a whole family of sweet anxieties before they have fairly become men and women. The mother's health and energies have been consumed by her domestic labours. The father has been thrown out of work for a few months by ill health. He has not laid by a penny; he struggles desperately to keep out of the workhouse; the sweet anxieties hang like so many millstones round his neck; if his principles are weak, he breaks a tilt or becomes a writer of begging-letters; if they are strong, he sinks gradually into deeper degrees of debt and shabbiness; keeps himself and his dependents in rage on scanty rations in some densely crowded den, and ends by furnishing a paragraph for the papers and bequeathing his sweet anxieties to the workhouse or to charity. Possibly he has a friend or two who appeal to the benevolent and tout for votes till they get some of the sufferers into those asylums which provide such admirable substitutes for economy and foresight. Meanwhile the Coroner who sits upon him reviles the want of charity which fails to offer sufficient inducements for other people to go and do likewise, and becomes sentimental over the next person who undertakes to bring into the world as many sweet anxieties as he can at the earliest age possible.

The first edition of Malthus "On Population" appeared more than seventy years ago. Since then it has been denounced in every possible variety of phrase, and its doctrines have been preached by enthusiastic economists, till one would have thought that its errors would have been exploded, and its truths drilled into the ears of the least attentive part of mankind. Of late years pauperism has been attracting the attention of innumerable amateur philanthropists, politicians, officials, and compilers of Blue-books. The most vigorous efforts have been made to impress upon the public mind that no remedy can be effectual which does not include the encouragement of a moderate amount of prudence. And yet the preaching of all these labourers in the cause might to all appearance have been as well delivered in ordinary pulpits. They have apparently produced about as much effect as so many denunciations of luxury, the love of money, and the other established evils which seem likely to provide ample material for the eloquence of all future generations. It is still, to all appearance, a rooted article of faith in the mind of the general public that it is essentially wicked to take any thought for the morrow in regard to bringing children into the world. The most modest statement that a couple in the lower classes incur any sort of responsibility by reckless marrying is scouted with the indignation which would be rightly bestowed upon the open advocacy of any gross immorality. The one argument which is ever adduced is that of the Coroner, that there are worse evils than improvidence. We fully admit the fact, and are indeed disposed to think that one great obstacle to improvement is the obstinacy with which the philosophers pook-pook any suggestion that their principles, if fully adopted, might lead to the most serious evils. But the danger which undoubtedly exists is a reason for the cautious application of plain truths, and not for completely disregarding them. At present the world seems to be divided between the doctrinaires and the sentimentalists. The latter have naturally the most influence with the class directly affected, as it is much more pleasant to be exhorted to yield to your instincts than to be exhorted to suppress them summarily. The conflict suggests abundance of reflections upon which we cannot now dwell. We must content ourselves with congratulating the Coroner on the felicity of his style; and we shall in future never read an account of reckless marriages, or of their natural consequences, hopeless poverty, without thinking of the delicate periphrasis of "sweet anxiety." We can only wish that it was a little more appropriate, and that the sweetness was generally as palpable as the anxiety.

THE POPE AND THE FRENCH CATHOLICS.

THERE is no fresh news lately of any special interest from Germany about the Old Catholic movement, except that it is generally spreading, and new congregations seem to be forming every week. The episcopal Conference at Fulda has apparently had the discretion to confine itself to the practical question of school inspection, and has not meddled any further with the infallibilist controversy; while the bishops who have been taken to task by the Prussian Government for their excommunication of Old Catholics are trying to shelter themselves under the transparent subterfuge that the sentence was not publicly proclaimed, which is in all cases irrelevant, and in some cases also untrue. At Munich Dr. Döllinger has received the Order of Louis and an autograph letter of hearty congratulation from the King of Bavaria, on the occasion of his "jubilee" or fiftieth anniversary of his first mass, which is always observed as a great festival by Catholic priests. In the meantime the Pope, while praising "the strength of the German bishops" in maintaining "the rights of God, of the Church, and of society" (by his vigorous use of excommunication), publicly rebukes his adherents "to pray for the conversion of the souls who call themselves 'old,' because they are seeking to substitute differences into the Church." And we learn from the Algemeine Zeitung that the German Jesuits the editors of the notorious Stimmen aus Maria Laach, are urging that the next article of faith to be imposed on the Church by the infallible Pontiff must be the necessity, announced in the Bull Unam Sanctam of Boniface VIII., of every human creature being subject, in all matters, secular as well as religious, to the Pope on pain of damnation. But as this dogma, which was defined ex cathedra in 1302, is an article of faith already, we hardly see why it should require being defined again, unless to supply additional "strength" to the German bishops for excommunicating the not inconsiderable number of their co-religionists who may scruple to accept it. While, however, the Pope included Germany, Austria, and Bavaria in his recent public benediction, but with a special exemption of the "old fools" for whose "conversion" he so emphatically prayed, the most interesting portion of his address to the assemblage of various nations who came to kiss his feet was that devoted to France. But we may first be permitted to notice, in passing, the almost absolute manner in which His Holiness, like so many of his zealous admirers, has learnt to identify himself with Him whose vicar he claims to be. We quoted the other day some rather startling language on this subject from a recent pastoral of the new Archbishop of Paris, which is quite borne out by the following remarkable utterance of the Holy Father himself:—"We see that when Magdalene was about to wet the feet of Christ with her tears, He almost repulsed her. . . . You, chosen souls, have approached me in like manner to kiss my feet." Dr. Manning speaks somewhere, if we remember rightly, of the "divine presence" of Pius IX., and he certainly has high warrant for so doing.

But the Pope was most effusive and fervent in his blessing on France, "that country inhabited by so many generous hearts, which has ever known how to supply the wants of human society by so many pious works, which has known how to interpret the feelings of St. Vincent of Paul," &c., and which, if we may venture to interpret the Papal mind from the context, it may be hoped will know how to rescue Italy from her "blood tribute" and her "chains," and restore the Temporal Sovereignty. But there is some fear that this excellent object may be frustrated or impeded by the indiscretions of over-zealous allies. And, accordingly, the Pope went on to remark on certain "extreme parties" among French Catholics, one of which, indeed, "fears the influence of the Pope too much," following, we presume, at a humble distance the "old fools" of Germany. But there is another extreme party, "which is too intolerant, and completely forgets the duty of charity"; and the two are exhorted to correct their errors and combine in one powerful phalanx to combat impiety and unbelief. M. Vuilliot, the editor of the Univers, has not un-naturally perceived that the cap fits his head. Indeed no one who has any acquaintance with that pious and sweet-tempered journal, or with the works of its editor, can doubt that toleration and charity are not his most prominent characteristics. We have a keen recollection of a fragrant little work published by M. Vuilliot some twelve years ago under the title of Parfum de Rome, which displayed a capacity for various and voluminous malediction before which the Curse of Keshama sinks into utter insignificance. And not two years ago, when the bishops were entreating the Pope for a prorogation of the Vatican Council on account of the pestilential heat of Rome, to which their health, if not their lives, was being sacrificed, the Univers cheerfully replied, "Well, if the dogma can only ripen in the sun, they must be roasted." Yet in the summer of 1870, at the very time when these pleasant little amenities were periodically decorating its columns, the Univers received a solemn benediction from His Holiness in a Brief very like that bestowed on its English echo, the Tablet—which usually shows much more regard for the deceptions of literary discussion—and printed every week on its title-page, "Dum vobis gratulamur, animos etiam addimus ut in incensis vestris constanter maneatis." We cannot but think, therefore, that M. Vuilliot has been rather hardly treated, and we can quite understand his observing that "the words of the Holy Father inflict an unexpected censure on the opinions" he represents. Still, he is probably very safe in making his touching profession of absolute surrender. He "will do what he can," he says, to conform to the Holy Father's exhortations to harmony and charity, and we may venture to console him with the assurance that very little will in all probability be enough. He need not entertain any fear of being called upon to bring his work to an end and "disappear," even assuming—what we feel rather tempted to doubt—his capacity for redeeming his pledge by exchanging a speech which has not always been "silver" for a silence which the Pope and his Jesuit advisers would hardly regard as "golden." It might be wiser for the present to be a little more reticent about the aims and shortcomings of the French Government, which surely deserves some credit for allowing an anti-infallibilist priest to be condemned to six months' imprisonment for wearing his cassock, and to remember that M. Thiers's devotion to the interests of the Holy See may not be encouraged by comparing him too often to Boniface VIII. But if M. Vuilliot should ever find it necessary to limit his explosives by the precedent of Papal addresses and allocutions—and more than this cannot obviously be expected of him—a tolerable margin will still be left for the exercise of his peculiar genius. And it may console him to reflect that in the very same discourse where he was admonished to be moderate in his language towards opponents, the Holy Father illustrated the danger of being too summing them as "old fools"; and that in the following passage in the Church of the

as "a filthy inundation of most abandoned men, poured out from hell."

In France, meanwhile, the Church authorities seem resolved to push matters to extremities. We have already referred to the sentence of imprisonment on the Abbé Junqua for venturing to wear his soutane after being suspended by the Archbishop of Bordeaux. Mgr. Guibert, the new Archbishop of Paris—possibly being moved thereto by the open defection of Dr. Michaud and his followers—has taken a still more decisive step, and one which places him at open issue with the letter of the law, so remorselessly invoked by his brother prelate against M. Junqua. He has addressed a Mandement to his clergy, which was read from all the pulpits of the diocese last Sunday, solemnly promulgating the decrees of the Vatican Council, in direct violation of the organic articles which prohibit the receiving or publishing of any "Bulls, Briefs, Rescripts, or other documents of the Court of Rome, decrees of foreign Synods, or even General Councils, without the authorisation of the Government." And this law was enforced not many years ago against Monseigneur Pie, the Ultramontane Bishop of Poitiers who proved Papal infallibility in the Council from the fact of St. Peter being crucified head downwards, for publishing an Encyclical in his diocese without the requisite sanction. The Univers, indeed, has just modestly informed us that the rights of the Government in such cases "never have been and never will be recognized." As regards the Mandement itself, which is a lengthy document, we fail to discover in it any traces either of the "cleverness" or the desire to minimize the significance of the new dogma attributed to it by one of our contemporaries. The Archbishop declares that the Catholic faith does not change, but "develops," as "the Holy Spirit reveals it more fully to the Church," and he feels convinced that all the faithful will receive with submission these present "oracles of the Holy Ghost." With regard to the Council, he makes the amazing assertion that full liberty of discussion was allowed, and there can therefore be no doubt as to the validity of its decisions, which are further stated to have received the "unanimous" adhesion of the faithful, with the exception of a few evil-minded persons and two or three insignificant priests, "who call themselves 'old' from a presentiment of their own decrepitude." As regards the dogma, he assures his flock, with a magnificent contempt for history, that, while Councils were always intermittent, cases were constantly arising for decision, and were always settled by the Pope, "by a sentence against which there was no appeal." This, we are assured, was "an invariable rule." Such language is natural enough in a Papal Bull, but it is rather surprising that even a prelate of Mgr. Guibert's calibre should think it prudent to serve up this crabbed decies repêta of refuted absurdities, and have it publicly disseminated from every pulpit in the French metropolis. Dr. Michaud's latest—and certainly not least interesting—publication, Programme de Réformes de l'Eglise d'Occident, is said to be creating a considerable sensation in Paris. The Archbishop has himself to thank if it is studied just now with even keener zest than might be naturally expected from its incisive clearness and vigour of style, and fearless accuracy of historical statement.

THE TIMES ON SWITZERLAND.

WE know not whether any one nowadays remembers the History of Henry Milner, by Mrs. Sherwood. Our own knowledge, we must confess, reaches only to three volumes out of four, as the fourth volume was pronounced by a careful guardian to be heterodox and was sent away lest it should corrupt the youthful mind. But we remember a discourse in one of the lawful volumes on the time of year best suited for a visit to Malvern. "When is Malvern in season?" asks the polite Edgar. The unsophisticated Henry does not know that it was more in season at one time than another. Edgar goes on to ask whether Malvern "was not only for warm weather." Henry, by this time rising to a joke, answers that "he had heard of hills melting away in warm weather, but that he had never heard of their existing only in summer." The Times seems to be just now towards the greater heights of Switzerland in much the same frame of mind in which Edgar Bonville was towards the lesser heights of Malvern. No one is ever tempted to think that the Swiss mountains melt away in warm weather; but the doctrine that they exist only in summer would to many minds sound like a proposition which was by no means unlikely. They may be there in the winter; but who ever saw them to bear witness of the fact? The Times, in its general anxiety for the public good, has lately set the question at rest by sending a Special Correspondent to examine into the matter, who is able to report that not only mountains but men exist in the Alpine parts of the world, if not in the winter, yet at any rate as early as the month of April. And we might even go on to argue that, if either men or mountains are hardly enough to live through each an April, that of the present year, it might not be unlikely that they could continue to live through the scarcely harder trial of an ordinary Christmas. And the Special Correspondent goes further—he actually found out that Switzerland has politics and parties, and that a great political change is at this moment going on. He has even drawn out a sketch of the existing constitution and of the proposed amendments, and has made an attempt at one line of history.

was any Swiss Constitution at all. That is just the beauty of the whole letter. The whole thing is so perfectly new to the Special Correspondent. It is so plain that, till he was sent on this special mission, it had never come into his head that there was anything to think about in Switzerland except peaks, games, and glaciers, or that there were any inhabitants of Switzerland besides guides and hotel-keepers. He has now learnt better, and he very properly writes an account of his new discoveries for the benefit of those who stay at home. The joke is that he puts on throughout the air of a discoverer. Having spoken of the proposed changes in the Constitution, he adds that "little or nothing has been heard in England of this scheme." It is plain that little or nothing had been heard of it by the Times Special Correspondent, even up to the time of his writing his letter; it is equally clear that little or nothing had been heard of it by those who read the Times, and nothing but the Times, as they have had no means of instruction in this matter, beyond a few blundering and unintelligible telegrams. But we feel abashed at our own insignificance; it would seem that, at least within the range of the Special Correspondents of the Times, the Saturday Review is as little heard of as the Swiss Constitution itself. We certainly have done our best to set the whole matter clearly before such of the English public as might care to know anything about it, of whom, from his present letter, we are bound to believe the Special Correspondent is one. Nor have we altogether stood alone. We believe that we may take the credit of having introduced the subject into England, but in the course of the long discussions in the two Councils the Pall Mall Gazette has given more than one notice of what was going on. We venture then to trust that the statement that little or nothing has been heard of this scheme in England is true only of those parts of England, or of those classes of Englishmen, which come within the range of the Special Correspondent. We venture to hope that there are at least some here and there to whom the Special Correspondent's discoveries will not be quite so new as they plainly are to himself, and who might perhaps, even without accomplishing such an exploit as a journey to Geneva in April, be able to put him right about a thing or two which in the new-born zeal of such unaccustomed studies he seems not to have thoroughly mastered.

But, before we damp his zeal with any criticisms of this kind, let us first look at the Special Correspondent in all the delight of a first discoverer, settling down with charming freshness his first impressions of the unknown land, or of what might seem to be more wonderful, the well-known land seen at a hitherto unknown time. After a discourse on the abolition of passports, on the frontiers of the Canton of Geneva, and on what we may call its imprisonment since the French stealing of Savoy, the escape of the Communists, and the "splendid summer weather" which we are happy to hear that our friends at Geneva, though still "out of season," are already enjoying, the Special Correspondent at last comes to business. We are delighted to hear that, even "out of season," the Special Correspondent has found a crowd of waiters who press upon him, open the doors for him, tender a light for his cigar, and bow to him with as much eagerness and obsequiousness as if he were an English Duke or a Russian Princess. To fix the balance of precedence between a Russian Princess and a Times Special Correspondent is a point so delicate that we will not risk even a guess about it, nor will we even raise the question whether the polite waiters of Geneva are in the habit of offering to light the cigars of Russian Princesses. But there is no doubt that any waiter possessed of any share of wisdom or patriotism would hold that a Special Correspondent, with whom it might rest whether he and his country should or should not make a fair show in the columns of the Times, was worthy of a far higher measure of attention than a mere English Duke. About the waiters and their politeness the Special Correspondent seems to have no kind of doubt; but about other things he seems to be in an a priori frame of mind which somewhat reminds us of the sweet palmists Tate and Brady. Any diligent student, any diligent singer—if modern innovations have left any such—must have been struck with the ad extra way in which those poets look on several obvious points of Christian duty:—

How good and pleasant must it be
To bless the Lord most high.

The poet Laureate and the Chaplain in Ordinary to His Majesty King William had an a priori view on the subject of thanksgiving, but it is plain that they had not reached to any practical knowledge of the subject. They had never, it would seem, gone so far as to try the experiment of singing one of their own psalms. It is after the same a priori fashion that the Special Correspondent looks at Geneva and Switzerland in general:—

A delightful land Geneva would be if there were anything to do, and a very interesting people the Genevans might seem if we could only get at an intimate knowledge of them.

We should have thought that just now, when there are such striking questions about it, it would be easy to find plenty to do in Geneva or any other Swiss capital, in simply studying what is going on. But we quite enter into the difficulty implied in the second stanza. It is difficult, as we have often remarked, to be an Englishman to make his way among Swiss scholars, and it is equally difficult to give some proof of being able to understand them when they have got to tell him. And we half suspect that the Special Correspondent of the Times, that they are the only ones who are not the victims of the mischief. The Correspondent of the Times is the only one who is not the victim of the mischief.

fully appreciates his difficulties. His view of the Swiss Constitution are still in the a priori stage, but he gives us the indicative mood when he comes to what we do not think of as calling the contempt which an educated Swiss usually feels for those who go through his country with their eyes wilfully shut:—

As a nation governing itself under difficulties, Switzerland would be worthy of the attention of the intelligent traveller; but the study of her Constitution can best be made, or, indeed, most necessarily be made, out of the masses, for the Swiss seem to have a shrinking consciousness of the little importance the gay flock of their birds of passage attach to their internal affairs.

There is something specially charming in these two alternatives, either of which our Special Correspondent seems to look upon as a "little frightful." He wishes to know something about Swiss politics, but then they are only to be learned at the awful price of going into Switzerland "out of season." However, virtue has its own reward. He chooses the nobler alternative. Rather than remain in ignorance, he makes his way to Geneva at an unfashionable time, and, as the due recompense of his daring, he and his cigar are treated with all the respect that could be shown to an English Duke or a Russian Princess.

We should greatly like to know the exact time when this notion of a "season" out of which it would seem to be hardly respectable to visit the territories of the Confederation was first devised. It clearly did not exist in the days of Bishop Burnet, or in the more modern days of Archdeacon Coxe. They seem to have known nothing of a "season," but to have carried on their studies when it best suited them; but then in their days political students went into Switzerland as into a schoolroom; the land had not yet been raised to the dignity of a playground. We cannot help thinking that the Special Correspondent somewhat exaggerates the antiquity of that distinction between different months of the year of which he himself has so keenly felt the importance:—

Their revolutions, such as they are, are carefully put off till the end of the autumn; even their civil wars—for such things, unhappily, have been—were always fought on famille, and the happy lawyer from the Temple, or broker from Cornhill, who lounges amid the groves of Beaurivage or on the Terrace at Vevey during his short spell of a holiday, hardly dreams how high political passions will run in Lausanne or Geneva as soon as the last traveller has disappeared with him under the Jura tunnel.

We cannot answer for the dreams or the loungings of the lawyer from the Temple or the broker from Cornhill, but we believe that the Special Correspondent is perfectly right in thinking that the season had something to do with the time of year at which the war of the Sonderbund was waged. The Special Correspondent seems to be deeply touched with the bare thought that there should ever have been civil wars in Switzerland, and he uses the plural number in speaking of them. Yet it is not wholly impossible that the Sonderbund War may be the only Swiss civil war which the Special Correspondent ever heard of. Certainly we do not find that, in those earlier times when masters of the military art deemed it irregular to do anything in their line in the winter, the months which the Special Correspondent looks on as the "season" were ever set apart, like the holy times of Mecca and Olympia, to be kept always free from war and revolution. Perhaps, however, we should not be too strict on the first attempts of a Correspondent of an evidently inquiring mind, turned loose in so mysterious a part of the world as the land of the Everlasting League. Perhaps we should rather give him credit as things go for finding out that there is something of a Federal system in Switzerland, and yet that that Federal system has not always hindered civil wars. Even the following remark may be looked on as on the whole creditable:—

She is meditating a transition from a mere Federation of States into a Federal State, as eager for centralization as some other countries are—or profess to be—for decentralization. For such is the tendency of all people—to deal with their Constitution as with a Penelopean web, to be woven in the day and picked to pieces in the night.

The bit about the web is too hard for us, but we fancy that a Special Correspondent would not be worth his salt if he did not now and then give the world something in the grand and classical line. We might also perhaps hint that the change from the Staatenbund to the Bundesstaat is not going to be made now, but that it was made in 1848, and that many people think that the change which is now proposed is one from a Bundesstaat to something which has nothing to do with a Bund at all. But it is plain that the Special Correspondent knows that there is a difference between a Staatenbund and a Bundesstaat, and such a degree of knowledge may be looked on as pretty well for a Special Correspondent.

In describing the existing state of the Constitution our guide is perhaps less lucky. After a pretty fair account of the general results of the changes of 1848, he ventures into constitutional details:—

The aspirations of the Swiss at that time aimed no higher than a close imitation of the Constitution of the great American Union. They had an Upper Council, corresponding to the Senate of the United States; a Lower Council, in imitation of the American House of Representatives; and a President with a Council of Ministers, invested with the exercise of limited Executive powers.

We in England are used to the phrases of Upper and Lower House, because there was a time when the House of Commons was the Upper House, and because it still is so. The House of Commons is the Lower House. And the names might not be altogether inimitable in the United States, where the Senate is the Upper House, and the House of Representatives is the Lower House. The names might not be altogether inimitable in the United States, where the Senate is the Upper House, and the House of Representatives is the Lower House.

with the House of Representatives, it has also some very important powers of its own in which the House of Representatives has no share. But neither of these reasons applies to the relations between the Swiss Ständerath and Nationalrath, and we think that a member of the Nationalrath would be a little amazed if he were told that the body to which he belongs is in any sense lower than its fellow the Ständerath. But where the Special Correspondent has gone most wrong is in his description of the Federal Executive. Most Englishmen draw their notions of a Republic either from France or America. When therefore they think of a Republic, they cry out "President" as a matter of course. The Swiss Constitution is perhaps to blame for having given the name of Bundespräsident to an officer whose functions are utterly unlike those of the Presidents of other commonwealths. The Special Correspondent is evidently dreaming, like his own lounging lawyers and brokers, of a President with a Cabinet of his own, like President Grant or President Thiers. We hope that our readers by this time know that this picture is not in the least like the Swiss Bundesrath with the Bundespräsident for its simple chairman. And we should like to know something more of the Special Correspondent's notions of constitutional Executives in general. He seems to think it something remarkable that the Bundesrath only exercises "limited executive powers." We should like to know his notion of a Republic, or of a constitutional State of any kind, in which the powers of the Executive were unlimited.

Our teacher goes on to tell us that the proposed scheme "has already gone through several stages of discussion, and must either come to maturity or founder at no distant period." It would have been hardly more trouble to say that it has gone through all stages of discussion, and that it now simply waits the Yea or Nay vote of the Cantons and of the People. And it would have been a little more exact to say that the "no distant period" is fixed for May 12th. But such niceties can hardly be looked for from one who goes on to moralize in the following sublime style:—

It is only the sight of bloodshed and the thunder of the cannon which can awaken the interest of the majority of readers. We have no patience with the mere thought and talk of the nations "whose annals are a blank." We never consider that wars and revolutions are only the results of thought and talk, and that the effects will be unintelligible unless the causes have been studied. Man has an invincible reluctance to look much before or behind him.

Let the Special Correspondent speak for himself; we at least find ourselves capable of the effort of looking before us for three weeks. One extract more and we have done. The Special Correspondent tells us there are in Switzerland two nations—one consisting of innkeepers, guides, and other highwaymen who are everything in the season; the other a nation of brave, industrious, free, and independent men who rule their families and their country in a creditable manner, and whose management, among other things, of posts and telegraphs, railways and other means of communication, contributes in no small degree to the wellbeing and comfort of those tourists in whose presence they have themselves no direct interest.

We will not quarrel with the ambiguous word "highwaymen," as we have before now heard it applied to English waywardens. But did it not occur to the Special Correspondent that the innkeepers and guides might possibly not form a nation apart, but that they might themselves be members of that "nation of brave, industrious, free, and independent men" of whom he speaks so highly? It does not seem to us quite impossible that an innkeeper or a guide may rule his family in a creditable manner, and may even help to rule his country in the same way.

REVOLT IN THE KITCHEN.

THE farm-labourers' strike in the Midland Counties has been followed by another strike of a still more unexpected character among a very different class. It appears that a Union is now being organized for the benefit of the domestic servants of Dundee, and the movement is expected to extend to other towns in Scotland, and to work its way gradually southwards. London housekeepers have now fair notice that the domestic cyclone is travelling towards them, and they have time before it arrives to consider how they should meet it, and to lay their plans accordingly. Why Dundee should have been visited before other towns is a question on which we are unable to throw any light. The complaints which have been put forward do not show that servants have any special grievances in that quarter; but of course as Dundee is an industrial town, it has plenty of work of all kinds for women, and it is not unnatural that the greater freedom which is enjoyed by those who are employed in manufactories and warehouses should excite the envy of their sisters in domestic service, and should perhaps blind the latter to the advantages of their own position. Last week a meeting of domestic servants was held in one of the hotels of Dundee. There is said to have been a large gathering, and the room was quite full. Many letters were read expressing regret that the writers could not be present, the reason which most of them gave being that their mistresses had assured them that they would ruin their characters if they attended such a meeting. It is not stated whether the movement has been got up exclusively by women, or whether they are indebted to the other sex for any assistance; but the meeting was addressed by a couple of girls, who set forth the grievances of their class at some length. They argued that domestic servants were entitled to a half-holiday weekly, and to a whole Sunday once a fortnight. They were disposed to take an intensely Levitical view of the duty of abstaining from labour on the Sabbath. It has been supposed that the Scotch were remarkable for their strict observance of that day, but from the speeches at this meeting we gather that, in Dundee at least, there is a considerable amount of feasting on the Sabbath. One of the principal complaints was that on Sunday there was usually more cooking than on any other day, and consequently the servants had more work to do and less time to themselves than during the rest of the week. This they protest against. Another proposition is that the hours of labour should be from 6 o'clock in the morning to 10 at night; but there is of course an obvious difficulty in fixing a hard and fast line for dismissing the servants to bed in a private house. Their work is not continuous, and during a considerable part of their time they have only to be within call in case they are wanted. After these speeches there was an animated discussion, which seems to have turned chiefly on the restrictions which are placed on the manner in which servants adorn themselves. It was contended that "if they were compelled to wear what was generally known as a 'flag,' it should be at the expense of the mistress." We suppose that this alludes to the servants' cap, which is held to be an indispensable part of the uniform of the class. The "flag" is resented as a badge of slavery, and it was strongly urged that it should be cast aside; as a compromise it was proposed that it should at least be provided and paid for by the mistress, and that it was quite enough for the servant to condescend to wear it when presented to her as a free gift. Protests were also raised against any interference with the style of dress, jewellery, or the way of dressing the hair; on all these points the servants claimed absolute freedom to please their own tastes, and to wear any ornaments which they had honestly come by. As mistresses were so particular in regard to the character of servants, it was suggested that servants should retaliate by being equally curious as to the character of their mistresses. It was ultimately agreed that the domestic servants should form themselves into an association for obtaining information as to the character, temper, and general behaviour of those who offered them situations.

In New York and some other American cities where the demand for "helps" considerably exceeds the supply, it is usual, we have heard, for the mistresses to go to the servants when they desire to engage them, instead of expecting the servants to come to them, and it is the mistress's character which is the chief subject of inquiry and criticism. We do not know whether a mistress is obliged to produce a character from her last "help," but at least she feels it necessary to describe herself and family in the most attractive terms in order to persuade the very independent young person with whom she is negotiating to accept a home under her roof. The use of the piano and the privilege of giving an occasional "at home" for the entertainment of her friends are also sometimes among the conditions for which a servant stipulates. Those sumptuary laws which appear to be the especial grievance of domestic servants in this country are unknown in the United States, where the "helps" are at liberty to patronize their mistress's milliner if they choose, and to flaunt in all the grandeur of unstinted flounces and unrestricted trimmings. What American servants are now British servants will be, we suppose, before long; for the same circumstances which have led to the development of the former are now at work among ourselves. There is abundant employment of all kinds for women outside the domestic circle, and the greater freedom which is enjoyed by shop-girls, machinists, and the like, is valued more highly than the material comforts and good wages of domestic service. It will be observed that at the Dundee meeting nothing was said about wages being too low. The demands of the speakers were limited to greater freedom of action and more leisure; what appears to exasperate them most is that they can afford to buy fine clothes and showy ornaments, but are not allowed to wear them. It can hardly be said that in London servants are satisfied with their wages, which are continually rising; but it is possible that they might be willing to purchase the freedom of flounces and the abolition of the detested cap at the cost of a reduction of income. We do not know what may be the rule in Dundee, but in London a compromise seems to have been temporarily agreed upon, that the servants shall wear what they please out of doors on condition that they conform to the prescribed uniform within the house. A microscopic "flag" pinned on the back of an enormous chignon may perhaps be accepted by helpless housekeepers as a vindication of the great principle of domestic discipline; but it may be doubted whether the mistresses will be able to hold their ground much longer. If they object to their maids copying their bonnets and mantles, they will have to entrench themselves in a severe simplicity of costume, and Quaker soberness of hue. We can imagine the feelings of envy with which an English housekeeper observes the friendly and confidential intimacy which is maintained between a French lady and her bonne, without any derogation on the one hand or presumption on the other. The bonne walks with her basket at Madame's side, not behind her, freely discusses domestic matters with her mistress, and regards herself as entirely one of the family. It is said that the bonne is fast going the way of the grisette, and it is obvious that she is the product of certain social conditions which are undergoing a revolution in France as elsewhere. The English servant of fifty years since was pretty much what the bonne is now, and in country towns the type is not yet extinct. But "the old order changeth, giving place to the new," and it is hopeless to think of rescuing it.

to have recourse to a strike, or at least to a threat of one, would seem to show that there they are more under the control of their employers than their sisterhood in the South. If there is to be a strike on this question in London, it will perhaps be on the side of the mistresses rather than of the maids. At present the latter are in command of the situation, and there is little use in resisting their demands. It is foolish to kick against the pricks, and no amount of lamentation over the demoralization of cooks and housemaids, or of indignation at the growing insolence of their pretensions, will alter the conditions of society to which these results may be traced. It would perhaps be infinitely better for the "young persons" who are bent upon being barmasides at refreshment counters, or governesses, or assistants in a "light business," that they should take to domestic service, but as they do not choose to think so, there is no help for it. The best thing to be done is to look the difficulty in the face, and consider how it can be met. It is about as certain as anything can be that matters will get worse rather than better, at any rate for a time; and the question must be becoming a very serious one for a vast number of middle-class families, who, out of incomes ranging from 300*l.* to 1,000*l.* a-year, have to keep two or three servants, besides paying heavy washing-bills, and other extras into the bargain, and who occasionally find themselves left without any servants at all. The obvious and only remedy is to diminish household work as much as possible. The absurd fashion of piling narrow houses, room upon room, high up into the air, will have to give place to a style of construction in which the rooms shall be more on a level, and the stairs reduced to a minimum, as in the "flats" of Edinburgh and Paris. If speaking-tubes, such as are now used in all places of business, were substituted for bells, servants would be spared many a needless journey to receive orders, which could thus without trouble be communicated to them in the kitchen, and executed at once. Lifts are complicated things, and are apt to get out of order, but they might occasionally be introduced with advantage. One of the superstitions of the British builder, if not also of the British householder, is the amount of stone work which is provided for the express purpose of being hearth-stoned; it can hardly be said that the result is delightful to the eye, and it involves constant and troublesome labour. If tiles or coloured bricks were used, we might have a highly picturesque and agreeable combination of colours, and the whole could be cleansed in a few seconds with a mop and a bucket of water. It is perhaps too much to expect that builders should trouble themselves to reflect for a moment on the wants and convenience of the inhabitants of the dwellings which they construct; but if the inhabitants would only show themselves alive to their own interests, the builders would find it necessary to pay more attention to these matters. Nothing can be more barbarous and disgraceful, for example, than the way in which windows are usually cleaned by men, and still more commonly by women, at the peril of their lives. Scarcely a month passes in which there are not one or two accidents, and usually fatal accidents, on this account. If domestic servants would unite in a strike against this practice, they would deserve support. It would require only the slightest mechanical ingenuity to devise a form of window-frame which should move on a swivel, so that it could be cleaned from the inside. That such an abuse as this should have been tolerated so long, and that it should still be quite a rare exception to find a dwelling-house provided with any means of escape, even from one house to the next, in case of fire, would seem to suggest that we are not quite such a practical, commonsense, or even humane people as we should like to be thought. If middle class people want to secure greater economy and comfort in domestic service, their only chance, we fear, is to do with as little of it as possible.

THE BRITISH WEST INDIES.

THERE can hardly be a subject more interesting, economically or socially, than the condition of the British West Indies. The proprietors of what once were valuable estates have in many cases abandoned their cultivation as unprofitable, and the question is yet unsolved whether civilization will not be compelled to yield extensive regions to solitude or barbarism. We are told in the Report upon the West Indies which has been lately laid before Parliament, that the practice of "squattening" is carried to a mischievous extent in Jamaica. The greatest number of squatters are upon lands as to which it is unknown whether any title except that of the Crown exists, and it is certain that if such a title does exist, the unknown party entitled has abandoned all care or concern with the land. A population of squatters upon extensive tracts of land is not only a public nuisance but a serious danger. The law being against these people, who live under daily risk of eviction, they are naturally against the law. By a recent statute the Crown is empowered to enter upon land which has been abandoned by the owner, and to grant seven years' leases, so that squatters are now able to obtain a secure holding at a fair rent. The temptation of getting land without paying any rent for it induced men to separate themselves from civilization, whilst the uncertainty of possession was inconsistent with steady industry and with improvement in agriculture. We know from other sources that the emancipated negro has become in a generous soil and climate the laziest animal under the sun; and although polititical economists are horror-stricken at his laziness, he wholly declines to be civilized or elevated in the social scale, or otherwise induced to acquire artificial wants which could only be supplied by continuous industry. He scratches the ground and sows his seed, which bears abundant fruit without further trouble or anxiety. A rude hut and a scanty supply of clothing are all that he requires beyond the food which grows abundantly around his dwelling. In our cold and cheerless clime we strive to mitigate the austerity of nature by the resources of art, which only wealth can purchase. But the flowers which with us are costly exotics grow in rich profusion in any West Indian squatter's garden. His drawing-room is the arch of heaven, and his conservatory is any bit of land which does not happen to be occupied with a useful crop. But notwithstanding all temptations to idleness, the valuable productions of the West Indies which require industrious cultivation are increasing. The sugar crop of Jamaica is not indeed much more than half of what it used to be, but its rum maintains the character which ensures an unflinching demand for all that it can supply. The Governor of Jamaica complacently observes in his Report that the rum of that island is worth from two to three times the price of the rum of other places. As first-class rum pays better than sugar, it is an object with the Jamaica planters to make a large proportion of rum, and the reduction in quantity produced has been very much less in rum than in sugar. At a recent meeting of the Alliance a speaker declared that the corn used in making whisky was as much wasted as if it were thrown into the sea. We should like to hear this speaker's remarks upon the production of rum as indicative of the prosperity of Jamaica. In sugar vast and various regions of the world compete with her, but in rum she stands unrivalled; moreover she is beginning to produce lime juice in large quantities, and thus, with sugar, which she always has produced, the materials for punch are offered by her for the world's consumption. Her future prosperity does not, however, depend wholly on rum, for the Governor thinks that she is capable of supporting an export fruit trade of immense value. There is no doubt that the area of cultivation is annually increasing in Jamaica, although the attention of sugar-planters has been given rather to improvement of cultivation than to increase of acreage under cane.

Notwithstanding the competition of all the world, the planters of British Guiana would grow more sugar if they could obtain more labour. Owing to a misunderstanding with the Chinese Government, no immigrants are now to be obtained from China, and it cannot be expected that, with every possible exertion made in India, so large a number as that for which the planters have applied could be obtained in any one year. This large demand for labour is, however, accepted by the author of the Report as a satisfactory indication of the progress which is being made in the production of the one great staple export "upon the prosperity of which the general welfare of the colony may be said almost entirely to depend." It is surely remarkable, after all that has been said about the ruin of the West Indies by the reduction of our sugar duty, to find that in at least one colony the only hindrance to sugar planting is lack of hands to work. It is estimated that only about twenty per cent. of the Indian and Chinese immigrants who are entitled to return passages to their homes avail themselves of this right. The number of immigrants residing on the sugar estates was close upon fifty thousand, and it is satisfactory to find that upwards of one-fourth of them were women. An interesting comparison may be made between the neighbouring islands of Barbadoes and St. Lucia. It is well known that Barbadoes is over populated, and able to send labourers to other islands. But the planters of St. Lucia do not greatly favour the Barbadian immigrant, who bears somewhat the same relation to the negro of other West Indian colonies that the workmen of large towns do or did to the agricultural labourers in England. The struggle for livelihood in a dense population has sharpened the Barbadian's wits, and given an edge to his tongue. He has a fuller knowledge of his rights, and is not only not slow, and sometimes inconsiderate, in asserting them, but he is apt to return with interest any real or fancied attempt to encroach upon them. It is therefore not surprising that he should form a disagreeable substitute for the submissive and docile coolie. The planters do not like him, and he does not like the planters nor the island, where both climate and language are different from the neighbouring island of his birth. Yet it seems unnecessary to send to the other side of the world for labourers when an island under the same Government has a surplus population which it is found yearly more difficult to support. The Barbadian immigrant easily becomes acclimatized, and he is not insensible of the extraordinary fertility of the plot of garden-ground which is annexed to his new home. Food and other necessities are cheap at St. Lucia. Work at fair wages is easily obtainable. Taxation is very light. Justice in respect of ordinary grievances may be obtained at trifling cost. The public health is good. This is not an unattractive picture of the life which is offered to the bulk of the population in St. Lucia. The Report suggests that the only thing wanting to complete happiness is a little more taxation, which might necessitate greater industry. It is a comfort to reflect that this source of happiness which is found in the necessity for labour is not likely to fail in England. The negro of St. Lucia is not, however, without incentives to exertion. He loves to lie in the sun, but he loves also "tobacco, condiments, and fine clothes," and it is thought that if these luxuries cost more money than they do, he would have to work harder to obtain them, and would thus be happier. Here, again, we remark that the way to happiness is open to every father of a family in England. Supposing the theory of happiness propounded by the Governor of St. Lucia to be adopted, there might perhaps be difficulty in devising means of expending the revenue which would arise from increased taxation. It has been the custom for Government to pay rewards for the destruction of poisonous snakes, and perhaps if these rewards were to be increased, the snakes would be almost extirpated, and we should have the Governor complaining that his people were not so vigilant and happy as when precaution was required to preserve themselves from snake-bites. They can get as much rum as is good for them, and more, and they can get tobacco, and therefore, according to one definition of happiness, they must be happy. The complaint that the coloured population is too well off comes also from the island of Nevis, where salubrity of climate and inexpensiveness of living are mentioned among the causes of the ill-success of sugar planting.

"The want of labour cripples the energy, and limits the operations of the agriculturist. The apathy of the labourer is the planter's bane." It appears that men who will not work are sometimes disposed to steal. Petty thefts are more common than they ought to be, and one of the difficulties of Government is that offenders find themselves too comfortable in gaol.

The picture of general prosperity which this Report draws will supply small consolation to persons who once derived large revenues from estates which are now, at least as regards owners who reside in England, valueless. The West Indian colonies are beginning to enjoy a prosperity wholly different from that which was destroyed by the abolition of the slave trade and the reduction of the sugar duty. The wealth of those islands is likely to increase, because the next generation of negroes will be better educated than the present, and will have more real or imaginary wants which only increased industry can supply. Putting aside particular cases of "ruined" owners of West Indian estates which are familiar to us all, it is hardly matter, speaking generally, for regret that wealth cannot be acquired or retained except by residents in the country which produces it. The white man cannot compete with the coloured man in the West Indies; and we ought perhaps to thank nature, which has ordained that the Englishman should not flourish in this paradise of idleness. We may be content to be the guardians and supreme rulers of a people whose only complaint against our system of government is that they are not taxed quite enough, and that the day's work is over rather too soon.

RAILWAY REFORM.

THERE can be no doubt that our philanthropists would find an ample field were they to take to agitating the question of railway reform. It is a question that involves life and death, not to speak of comfort and property. Moreover it has the advantage of being one that may be disposed of by instalments, and each new success would stimulate fresh exertions. It is not a case of exciting public interest and sympathy by slow degrees, and by the tedious repetition of familiar arguments. Public sentiment is already practically unanimous on the matter, and only needs to be organized. We are all alive to the existence of crying grievances, and the interests of the community at large must be identical in the long run with those of the shareholders. The Conference of philanthropists and railway magnates that assembled the other day marks a decided step in the right direction. The public grievances were recognized, and schemes were broached for dealing with them, although some of the suggestions might be crotchety or chimerical. Putting together the various admissions that were made, directly or indirectly, the case against our existing system of travel came out strongly enough. Speaking broadly, indeed, we may say that railway travelling in England is attended with more danger and discomfort than in any foreign country that pretends to an equal civilisation. It has its points of superiority, no doubt, and they may be summed up in two words—speed and space. As it happens, both the one and the other are far from being unmixed blessings. The pace at which expresses travel on lines so crowded as our own is not always compatible with safety. The half-empty carriages which our travellers insist upon must represent a material increase in fares, which they would be the first to grudge did they only realize the fact. Our whole railway system is arranged for the rich, although it has long been admitted that the masses bring the most profitable custom. The rich are content to travel at their peril, with that unthinking faith in responsible management which no number of accidents will explode. The Companies tacitly contract to deliver the traveller in safety, within so many hours, at a distance of so many miles, under penalty of actions for damages in case of mishap. Very good. The public will have pace; and with the Companies it is a mere money calculation, based on the doctrine of averages, of what fares will insure them against the inevitable annual expenditure for lost lives, broken bones, and shaken constitutions. Sometimes they have a run of luck, and, being their own insurers, they make a good thing of it, and pay a handsome dividend. Occasionally fortune frowns, and we have an Abergele conflagration or a New Cross collision. The catastrophe bears hardly on directors and shareholders, for it may make the difference of one or two per cent on the half-year's profits. But it is even more serious for the passenger, who, settling himself snugly in his railway seat, drops off into sleep, and wakes to a second's consciousness before being pounded to death. He is only the scapegoat of a system supported by him or people like him. Time is money to him, or he fancies it is; or he has been content to face a terrible contingent risk for the sake of shortening some present discomfort. For years past he has been insisting on the Companies shooting him along at the rate of something like a mile a minute, and has persistently ignored the dangers which he has been perpetually braving. Habit is everything. We see nervous men, who would shudder at a London crossing, reading quietly or dropping into placid slumbers while they fly through junctions where the nodding pointman has wakened with a start to turn the switches, and past sidings where an ill-coupled train of coal-waggons has lumbered off the line but a second before. All they gain by this reckless work is a very small aggregate of hours which they may or may not turn to any useful purpose, and that at the cost of a wear and tear of brain which renders the saving a most short-sighted economy. There is a mean in all things. The work of our busy life must be carried on with a certain risk from which it would be folly or cowardice to shrink. But in railway travelling a very few miles an hour may make all the difference between excessive risk and reasonable safety. And with population, wealth, and trade all steadily on the increase, the traffic that cumbrous our lines must increase in proportion, and so will the danger. The Companies may adopt all the latest inventions in the way of signalling; they may multiply servants and increase their pay out of growing profits; but no precaution, short perhaps of allotting distinct lines of rails to slow and fast trains, can ever render the quick succession of trains anything else than what is called a tempting of Providence.

These are hazards beyond the traveller's control when he has once taken his ticket, and trusted himself to the tender mercies of his carriers. But there are other hazards which he must needs create for himself, thanks to his own short-sighted folly and vanity. The Railway Conference denounced strongly the fashion of treating guards, as well it might. The Company undertakes a delicate and difficult service, which it is its pecuniary interest to perform satisfactorily. It selects presumably the most steady and sensible of its servants, and entrusts them with the charge of the passengers. It would seem that from a false economy these servants are often scandalously overworked. If the truth has been told at recent meetings as to the number of hours during which guards are kept on duty at a stretch, it is plain that the flesh must fail frequently, however well-meaning the spirit may be. It is a sufficiently disagreeable consideration for reflecting passengers that the man who is to look out for danger signals and apply the breaks should be napping or nodding at the critical moment; but it is simply intolerable to know that one or two of their weak-brained companions are pressing on the guardian of their lives what may be an intoxicating stimulant or a sleeping draught, according to his constitution. The nature of the guard's work makes him peculiarly susceptible to temptations of this sort, and the inclination to drink becomes a craving or a necessity. It is not only on rare occasions that he becomes excited or stupefied. He comes to live in a constant oscillation between excitement and reaction. His nerves can hardly fail to go in the process of perpetually fillying an overtaxed constitution, and yet his is a calling which more than any other demands nerve, coolness, courage, and ready presence of mind.

But the dangers of railway travel, being remote and contingent, come less home to us than its daily disagreeables. We are glad to believe that the Railway Conference has grasped the fact that there is room for reform in the refreshment department. The mere act of travelling is a thing which people past middle age seldom regard as pure enjoyment; yet it may have its sunny associations, which change to pleasant anticipations when we have decided on our next journey—associations and anticipations that recommend themselves to the practical element which is so large a leaven in the English nature. In France the Companies have always understood how to cater for the tastes of their customers. It is a long journey from Paris to Marseilles; a great part of it is tame, and much is barren. One wearies of looking out on the flat fertility of the corn zone that stretches to the south of the capital; nor is it much more picturesque among the renowned vineyards, while nothing can be more melancholy than the mistral blowing over the grey olive trees on the rocky slopes of Provence. But you know that the long journey is broken by oases where you will find tempting tables spread in the wilderness. We confess, for our own part, that from the time we lose sight of the heights by Romainville, the vision of all that awaits us at Dijon divides our thoughts at intervals with our book and the landscape. Avignon associates itself not with the old castle of the Popes and the terrible tragedies of the Gladiators, but with filets, and little plates of haricot-beans, and tomatoes stuffed with bread-crumbs. If an over-lively imagination has not done the work already, the vision of the tables coquettishly covered with flowers and fruit and crystal and fan-shaped napkins is sufficient to give you an appetite. There is a cheering warmth of colouring in the bright ruby of the Beaune and Pomard and so-called Chambartin, each priced artistically in figures of gold, so that no anxious speculations as to the total of the reckoning shall disturb your digestion. And for those who prefer to enjoy their creature comforts more leisurely, there are those neat little travelling dinner baskets with their contents of cold chickens and pâté and wine and fruits. The refreshment rooms of France are not all that they used to be. Harder times have set in there to the old liberality of the restaurateur. But if you get somewhat less to eat, it is doubtless all the better for your health, and, as we rub your hands, is as certainly a saving to your pocket. You are delicately provoked as you stand, thinking of the good times you had our impressions of the English counterparts of those French meals—impressions which unfortunately we are doomed continually to revive? Meals as hurriedly matched as the uncompromising nature of the viands permitted rise again to haunt us like ghastly phantoms, bringing in their depressing train the dismal ghosts of dyspepsia and nightmare. Would that all the mortifying of the flesh on which we look back with loathing might be counted as atoning for the angry passions it evoked! It would seem as if each English refreshment purveyor had a settled grudge against all his fellows, from the ponderous nature of the preparations which he vends. Pemmican may be an excellent provision for an Arctic journey, and there are obvious advantages in concentrated meat when you must compress your larder in a saddlebag, and know not when you may replenish it. But the ham and veal pie, and the coarse-cut sandwiches, that settle down into the system like lead, seem quite out of place in a country where refreshment-bars, such as they are, are thickly set along the lines. One eloquent speaker at the late Conference dwelt on the moral duty of suppressing all intoxicating drinks, and of imposing on the passengers a Hobson's choice between tea or coffee and nothing. We should certainly never give a sigh to the memory of railway sherry, were it once departed, whatever might be the feelings of Hamburg exporters and adulterators; nor should we greatly miss the logwood-coloured brandy, sorely as one often needs a stomachic. But we must say that, if we desired to discourage the temperance movement in England, we could conceive no measure more likely to answer the end than that counselled by the temperance advocates at the Conference. It was urged that at certain stations things had been altogether revolutionized. It was answered that those stations are for the most part metropolitan, or, in other words, they are scarcely arranged to supply the wants of bond fide travellers. The girls are selected for other qualifications than those exclusively bearing on their ostensible vocation. Easy morals are of course not allowed, but easy manners are indispensable. Birmingham beauty and lively manners help young barmaids to their promotion, and the ladies look to the first business of woman in attending to that of their employers. It is certainly objectionable to scramble for your refreshment over the shoulders of flush-faced, ungloved, camelia-buttonholed gentlemen from the City, who loll with their elbows on the counters, and play the vulgar Adonis to chignonned and ringleted damsels. But we do not see that the objection need be insurmountable. Let the Companies come to an understanding with the contractors. Let them insist on giving a fair chance to customers who are indifferent to beauty, and let them appoint a committee of matrons who shall decide among candidates who plead plainness or mature years as qualifications. Marriage, no doubt, is an honourable institution; but travellers may take reasonable exception to seeing contemptuous damsels, who are supposed to serve them, trampling towards the ring and the altar over them and their tescups and their bread and butter.

Finally the Conference considered the subject of illegal "tipping" of railway servants. Here, it seems to us, the fault is entirely with the Companies, and we may say the same of the practice of guard-treating already referred to. As things are, it is idle talking against it. If a traveller desires common attention, he must give fees in self-defence. Were he known as systematically giving nothing, he would soon be a marked man at any station he was in the habit of frequenting. If he is a man of sensibility, he must feel that he perpetrates a meanness when he declines to cross with silver the palm of the civil porter who has just been bustling about with his luggage. The servants have been brought by long tacit prescription to regard these tips as understood perquisites. The Companies recognize the practice, as we suspect, because it supplies them with better servants at a cheaper rate than they would otherwise get. Nothing could be easier, if they pleased, than to change the inscription on their walls, "No servant is suffered to accept money on pain of dismissal," from a dead letter to a living reality. The practice goes on ostentatiously under the eyes of their inspectors, and a few sharp examples would supersede all necessity for further severity. So with treating the guards. The treating takes place at the Companies' own counters, before a cloud of witnesses, and the liquor is served by barmaids who ought to be subject to the Companies' authority. Is it conceivable that men trusted with the valuable property of any private person would be permitted systematically to incapacitate themselves for their most responsible duties? Certainly the Companies may plead in extenuation of their negligence that they are sufferers in common with the public; that the lives and limbs they sacrifice represent a heavy item in their own working expenses. This is, in truth, only another instance of the familiar fact that the mismanagement of corporations whose members are individually shrewd often verges on the marvellous.

THE WATER COLOUR EXHIBITIONS.

THAT twelve hundred drawings should be found worthy of a place in three high-class Galleries may be taken in proof, if proof were wanting, that the English school of water colour painting has lost little of its ancient repute. It may be impossible to replace such men as De Wint, Turner, Copley Fielding, Hunt, and Cox, and yet, when a vacancy occurs in the Old Society in Pall Mall, the number of candidates well qualified by talent and training for membership has of late years been greatly increased of all former experience. Thus it would seem that at any rate the average attainments of our artists are now higher than before, and it further may be accepted as a general conclusion that old members lie as a heavy incubus on all long-established associations, while the young blood is usually the life-giving element. It were fortunate if in art, as in the military profession, retirement from active service could be imposed at the period in life when mental and physical powers are in decay. We fear, however, that any such regulation, however much to be desired, is impracticable; if a soldier breaks down in a march the fact is patent and beyond dispute, but if a painter breaks down in his picture there will always be people ready to declare that the artist at the very moment was in his greatest strength. But at least there is one statement which can scarcely be controverted; it seems clear that artists after the lapse of years cease to create anything new; they retrace the old steps, they repeat former thoughts, they fall into routine and drudgery; even the faculty of imagination is made to do the work of a treadmill. Thus, in walking through these Water Colour Exhibitions, a very large number of works are substantially old acquaintances. In London there are dozens, if not hundreds, of artists whose pictures over a period of a quarter of a century have altered less than their faces. Such products cease to be subjects for criticism. As we pass, therefore, from Gallery to Gallery, nothing more than friendly recognition can be given to such time-honoured names as those of Mr. Richardson, Mr. Gastineau, Mr. Branwhite, Mr. Newton, Mr. Riviere, Mr. Topham in the Old Society, or Mr. Rowbotham, Mr. Henry Warren, Mr. Absolon, Mr. Mole, and Mr. Chase, several members of the Institute. More than five hundred artists present themselves in the Galleries of the Old Society, the Institute, and the Dudley, and, as we have said, more than twelve hundred works are exhibited. It is to be feared that the greater part of these contributions must remain in comparative oblivion; at any rate, in a single criticism only the leading works can obtain notice.

The Old Society honours with a foremost position a composition of showy commonplace. "Filial Love" (68), by Mr. Haag, is of a style which in literature is termed fustian. Turning to the catalogue, we find that the two figures, the old father and the young son, are supposed to have something to do with the Book of Ecclesiasticus. And they certainly look somewhat apocryphal; the old man's beard is not of the Syrian desert, but of the Seven Dials; it has been curled in a barber's shop, and the costume generally has the guise of stage properties. The colour, too, seems forced up by surreptitious means. It is really a pity that an artist who has produced sketches round about Jerusalem, Damascus, and Palmyra, which for vigour, fidelity, and downright honesty are comparable to the masterly Eastern studies of Müller, should in his studio have recourse to those meretricious blandishments which in the art of oratory are known as claptrap. It is seldom safe for an artist to amplify small studies on a large scale, or after the lapse of years to trust to imagination for facts, and to memory for emotions. Mr. Dobson also, we fear, may lay himself open to the charge of conventionality. The child in "Baby's Tea" (136) misses all that is charming and simple in childhood. On the contrary, Mr. Shields, of whom critics have had to speak in reproof, is getting back to the ways of nature. We cannot much admire the incident in "Sisterly Help" (159); a little girl only just escaping nakedness drags on the boot of her brother, also scantily clad. Refined instincts may possibly be offended, and we think artists are wise to avoid occurrences which parents in nicely ordered households discourage. Mr. Shields has modelled his figures with the utmost care; the picture is well and evenly painted. We hope he will never more aspire to high art; his vocation is in the line of pretty and pathetic themes taken from peasant life, a class of subjects abounding in all lands, and especially pleasing and salutary in an age of great cities, when life even in its humblest phases assumes artificial and abnormal forms.

Sir John Gilbert remains true to water colours, though elected into the Academy; indeed we scarcely remember a more completely satisfactory composition from this somewhat slashing and offhand painter than that of "Louis XIV. transacting Business with his Ministers in the Apartments of Madame de Maintenon" (111). The King turns to the lady to ask her opinion, which she gives with modest diffidence; and yet, looking at the picture, we understand how Madame de Maintenon "had concentrated the kingdom in her chamber; there it was that the councils were held, generals appointed, and plans of campaigns laid down." The artist is as usual equal to the occasion; the heads preserve a gravity befitting statesmen; even the wigs are historic; the whole picture is carried out with painstaking assiduity; the composition does not once fall into exaggeration, caricature, or coarseness. Sir John Gilbert has often in carelessness and caprice played with his extraordinary powers. We think the time is come when he may make for himself a great name among historic painters. In the picture before us almost all that can be needed is attained. The artist has never been wanting in dramatic situation or in the reading of character; what he may still lack is subtlety, delicacy, sobriety of hand, care to pronounce the figure beneath ponderous robes, and to define draperies which often are heaped in portentous masses as on the shoulders of lay figures. It naturally happens that men who have for years been working against time fail to mature a style commensurate with their talents. The pressure upon life in our day is all but fatal to art products of the highest order. Mr. Alfred Fripp, Mr. Ebert Foster, and Mr. Marks, in styles diverse, though familiar, reach accustomed standards. Mr. Johnson has surpassed himself; "The Rival Florists" (192) is his greatest effort; the difficulties which he courts are only to be surmounted by the utmost skill. Accessories of red poppies and white and red roses against a red brick wall are enough to put out of countenance the connoisseurs who debate upon flowers. The subject may be deemed slight to a fault, but it has become the habit of our artists to play with trifles, to please with a transient attitude, to allure by a glance or a smile. All is mobile and ephemeral, while in the olden times everything was immobile, as if the characters stood in relation, not to a fleeting moment, but to an enduring time that changed not. And yet our painters escape frivolity; perhaps it may be said that small proprieties and humdrum generally characterize much of our modern art.

The school of the future is already in course of formation under Mr. Frederick Walker, who, however, naturally reserves his strength for the Academy. Indeed, the extreme use of body colour seems in logical sequence to lead on to oils. The romantic story of "Gilbert à-Becket's Troth, or the Saracen Maiden entering London at Sundown" (127), has furnished Mr. Pinwell, a devotee of this school of the future, with one of the most charming compositions ever seen on these walls. Gilbert à-Becket in the Holy Land gained the affections of a Saracen maiden of high degree, who, not being able to live without him, set out for London town, knowing but two words—"London" and "Gilbert." The picture represents the lady, weary and perplexed, near to the city of her pilgrimage as the sun goes down. The road is pleasantly peopled with other wayfarers, who for the most part are aimless and purposeless save for the ends of picture-making. The artist as usual is content to pose his figures in pensive, statuesque, motionless attitudes; to all appearance not a person will reach the city ere the gates are shut. The whole scene strikes the eye as a pleasing impossibility, as a romance beyond the reach of reality; hence perhaps the charm. The artist has been at pains to link together the isolated fragments of his composition, and, as usual, unity of colour consists in the liberal use of an indescribable brickdust pigment; indeed, the whole picture seems to have been made and burnt in a brick-kiln. But the spectator is bound to bear in mind that brickdust is the life-giving ingredient in this school of the future.

Mr. Houghton is yet another of those painters who apparently deem it the degradation of genius to be as other men, and yet, in a disordered composition, "Useless Mouths" (104), he commits mistakes which no artist of ordinary common sense would fall into. From a besieged city issue a useless throng—a motley crew. This unpaintable subject has probably been chosen for the display of character, and therein the artist is strong; but composition there is none; the execution is ragged, and the colour hot. Mr. Macbeth, a young Scotch artist who deservedly won favour and encouragement on his entrance into London exhibitions, seems in a bad way. "The Emigrant Receiving his Mother and Sister in the Colonies" (76) is a subject beyond his power. With the exception of two or three heads, the picture has the appearance of being scraped, especially in the draperies, and the general texture is rotten. Mr. North, less ambitious, is far more safe. Indeed, were we asked to name the gems of the year, we believe we should start with "Wild Clematis in Early Spring" (249). The impenetrable tangle in the background growth, and a certain grand wonderment in the girl who finds herself in the wood alone, have a largeness of thought which is all the more impressive because concentrated within the scale of miniature. If these painters can but preserve themselves from extreme mannerism, they may effect some good in the art of their country.

The landscapes display the usual diversity; some have the merit of being literal and proxy; the greater part, however, tend to such poetic effects as may be deduced from atmospheric changes, or gained by an ideal or transcendental treatment of colour. The happy mean between the two extremes is once more struck by Mr. George Fripp. "Mountains in Glen Slighehan, Skye" (59), is admirable in form as it is lovely in colour; no artist more truthfully realizes the gradual rise, through successive steps and stages, of hills out of valleys, the summits mingling with the clouds, every detail, from hard rock to liquid stream, telling the hour of the day and the state of the weather. For a Welsh moor, carpeted by heather, browsed by sheep, watered by a trout-stream, and bounded by blue hills or the grey sky, Mr. Whittaker is the man. He has a way of tumbling together his foregrounds, and of mingling his middle distances with broken light and shade, which precisely suits districts never tilled by spade or plough. "The Moors, Valley of the Ogwen" (224), has the merit of being small and sketchy; the artist does not succeed so well in more elaborate efforts on a large scale. The Gallery is also enriched by drawings in the varied styles of Mr. Thomas Danby, Mr. Davidson, and Mr. Alfred Hunt. Once more Mr. Boyce is grand in expanse of roofs and array of chimneys. "The Yard of the Bull Inn," in the picturesque town of Ludlow, may be a subject which most artists would deem unpaintable, but Mr. Boyce has before taught us how red bricks, moss-grown tiles, and grey stone walls may be brought into exquisite harmonies, quiet as they are intense. We are inclined to think that Mr. Albert Goodwin shows most of new development. "The Fugitive's Rest" (66)—a wayfarer reposing on hill top in shadowed foreground, a flock of timid yet resolute deer moping from the valley to question and challenge the intruder—is a rare composition of the subtlest colour; dawning sunshine paints into tenderest shade; green, gold, and grey intermingle. Mr. Whelan, on his first appearance, also gives proof of an intention to illumine the walls by dawning contrasts and startling harmonies. It is reserved, however, for Mr. Powell to produce the drawing of the year, "A Channel Tug making up to a Dismasted Ship" (177). Once more the artist shows unvarnished knowledge of wave forms, when swelling and sweeping under storm-wind. But the colour is poor. Mr. Powell should remember that colour enters even the darkest shade of tempest; and that Turner saw varied harmony in prevailing monotony. What the Society can have been thinking of we cannot tell when they subjected themselves, by the election of Mr. Deacy, to the infliction of "Drake taking the Spanish Galleon Capitana, one of the Armada" (201). But the Council is generally so shrewd in its choice of members that we shall look for better things from the new comer.

The Institute in the thirty-eighth year of its existence opens a fairly good exhibition, but a certain pinkness and prettiness, together with a sickly sentiment and a false ideal, are still found to prevail on the walls. Even the landscapes tend this way, and among the figure pictures it is hard to conceive of a more repulsive atrocity than "A Child's Dream" (43), by Mr. Guido Bach. Yet the collection is redeemed by a considerable percentage of true and honest work. Mr. Collier (80), Mr. Skill (64), Mr. Skinner Prout (40), Mr. Roberts (49), Mr. Kilburne (54), Mr. C. Green (170), Mr. Herkomer (184), and Mr. Gregory (126), severally contribute drawings which arrest attention either by notable talent or by conspicuous eccentricity. Several contributors affect the style of Mr. Walker. For example, "The Well" (184), by Mr. Herkomer, is strong in study of character, specially strong in power of repulsion; the artist evidently has been at much pains to render his execution ragged, his forms uncouth, his lines discordant. It is rather hard upon Mr. Walker that his disciples not only magnify his faults but identify the school with errors of which the founder has never been guilty. It is especially to be regretted that certain of our young artists cultivate by turns every mental faculty with the exception of good taste, that guiding, chastening power, which they seem to shun as a sign of weakness. But Mr. Linton has managed to restrain comedy within permissible limits in a well-told story of "Jonas Hanway and his Umbrella—the first umbrella in England" (60). This artist never goes further than his studies will safely carry him; he is true to individual life, and his compositions as a whole, though often out of balance and in danger of falling to pieces, generally come right in the end. Some of the most admired landscapes in the Institute we owe to Mr. Rina. Indeed, "South Downs" (155) might have been taken for Copley Fielding, had the shadows been a little more neutral, and the lights more quiet and less garish.

The Dudley Gallery before it closes deserves a word of tribute. The two Societies just passed under review are more exclusive than the Academy, but the "General Exhibition" in Piccadilly, as its name implies, is open to all comers. Thus this year, while the Old Water Colour Society has sixty contributors, and the Institute sixty-nine, the Dudley Gallery opens its doors to nearly four hundred. We need not say that this tolerant spirit secures exceptional variety for the collection. Thus Mr. Burne Jones, Mr. Madox Brown, and others seldom seen in public exhibitions, are, or have been, numbered among the contributors. The Gallery is about to add to the service it has already conferred on artists and the arts by an exhibition of works in "black and white," comprising "charcoal drawings," "crayon drawings," "sepia drawings," "etchings," &c.

THE ITALIAN OPERAS.

BOTH Italian Operas are now in full activity. Mr. Gye began at Covent Garden on the 26th ult., and Mr. Mapleson at Drury Lane on the 6th inst. At neither house, although it might be imagined there was time enough, has anything remarkable in the way of novelty hitherto been produced. Mr. Gye has given nine or ten of the most familiar operas in his extensive repertory, operas to which his subscribers and the public have been regularly accustomed for years past. In naming Faust e Margherita, the Somnambula, the Figlia del Reggimento, Pro Divo, Lucia di Lammermoor, the Huguenots, the Fenice, the Traviata, and the Nozze di Figaro, we may almost claim to have done enough, but that some general opinion will be expected from us of the manner in which they were respectively performed.

Mr. Mapleson, it must be admitted, has, within a briefer space of time, emulated his great rival in the practice of adhering to the best known works; although we readily grant that genuine lovers of music are indebted to the Drury Lane manager for two performances of Beethoven's magnificent Fidelio, and that the lovers of the highest school of purely Italian art are equally indebted to him for the reproduction of Semiramide, Rossini's last Italian opera (Venice, 1823). The now rare appearances of Semiramide may be traced to more than one cause—first, perhaps, to the uninteresting and not over intelligible character of the drama, and next to the difficulty of finding singers—soprano, contralto, and baritone (Semiramide, Armen, and Assur)—able to execute the florid music of Rossini with effect. But, if we have no longer Grisi, Albani, and Tamburini, the places of these renowned artists are, after all, as time goes, not ill supplied by Meda, Tietjens, Malton, Trebelli-Bettini, and Signor Agazzi—in spite of the soprano being German and the contralto and baritone French. Besides Fidelio and Semiramide, Mr. Mapleson has given us the Somnambula, the Figlia del Reggimento, and the Armen, with occasionally the scene of the "Resurrection of the Kuhn," from Meyerbeer's Robert le Diable, which is constrained to appear much in the same light at Drury Lane as the fragment from Auber's Masaniello at Covent Garden—in the light, that is to say, of a "voluntary," to play the audience out. Thus, so far as the production of unfamiliar operas is concerned, Mr. Mapleson has little more to boast of than Mr. Gye.

Why our Italian lyric theatres should be exclusively entitled to the privilege of presenting as a matter of course the same works uninterruptedly, season after season, whether old favourites or new aspirants happen to sing in them, it is difficult to explain; but that such is the case all amateurs are aware of. We have been hearing Norma, the Sonnambula, Lacrina Borgia, Lucia, and other operas of the kind, striking an average, for some thirty or forty years past. It is not far from thirty years ago that the public was first made acquainted with the Nabucco of Signor Verdi, who has since been permitted to rank with Bellini and Donizetti; and certain of the productions of this composer—the Traviata, the Traviata, and Rigoletto, for example—are now stock pieces at both houses. Add the inevitable Martha of M. Flotow, the no less inevitable Faust of M. Gounod, the Barbier de Sévigné, and Mozart's Don Giovanni, together with two of the operas of Meyerbeer, the Huguenots and Dinorah, which (the Africaine not forgotten) can alone now be depended on, and we have our annual supply of operatic pabulum complete. True the Figaro and Plauto Magico of Mozart, as well as Beethoven's Fidelio, have of late been making head; true also, a stray opera or two by Rossini—say Otello or the Gazza Lustra (it would be mockery to name Guillaume Tell, as habitually given)—thanks to the temporary whim of some cherished prima donna, occasionally find a hearing; and true that, now and then, an attempt has been made to acquaint the English public with the fact that Auber—whose Masaniello, masterpiece alike of its composer and his school, reduced to two acts, or rather two scenes, is continually used as a kind of ballet, to fill up an evening—has composed other operas just as well suited to the Italian stage as Era Diavolo. But in the majority of instances these adventurous essays have been abortive. The spirited attempts of Mr. Mapleson, at Her Majesty's Theatre, some time ago, to place firmly upon the Italian boards some of the classic productions of Mozart, Gluck, Cherubini, and Weber, were attended with far less success than might reasonably have been anticipated. Iphigénie and Il Seraglio are forgotten; while Medea, Oberon, &c., only attract during the winter season. In short, without endorsing the dictum of Colley Cibber that "this kind of entertainment is purely sensual," to regard the Italian Opera proper, notwithstanding the progress of musical taste among us in other departments of the art, as anything more than a luxury for the upper classes, would be, in our opinion, to ignore all that underlies the surface. In the actual dearth of dramatic composers gifted with original genius, of whom Signor Verdi—"le dernier des Romains," as Rossini used familiarly and somewhat patronizingly to call him—is unfortunately the only remaining example, the institution itself is beginning to totter, and for some time hence must rely exclusively on the popular singers of the hour, who, in their turn, are compelled to fall back upon the old resources, inasmuch as under the circumstances there is nothing better for them to do. Such a lengthy and cumbersome work as the Hamlet of M. Thomas, whose Mignon is preferable to Hamlet simply because it shows less pretension, could only have lived by the breath of a singer like Madlle. Christine Nilsson; while but for Madame Adeline Patti, the Esmeralda of Signor Campana would not have survived a single performance. We ought, therefore, such considerations borne in mind, to sympathize with the managers of our Italian Operas. Having nothing else to build upon, they are more or less slaves to the caprices of their leading singers, whom, not merely in the selection of old-established works but in the choice of anything new, they are absolutely forced to consult. To this dependence of managers upon singers we have been indebted for Hamlet, Esmeralda, &c.; and by this we are menaced with further indebtedness, at Covent Garden, on account of a new opera called Gedina, composed expressly for Madame Patti, by the Prince Giuseppe Poniatowski, which we can only hope is not of the same calibre as Esmeralda. We have vivid recollections of a princely opera, entitled Canida, produced at Her Majesty's Theatre about twenty years ago, with Madame Charton Bemeur in the chief character, and have ever since felt a wholesome dread of such things. Moreover, another opera from the same pen, which has already tried public forbearance, is still fresh in our memory. Notless oblige, we are aware; but where art is concerned the obligation is difficult to discharge. It is not every Prince, who, like Lewis Ferdinand of Prussia, as ardent a lover of everything musical as he was a hater of everything French, had a Dumek for his intimate friend and musical adviser. But, seriously, it reflects no credit upon the conduct of our Italian Operas that the prospectus of neither director makes any reference to Aida, the last opera of Signor Verdi, to whom both houses for very many years have owed so much. We cannot share with a contemporary the regret expressed about L'Onore, the most recent production of M. Flotow, because we consider as usurped the position occupied by that composer—a sort of inferior Adolphe Adam; but Verdi is undoubtedly a man of genius, and entitled, if only for that reason, to consideration. Composed expressly for the Egyptian theatre at Cairo, where it was brought out with great splendour and achieved an unquestionable success (a success, by the way, heartily ratified at Milan), whatever Aida may be, the subscribers to our Italian Operas, who pay so dearly for their privileges, possess a claim to hear and judge it for themselves. This, however, has been denied them, and they have fair cause for discontent. In default of Aida, Mr. Gye promises the Guerrero, already named; a new opera entitled Il Guarany, by the young Brazilian composer, Carl Gomes; an Italian version of Auber's fresh and piquant Diamant de la Couronne (for Madame Patti), and last, not least, the Lohengrin of Wagner. About Il Guarany, knowing nothing from personal experience, we can say nothing, except that it has been performed with some success in Italy, and that Italian critics entertain very divergent opinions as to its merits. The Diamant de la Couronne we only hope may have a better fate than that which befell its charming predecessor, the Domino Noir, at the same theatre, some years ago. Mr. Gye is rather amusing about Lohengrin, which, according to his announcement, is to be brought out "as soon as it is possible to complete the rehearsals"—sooner than which it would hardly be advisable to risk it. It appears that the Director of the Royal Italian Opera has frequently meditated upon the production of one of Wagner's pieces; but, weighing the declarations of Wagner's "admirers," who predicted "unprecedented success," and those of Wagner's "detractors," who predicted that the "Music of the Future," as (according to Mr. Gye) "Wagner's compositions have been ironically styled," would drive all Opera subscribers from the theatre, he naturally hesitated. The success of Lohengrin, however, at Bologna and Florence, convinced the Director that "the presentation of one of Herr Wagner's productions should no longer be delayed." And so the subscribers are promised Lohengrin ("probably Wagner's grandest work") with three of its "most celebrated German interpreters"—Madame Marianne Brandt, Herr Köhler, and Madlle. Emmy Zimmermann—who, "by a curious coincidence," as Thackeray says when Clive Newcome unexpectedly meets Ethel at the house of Madame de Florac, happen to be engaged at the Royal Italian Opera this very season. All we can wish is that Lohengrin may really be given, and in such a manner as to afford it a chance of appreciation at its worth. At the same time we cannot but think that, instead of London following the example of certain Italian towns, London should long ago, in spite of Herr Wagner's "detractors," who ever those mythic personages may chance to be, have set the example for Bologna and Florence to imitate. By the way, it is hardly fair on the part of Mr. Gye to ignore the fact that, not later than 1870, Wagner's opera, the Fliegende Holländer, under the Italian title of L'Olandese Dannato, was produced at Her Majesty's Opera, Drury Lane, under the management of Mr. George Wood, with Madlle. Ilma di Murska and Mr. Santley in the leading characters. "The sombre predictions of the anti-Wagnerites," to which Mr. Gye playfully refers, were thus "fulfilled" two years before the Director of the Royal Italian Opera had adopted the resolution of becoming Herr Wagner's English champion.

Mr. Mapleson only announces two novelties, and one of these is also an Italian version of Auber's Diamant de la Couronne, under the title of La Caterina, three of the chief characters in which are allotted to Madlle. Marimon, Madlle. Marie Roze, and M. Capoul, who are naturally acquainted with the work, and familiar with the traditional style of rendering it. Mr. Mapleson's other novelty, however, is of far greater interest, being nothing less than one of the universally recognized masterpieces of Cherubini, who in the Deux Journées, produced at the Théâtre Foydeau (1800), showed that he could shine just as easily in lyric comedy as in lyric tragedy. The Deux Journées is quite equal to Médée—in both of which the celebrated Madlle. Scio, said to have lost her voice through singing Médée, but who nevertheless three years later undertook the chief part in Les Deux Journées, was the heroine. The opera of Cherubini is to be entitled, literally enough, I due Giorni. Among other promises of Mr. Mapleson is the reproduction of Mignon, for Madlle. Nilsson, which will afford unequivocal satisfaction.

With regard to the balance of attraction in the two companies, we do not think that one could greatly outweigh the other. Looking to the highest features of interest, Mr. Gye has got, as leading sopranos, Madame Pauline Lucca, Madame Adeline Patti, Madlle. Sesi, and Madlle. Carvalho; Mr. Mapleson has got Madlle. Tietjens, Madlle. Christine Nilsson, Madlle. Marimon, and Madlle. Marie Roze. Mr. Gye has, for chief contralto, Madlle. Scalchi; Mr. Mapleson has Madame Trebelli-Bettini. Mr. Gye's principal tenors are Signors Nicolini, Naudin, and Bettini; Mr. Mapleson's are M. Capoul, Signor Vizzani, and Fancelli. Mr. Gye's leading baritones are Signors Graziani and Cotogni, his leading basses, Signors Bagaglio, Ciampi, and M. Faure; Mr. Mapleson's chief baritones are Signors Mendioroz and Rota, his basses, Signors Foli, Borella, and Agnoli. Of the subordinates we need only say that in both companies they are efficient. Mr. Gye gives largest promise of new comers; but of these it will be time to speak when they have afforded us some opportunities of judging them.

Mr. Gye's orchestra is much on a par with that of last season, being not only numerically strong, in accordance with the exigencies of so large a theatre, but containing very many able performers in its ranks, and not one more able than our English violinist, Mr. Carrodus, who retains his position as what the late M. Habeneck was wont to designate as "chef d'attaque." We are glad to learn from the managerial prospectus that this orchestra is "acknowledged to be unrivalled, and will continue to maintain its high position"; although we doubt whether the most advantageous method of enabling it to do so is that of engaging two conductors, instead of one absolute chief. Signor Vianesi and Beviagnani are both clever gentlemen, but their modes of conducting have little in common. Mr. Mapleson's chorus is not so good as Mr. Gye's, though his orchestra, judging by the results, is better. This may be in a measure due to the unrivalled capacity of Sir Michael Costa, its sole responsible director. In any case the orchestra at Drury Lane (with M. Sainton as "chef d'attaque") surpasses in efficiency, by general consent, that of the other establishment.

It will be seen that the foregoing remarks are merely preliminary to such criticism as may from time to time be called for by the various performances of the season at either house. One of Mr. Gye's new singers, Madlle. Emma Albani, has already appeared, and both in the Sonnambula and Lucia di Lammermoor created a marked sensation. Opinions seem to differ as to the merits of this very young and promising lady—a French Canadian by birth. Our own impression is favourable; and we shall endeavour to give reasons for it on a future occasion. About Madlle. Albani's success with the subscribers and the public generally there can be little question.

NEWMARKET CRAVEN MEETING.

THE complaints loudly expressed at Northampton of the decadence of that long-established meeting must have been repeated with increased emphasis last week at Newmarket. There cannot be two opinions about the fact; the mistake lies in assigning as the cause the enforced absence of two-year-old races during the month of April. All the two-year-old racing in the world would not restore the faded glories of Northampton, any more than it serves to arrest the steady decay of Goodwood. The real truth is, that racing has changed hands. Young England has, for the present at any rate, abandoned it in favour of the cheap and nasty amusement of pigeon-shooting; and the new owners of race horses are for the most part men who feel much more at home at Croydon or Kingsbury than at Newmarket or Goodwood. Hence, as the old meetings have gone down, new ones, especially in the neighbourhood of London, have sprung up in most unpleasant abundance; and, under such circumstances, it really appears to be idle to affect surprise at the failure of gatherings established by a totally different class of sportsmen on totally different principles. Newmarket, so especially representative of the old style of racing, was sure to be the first to feel the effect of the new order of things. Matches and rich sweepstakes used to be the leading features of Newmarket races; and now matchmaking is all but extinct, and rich sweepstakes are almost a legend of the past. And when the few veteran sportsmen who still maintain the traditions of the old school shall have disappeared from the scene, as far as we can see, M. Lefevre, with about three hundred horses in training, will be left in undisputed possession of Newmarket Heath. Certainly without that gentleman's support last week's racing would have been unsuccessful beyond all precedent.

On the first day we were treated to a sight of that magnificent horse Sterling, whose defeat in the Two Thousand last year must rank among the many strange surprises of the Turf. It is credibly asserted that, after his canter over the Rowley mile, ten thousand pounds were offered for him and refused. We congratulate his owner on his resolution not to part with so grand a specimen of the thoroughbred; but we shall have less opinion of his judgment if he allows him to run over the wretched apology for a racecourse at Chester, where he will most probably be knocked down, or else beaten, like Mortemer last year, by some worthless plater with a feather-weight on his back. After Winslow had won his engagement, and Fordham his first race for this season, Chopette essayed the Ditch mile against Malahide, a colt who, on one occasion at least, last year showed fair form. Baron Rothschild's flying filly has not grown much, but looked in excellent condition, and has retained her perfect and easy action, so that over short courses she bids fair to be as invincible as she was last season. Though she beat Malahide easily enough, she seemed to be going rather against the grain for the last quarter of a mile, and two days later, when she was asked to compass the more severe Rowley mile, this disinclination was much more evident. On this second occasion she had to meet the powerful but not fully prepared Drummond, and, receiving from him 5 lbs., she only just managed to win by half-a-length. Two hundred yards more, and Drummond would have won cleverly; and we think his trainer was quite right in saying that by Ascot his horse would be sure to beat Chopette over a mile course. Last autumn, over the T.Y.C., Chopette gave Drummond 4 lbs. and a 10 lbs. beating; and we think we shall not be showing any undue prejudice in expressing a belief that she will not succeed in establishing her reputation as a stayer. Then came the Biennial, which fully maintained its character for exciting finishes, while at the same time it materially discounted the chances of some prominent Derby candidates. The seven runners were Almoner, Xanthus, Laburnum, Alava, Traveller's Joy, Derwent, and Ruffie. On paper the race appeared a foregone conclusion for Laburnum or Almoner, and the 3 lbs. better terms on which the latter was meeting Baron Rothschild's colt seemed quite insufficient to reverse the four lengths' beating she sustained in the Middle Park Plate. Ruffie made the running for his stable companion, Almoner, at an excellent pace, but at the Bushes the Duke of Beaufort's colt was in difficulties, and only Laburnum and the good-looking, but despoiled, Xanthus seemed to have a chance. Laburnum came on pulling double, and in the Abingdon bottom had a clear lead; but the instant he touched the hill his pace palpably decreased, and not only did Xanthus head him, but Almoner also, whom Cannon had been riding vigorously from the Bushes, managed to get on even terms with the leaders, and running the longest up the hill won by a head from Xanthus, Laburnum finishing a neck behind the second. The remainder were beaten off, Traveller's Joy, indeed, bolting out of the course not far from the Bushes. The honours of the race rest unquestionably with the winner, whose unflinching gameness brought him once more to the front, after the superior stride of his two opponents had left him in a position where defeat seemed inevitable. Almoner was brought out in the most perfect condition, and though a mere pony to look at, is, like most of the Beadsmans, distinguished for quality. Though perhaps too ready generally, to listen to excuses for beaten horses, especially at Epsom, where disappointments are almost inevitable, we cannot pay attention to any that have been pleaded on behalf of Laburnum. He was fit and well; he had the lead, kept the lead, held everything safe at the Bushes, and only did not win because he was not good enough to win. The real puzzle was the forward position of Xanthus, and either he must be a stone better than the Xanthus of 1871, or else Queen's Messenger must be a long way superior to anything that ran in the Biennial. The general running of the week, especially the easy victory of Eole II. over Albert Victor, points to this latter conclusion, but we are not quite sanguine enough to endorse it without more direct confirmation. We must add that the Biennial was run at a great pace, and that while there can be no doubt of Laburnum's speed, there is a just suspicion as to his stamina, which next week's running will either disprove or decisively confirm. There is nothing certain in horse-racing, however, and the succeeding race in which the German horse, Bauernfänger, was easily beaten by Azalea over the last three-quarters of the Rowley mile, was enough to satisfy some that the former could not stay. On the Thursday, nevertheless, Bauernfänger ran a mile and a quarter and beat that really good mare Lady Masham in the commonest of canters. By the way, what weight would bring Sterling and Azalea together?

Wednesday's racing we might pass over, save for the Newmarket Handicap. There was something ironical in two such notorious rogues as Enfield and Marmora running home first and second, only a neck apart, while two world-famous mares, Hannah and Shannon, were a good hundred yards behind. And yet we are told that this was an admirable instance of judicious handicapping. Lighthouse would probably have won if the boy had been strong enough to hold him. As it was, he finished only a neck behind the leading pair. On the Thursday there was some good racing, or rather some good horses came out. First of all Albert Victor tried the severe ditch-in course against Eole II., but the well-trained, compact, short-legged son of West Australian made short work of his aristocratic opponent, who in the best of condition would not have won, but who, being short of work, was hopelessly beaten half a mile from home. In his second essay over the same course M. Lefevre was not so fortunate, for he had to meet Favonius; and Ravenshoe, though in receipt of 17 lbs., was never able to extend the Derby winner. Indeed, it was very much like a racehorse against a carthorse; and the contrast between the heavy lumbering action of Ravenshoe and the smooth and regular stride of Favonius was most striking. Baron Rothschild's horse, who will be a worthy antagonist to Sterling whenever the pair meet, made nothing of his heavy weight, and had his great awkward opponent in hopeless trouble as far off as the turn of the lands.

Friday's racing was little better than a farce. There were three races on the flat, and two horses ran in the first, two in the second, and three in the third. It was an excellent joke on the part of the Jockey Club to charge five shillings for the privilege of witnessing this fine sport. Two races at the other side of the Ditch wound up the meeting. Eole II. won the Queen's Plate, over the Round Course in a trot, and twenty-five horses were so handicapped for the Plate on the New T.Y.C. that Sylla could not by any possibility lose. The race was over directly the flag fell, and Sylla cantered past the winning-post six lengths in advance of his ten opponents. We must just add that the defeat of Xanthus this week in the City and Suburban, in which he carried the nice racing weight of 6 st. 8 lbs., is not calculated to enhance the reputation either of Almoner or Laburnum. Speculum won at the same age with 4 lbs. more on his back, and yet he could only get third place in the Derby.

SIR GEORGE JACKSON'S DIARIES.*

THERE are few keener or more pleasant observers than the diplomatist who knows how to be something more than a diplomatist, and it was the fortune of Sir George Jackson, whose diaries form the bulk of the work now edited by his widow, to have rather notable people and events to observe. His death some ten or twelve years ago removed one of the busiest and shrewdest

* The Diaries and Letters of Sir George Jackson, K.C.H., from the Peace of Amiens to the Battle of Telenora. Edited by Lady Jackson. 2 vols. London: Bentley & Son. 1872.

among the public servants who were employed in the great struggle of England with Napoleonic France. A resident in Paris during the short-lived Peace of Amiens, in Berlin during the years of Prussian friendship with France, he witnessed the overthrow of Jena, and personally assisted in the bombardment of Copenhagen, formed a part of Mr. Frère's embassy in Spain at the outbreak of the War of Liberation, and finally accompanied the head-quarters of the Allies during the campaigns of 1813 and 1814. It is a little disappointing to find no portion of his diary or correspondence during this last part of his career included in the present work, and we can only hope that they may still be lurking in the "Bath Archives" of the family, where these pleasant letters seem to have been stored. A good deal of their interest and vivacity no doubt springs from the fact that the writer was at the outset nothing more than a young attaché, too young and inexperienced to be trusted by his brother, to whose suite he was attached, with any of the diplomatic mysteries where knowledge might have brought gravity and reserve. His diary in Paris is therefore altogether without political value, and throws little light on the complex negotiations which brought about the conclusion and speedy rupture of the Peace of Amiens; but the chat of the young Englishman is fairly worth a volume of despatches. From the first entry in his diary we see the same shrewd, genial observer, with his eyes kept well about him, and an amusing dash of self-confidence, which shows itself in the rapid judgments he passes on the statesmen around him, as it showed itself afterwards in some of the more noteworthy incidents of his diplomatic career. His sense of humour found ample scope in the Paris of the Consulate, and in the strangely incongruous elements which made up its social life. Among the traces of the old Royalist world which had so suddenly vanished, it is odd enough to find "Mademoiselle d'Eon, the famous Chevalier," the question of whose sex roused such hot controversies under Louis Quinze, dining at M. Otto's in 1801. Of the Royalists, however, Mr. Jackson seems to have seen little and thought less. A visit to Versailles brought home to him how terrible and complete had been the ruin of the Monarchy. The interior of the palace was a mere wreck, its gardens "indescribably desolate and dirty," "the fountains are choked with mud, and the bronze gods and goddesses seem to be looking on the changed scene around them in comical helplessness and despair. The figure of the great and magnificent Louis himself, as Apollo, issuing from a cave with a suite of belles dames representing the Muses, has been treated by the filthy conaille with the most disgusting indignity." In the aspect of Parisian society, however, there were already signs that the victorious Republic was on its way to the same grave with the conquered Monarchy. Some of "the roughnesses of the Revolution" still lingered in the habits of the men. "I saw the other evening, at a reception at Madame Fouché's, more than one pair of spattered boots, and a good deal of linen far from clean, the wearers being not the least important personages present." But the grace and elegance—if not the modesty—of feminine costume pointed in the same reactionary direction as the increase of ceremony and state in the Court of the First Consul. The sudden and somewhat startling attack which M. Michelet has lately made on the accepted impression of Napoleon's personal beauty gives value to his portrait as it is here sketched, at the moment of a review, by Mr. Jackson:—

I was much struck by the personal appearance of Bonaparte; for the caricatures, and the descriptions which the English newspapers delight to give of him, prepare one to see a miserable pigmy; hollow-eyed, yellow-skinned, lantern-jawed, with a quantity of lank hair, and a nose of enormous proportions. But, though of low stature—perhaps five feet five or six—his figure is well proportioned, his features are handsome, complexion rather sallow, hair very dark, cut short, and without powder. He has fine eyes, full of spirit and intelligence, a firm, severe mouth, indicating a stern and inflexible will—in a word, you see in his countenance the master-mind; in his bearing, the man born to rule.

It is worth notice, now that the question has been raised as to the accuracy of the Napoleonic portraits, that in 1800 Mr. Jackson, after a diligent search which he had made through Paris to gratify the curiosity of friends in England, could find not a single print that gave even "a tolerably correct notion" of the First Consul's appearance. "I fancy," he adds, "that there is something in the countenance of Bonaparte that must be very difficult to transfer to either canvas or paper." But the express mention of his handsome features and of the "fine eyes, full of spirit and intelligence," seems absolutely incompatible with the caricature which has been presented to the public by M. Michelet.

The figure who after Bonaparte made most impression on Mr. Jackson was undoubtedly Fouché. Whatever may have been his motives, Fouché alone among the old Republicans remained faithful to the idea of a Republic. "If Bonaparte himself with all his glory," he exclaimed in the hearing of the young diplomatist, "wished to crown himself or any other person, he would be stabbed that very day." In a certain power of dramatic effect he rivalled the First Consul himself. He draped himself, so to say, in a mystery of terror, till every one, and especially the English visitors, seem to have believed that half Paris was filled with his myrmidons. Mr. Jackson was solemnly cautioned that all French teachers and valets acted as his spies, and that "he has now under his direction in Paris forty organized Jacobin clubs, by whose means he could put in motion an armed mob of eight thousand men." But if Fouché revelled in duping the world as to his omnipresent police and his reserve of Jacobins, he was far too cool-headed to dupe himself; and Mr. Jackson must have smiled at his own credulity when, only a few years later, he saw this mysterious Man of the Mountain sink at the new Emperor's bidding into a commonplace Duke of Otranto. With the renewal of the war Mr. Jackson was transferred in his brother's company to the Prussian Court, and in the dull atmosphere of Berlin little opportunity was to be found for lively gossip. It is amusing to notice how, on the disappearance of peace, the hero with whose personal grandeur the young attaché had been so vividly impressed shrinks into "that great Lilliputian," and how in the later pages of the diary he becomes an "infamous Corsican." The chief subject of discussion on the arrival of the Embassy at Berlin seems to have been his assumption of the Imperial title and his approaching coronation. A rumour of the day, which we have not seen reported before, shows with what wonderful force the older conception of the Imperial dignity still retained its hold on the popular imagination. "Among the various projects we hear of for the re-establishment of the Western Empire, the most recent one is that Bonaparte intends to restore to Germany the provinces lately ceded to France on the left bank of the Rhine, and to hold them as a distinct sovereignty, to which the Electoral dignity is to be annexed. He will then cause himself to be elected King of the Romans, and in time succeed to the Imperial crown of Germany." While Berlin entertained itself with antiquarian dreams of this sort, its Court amused the English diplomatist by its steady adherence to all the ceremonies of the past. The death of the Queen-mother was celebrated by a Court of Condolence, which Mr. Jackson notes as the most farcical spectacle he ever witnessed:—

All those who assisted at the condolence assembled, about half-past five, in a room of the palace—the ladies in black stuff dresses, and entirely enveloped in veils of black gauze, of from twelve to fifteen yards in length, which fell in a deep double fold over the face. As we had some time to wait, the chatting and laughing went on gleeefully; and the ladies, who had all thrown their veils back, were amusing themselves with sprightly comments on the droll effect of their dress. The military part of the company—whose red coats, worn over black waistcoats and inexpressibles, had certainly a very odd appearance—came in for their share of titling railery. But presently all this hilarity was silenced; every face assumed a gloomy expression, and the veils were drawn hastily down. The large centre doors of the apartment had been suddenly thrown open. Beyond them was a hall, hung with black, and daylight was excluded; the darkness being made still more visible by the feeble light of two candles, burning at the further end of the hall, and by whose pale glimmer you made out that a figure, enveloped after the same mimicry-like fashion as the other ladies, was sitting there in an arm-chair, with several others standing around her. It was Her Majesty and the princesses. The princes of the family were ranged, standing, down the sides of the hall. The ladies entered first, single file, walked slowly up the hall, made a profound curtsy to the queen, and passed on to another room; the gentlemen followed. Not a word was spoken, not a sound was heard, but the dull "echoes of our feet," until we reached the outer room, which was well lighted up, and where the giggling and chattering had recommenced with greater activity than before. The preparation for, and conclusion of, this scene formed so striking a contrast to the procession of monarchs slowly passing through the dark hall of the shadow of death, as it were, that it produced a singular effect on those who witnessed it for the first time.

From scenes such as this Prussia was soon to be roused by the terrible blow of Jena. Mr. Jackson's abilities were now recognized by the Foreign Office, and he was despatched in 1806 on a confidential mission to the Court of Berlin. His position was one of peculiar delicacy, for, while plunging into the strife with Napoleon, Prussia still held aloof from the alliance of England, and refused to surrender Hanover, though its retention made friendship between the two nations impossible. It was in an unofficial capacity, therefore, that Mr. Jackson was despatched to the scene of action by Fox, whom he saw for the last time on receiving his instructions. A ludicrous incident disturbed the interview. Fox received the envoy in his bedroom, while Mrs. Fox slipped en déshabille into a closet. Imprisonment, however, proved too much for her impatience, "for I had not been long in the room when she began, and kept up, a continuous alto voce coughing and hemming." As this failed, however, to obtain her liberation, she became at last so impatient that at the very close of the interview "she rapped on the door, and in a piping, complaining tone, called out, 'Mr. Fox, Mr. Fox, my dear, the young man's gone, I think? Can't I come out, my dear? I'm so very, very cold.'" The envoy hurried to Brunswick only in time to witness the rout of Jena, and to follow the frightened Court in its flight to Magdeburg. No more striking picture of the utter imbecility of the King and his Ministers has ever been drawn than in these wayside jottings of Mr. Jackson. Only the Queen retained her courage and presence of mind in the general wreck, though suffering as much as any one from the humiliation of the Royal flight, and glad to occupy a single room in a farmhouse, "which one can hardly step out of without getting up to the ankles in mud." Meanwhile fortresses after fortresses were surrendering to a few dragons, and the Prussian army was being driven eastward like a flock of sheep. Blücher alone remained doggedly unscared by the change of fortune. Mr. Jackson tells a charming story of Napoleon's utter failure in an attempt to convert him into an advocate of surrender and peace during a stay at the French head-quarters. "Blücher does not understand a word of French, and his orders to his son, who acted as his interpreter, were never to translate to him anything that Bonaparte might say which had the slightest allusion to a Prussian peace." This almost equals Nelson's resolute application of the telescope to his blind eye.

Mr. Jackson was forced to look helplessly on at the Peace of Tilsit, which closed the great tragedy of Prussia's overthrow; but, though indignant with Alexander for his alliance with France, he fairly points out the compulsion under which the young Emperor was acting. "Letters from the interior of Russia describe the misery and want that reign there as beyond all conception"; then, as in the Crimean war, the inner resources of the great Northern State were far from being equal to her outer fighting power; and "the general cry is for peace." In addition to the general distress, Russian Poland was on the verge of revolt, and a conspiracy was brewing in the heart of the Imperial Court, "a cabal in fact such as it would be difficult to conceive the existence of in any country but Russia or Turkey. The Grand Duke was at the head of it, and even went so far as to threaten his brother by reminding him of his father's fate." There can be little doubt that Napoleon was fully aware of the stress under which Alexander acted, and that we must explain in his way his utter disregard of the Emperor's intercessions for his Prussian ally. It is curious to note the exact similarity of the policy of France towards conquered Prussia as sketched out in these pages by Napoleon to that of Prussia towards conquered France as explained with equal candour by Prince Bismarck. "The Prussians breathe nothing but vengeance against France," said Bonaparte to a Russian officer at Tilsit, "and desire peace only as a means in time of executing it; but they deceive themselves greatly if they expect to rise again to the height of a great Power, for their wings shall now be so closely cut as to preclude all possibility of their ever again disturbing us." In his words to the King we have only to substitute Metz for Magdeburg, and Paris for Berlin, to make them identical with the famous phrase of the Prime Minister:—"Sachez que je veux abaisser la Prusse, et garder Magdebourg pour entrer quand je veux dans Berlin. Je ne connais que deux sentiments, la vengeance et la haine; il y doit en avoir à l'avenir une haine contre les Français en Prusse; mais je la mettrai hors d'état de nuire." The gloom of the catastrophe is lightened by the liveliness of the young negotiator, who manages to conduct flirtations under the most trying circumstances. In the dark days after Jena he finds amusement in the privilege of admission to her toilette which has been accorded to him by the "grande maîtresse," Madame de Voss, with whose ample charms Sir Robert Wilson seems to have been deeply smitten. "It is dull enough to see her under the hands of her friseur while she is laughing and flirting." The beauty of her Royal mistress made a yet stronger impression, and one of the greatest sacrifices the young envoy ever made to his feelings of loyalty was in dutifully recognizing a likeness to his "Queen of Hearts" in the homely features of her aunt, Queen Charlotte. Some of his pleasantest hours are spent in helping Her Prussian Majesty with her ladies to make lint for the wounded. "I fear, however, that the smiles of the Royal beauty stimulate the efforts of most of her employes much more than do the sufferings of the poor fellows whose wounds she would bind up and whose wants she is so anxious to do all in her power to supply." From these pleasant employments he was soon recalled to take part in the expedition against Copenhagen, in which his brother figured as British Envoy, and of the success of which he was the first to bring news to England. His sketch of the bombardment and conflagration of the town can hardly now be read without a shuddering pity:—

The city was on fire in three places. I never saw, nor can well conceive, a more awful, yet magnificent spectacle. It was the beginning of the bombardment in formid. We saw and heard it going on until daylight, as we lay in our cots; and as the work of destruction proceeded, I cannot describe to you the appalling effect it had on me. Our cabin was illuminated with an intensely red glow, then suddenly wrapped in deep gloom, as the flames rose and fell, while the vessel quivered and every plank in her was shaken by the loud reverberation of the cannon.

In the afternoon the firing began again with greater fury than ever, and for two or three hours there was a tremendous blaze. The wind was high; the flames spread rapidly, and towards night vividly illumined the horizon, so that at the distance of five miles from the city we could see each other on the quarter-deck as if it had been broad daylight, and into the city in the same manner; the intervening ships forming very picturesque objects.

Admiral Gambier had ordered the Sully to be in readiness for me, and I proceeded on my voyage the same night. Ere I left, the fire had increased to a prodigious height, the principal church was in flames, looking like a pyramid of fire, and the last I saw and heard of the ill-fated city was the falling-in of the steeple with a tremendous crash, and the distant loud hurrahs it occasioned along our line.

It is not often, however, that Mr. Jackson rises to a tragical tone. He is happier in the shrewd observations on men and manners which fill the pages of his Spanish Diary, and in his piquant sketches of Mr. Frere and Lady Holland. A vein of caution, which deepens as he grows older, tempers his criticisms on the pompous and frivolous noblemen who were constantly employed by the Foreign Office to undo all that had been effected by shrewder but less aristocratic envoys of the stamp of the Jacksons. The same caution perhaps necessitated his reticence about English politics. The two brothers seem to have aimed at being simply public servants, and to have kept aloof as far as possible from the party ties of their day. Of Pitt we only learn that the last book he read was a novel, and that The Novice of St. Dominic was in wonderful request after his death. The mother of the two diplomats must be responsible for a wonderful story of Erskine's grief at his wife's death, and of the Bishop of London's refusal to consecrate his garden, where the new Lord Chancellor wished to bury her. But caution and reticence on this side of the Channel are more than atoned for by the lively peeps of men and things on the other side which we gain from these diaries. We note one or two slips in the editing, which seems for the most part to have been carefully done. Bonaparte is not likely to have addressed a "Sénatus Consultum" to the French Senate, nor the Abbé Siéyès to have received "the appointment of Member of the Sénat Conservateur." Nor, remembering the date of the Treaty of Campo Formio, six years before, do we understand the following passage from the diary under the date of June 12, 1804:—"The Doge of Venice has proposed to unite that country to France. Bonaparte, we hear, was expected there about this time to complete the arrangement."

MR. AND MRS. FAWCETT'S ESSAYS.*

THE volume before us is due to the combined efforts of Mr. and Mrs. Fawcett. The general nature of its contents will probably be anticipated by most of our readers, to whom the names of the writers are familiar. Mr. Fawcett discusses various questions connected with pauperism, and explains what is in his view the right thing to be done with the House of Lords. Mrs. Fawcett dilates on the various wrongs of women, and moreover sets forth, with the zeal of a thoroughgoing disciple, the merits of Mr. Hare's scheme of representation. We may say briefly that she has certainly added strength to one favourite argument of the supporters of female franchise. She can write clearly and argue logically; and although we shall presently have to point out certain defects, as they appear to us, in her mode of reasoning, we have nothing to say against the style and temper of her performance. Perhaps both Mr. and Mrs. Fawcett are a little too certain of their own infallibility, and too much convinced that the very last word upon political and philosophical questions has been said by Mr. Mill and Mr. Herbert Spencer. A certain confident dogmatism is characteristic of the Radical school, to which both writers belong, and their opponents will be apt to think that it is due rather to intellectual narrowness than to their having completely exhausted all possible objections to their theories. It is wonderful how simple all questions become when you have unhesitatingly accepted the platform of an extreme party.

Mr. Fawcett is a Pharisee of the Pharisees, a Radical of the purest water, incapable of flinching from the widest possible application of the true creed. There are indeed some topics upon which his authority is open to a certain amount of suspicion. We do not now speak of his political action, which is not to our present purpose; but of his divergence in theory from some of the advanced members of his school. He occupies towards them a position analogous to that which the Old Catholics maintain in regard to the Ultramontane party. His, so he maintains, is the genuine old Radical creed; and some who boast of being more thoroughgoing than himself are really straying from the true path. Though we cannot decide which is the genuine article, we may admit that it is highly to Mr. Fawcett's credit that he preserves an independence which is by no means too common amongst any section of politicians; and the opening essays of the volume are interesting as incidentally giving his explanation of the main cause of the contrast. The sentiment to which Mr. Fawcett adheres, and which, as he thinks, has become far too unpopular with modern Radicals, is an extreme jealousy of Government interference. He declines to lay down any general principle on the subject, and appears to think that it is possible to apply what is called the laissez-faire doctrine too unreservedly. Indeed, if we understand him rightly, he holds it to be impossible to lay down any general criterion whatever of the propriety of State intervention. But, whilst theoretically maintaining a neutral attitude, he is practically opposed to almost all the recent movements in favour of extending the sphere of Government action. He objects, with honourable independence of spirit, to the various schemes for enforcing temperance by law; he protests against the attempt to regulate the hours of labour, and to the other methods by which, with more or less disguise, it is sought to fix wages by direct legislation. On these and many other matters he speaks strongly and reasonably; and Mrs. Fawcett, whose opinions on this point appear to be coincident with those of her husband, writes an essay in the same spirit to denounce the plan of providing gratuitous education. The strain of argument strikes us as at times a little exaggerated, and more frequently as rather narrow. Undoubtedly it is a serious objection to any system such as that of free education that it tends to weaken the sense of responsibility of parents for their children; but the consideration is only one amongst many; and one becomes after a time a little wearied of the application to every social question of the one test—Will it or will it not tend to "discourage providence with regard to marriages"? Mr. and Mrs. Fawcett seem to regard the tendency to indiscriminate multiplication of the population with a kind of nervous irritability; it is in their opinion an evil so enormous that all others sink by its side into insignificance; and the main remedy for it is that Government should do nothing, and leave people to take the natural consequence of their own recklessness. Although it seems to us that the constant insisting upon this doctrine implies a rather inadequate standard of judgment, we agree that it is an important one to keep before the public mind; and the more unwelcome it is to the average British constituent, the more credit is due to the member who seeks to impress it upon him. This, however, is only one application of that jealousy of the action of the State which Mr. Fawcett shares with the older school of political economists. He sees with regret their manifold backslidings in various directions; and he attributes this growing mischief, so far as we can understand him, to the inoculation of English workmen with foreign ideas. Our artisans, he thinks, are being infected with alarming Socialist theories to which sanction has been unthinkingly given even by Conservative statesmen. We confess that we are not quite satisfied with this account of a movement of thought which appears to us to have wider causes. There has long been an increasing reaction against that conception of the State which would reduce it to be merely a machinery for the suppression of thieves and murderers. And, to dwell upon no other cause, the growing centralization of society is naturally favourable to a growth in the activity of Government. The social organism, as Mr. Herbert Spencer calls it, is far more compact than it has ever been before; and the remotest parts of the system are brought into far more intimate connexion with the centre. Such a process cannot take place without giving greater energy to the central Government and presenting stronger inducements to turn its influence to account in a variety of ways. What used, for example, to be a local quarrel between a few masters and men in a particular district, now tends to become a war between two social strata; the nation is interested, and national modes of interference are invoked on both sides. The same tendencies might be traced out in innumerable other directions; everywhere a number of distinct centres of force have coalesced and, as it were, become nationalized; and under such circumstances, it is likely enough that the demand for State interference will rather grow than diminish. What is really to be desired is that the State should interfere on well-considered principles, and should pay due regard to individual liberty. At present there is too often a mixture of tyranny and undue relaxation, and a blundering attempt to remove an evil by a direct law without taking the trouble to examine into its probable operation. Mr. Fawcett's protests may do good service in restraining the precipitate application of hasty remedies, and he very ably exposes some of their natural consequences. That he will arrest the tendency to centralization we do not in the least believe, but he may help to disperse many unfounded anticipations and to discourage a good deal of exceedingly mischievous political quackery.

One measure which he ardently advocates, but which is principally treated by Mrs. Fawcett in the volume before us, might possibly do more to encourage the evil he denounces than all his eloquence would do to impede it. Mrs. Fawcett thinks it grossly wrong and inconsistent in any Liberal to object to the female franchise because it might possibly lead to Conservative legislation. This depends, as it seems to us, upon whether you consider voting power as a means or an end. But, however that may be, we certainly imagine that nothing could tend to increase the sphere of Government action so decisively as the concession of the suffrage to women. They would cure very little, we suspect, for the theoretical scruples which move Mrs. Fawcett, and would be ready to support State education, State emigration, State suppression of drunkenness, and every other device for making everybody comfortable and happy by Act of Parliament. Feminine impulsiveness and enthusiasm would, if we may trust our present experience, be awkward ingredients to be encountered by cool-headed political economists. Of course Mrs. Fawcett will reply that we are wrong in our appreciation of the feminine character; that, even if we are right, political education will speedily cure these defects; and that, right or wrong, justice must have precedence of everything. It is indeed possible, and Mrs. Fawcett accepts the conclusion complacently, that the result of yielding the franchise to women might be the repudiation of all the other political principles which Mrs. Fawcett most values. The woman of the present is certainly Conservative in most matters, and it is rather odd to contemplate the possible state of mind of our enthusiastic Radicals if they should find that they had, politically speaking, cut their own throats by adherence to abstract principles. A more liberal administration of the Poor-law would, for example, in Mr. Fawcett's opinion, utterly ruin the self-respect and independence of the nation; but a more liberal administration of the Poor-law is certainly not an improbable result of the admission of women to the franchise, which is supposed to be a kind of panacea for all political evils. On his own showing, then, it would seem that we are making a jump in the dark, and that the very remedy which he most strongly advocates may lead to the very evils which he most strongly deprecates. It is not our business to solve this puzzle; but we might perhaps suggest both to Mr. and Mrs. Fawcett that they, like most of their school, attach exaggerated importance to mere questions of political machinery. Mrs. Fawcett, for example, tells a pathetic story of "three well-known Liberal members of Parliament" who lately sat up till four in the morning discussing the future of their party. The discussion resulted in a confession that when the Land Bill (it does not appear what Land Bill) and the Education Bill were passed, their occupation would be gone. Mrs. Fawcett very properly ridicules the singular limitation of their ideas; and yet there is some meaning in it; for whenever a destructive is to be replaced by a constructive policy, it must be admitted that the old-fashioned Liberal policy will be in difficulties. Mrs. Fawcett, however, proceeds to give her own programme; and it seems that she believes that every good thing will be secured by adopting Mr. Hare's scheme of voting. That scheme might possibly be an improvement in some respects on the present; it might remove some obvious inequalities, and possibly make it easier for a few distinguished persons to retain seats in Parliament. But we confess that we have always thought it one of the most singular illustrations of the incapacity for political imagination sometimes exhibited by philosophers, that any rational person, and much more any really able thinker, should ever have persuaded himself that by such a mere shuffling of the cards the whole world of politics should be regenerated. Mrs. Fawcett fancies that corruption would disappear. We do not say that it would be increased, though certainly it would be more convenient in some respects to bribe people wherever you have a good chance than to be forced to bribe them in a particular place under the eyes of familiar adversaries. But, given people wanting to buy power and people wanting to sell it, the notion that any shifting of the mere mechanism should at once make them pure, or, not making them pure, should render them incapable of coming to terms, is to us the wildest of dreams. This is the characteristic weakness of our present race of doctrinaires, but it would be unfair not to observe that in the present volume it is counterbalanced by much shrewd sense and appropriate argument.

GOVER'S INDIAN FOLK-SONGS.*

ANY one who will take the trouble to collect the genuine folk-songs of that part of India about which Mr. Gover writes, to edit them carefully, and to translate them faithfully, will confer a great obligation on many classes of scholars. Mr. Gover does not profess to have undertaken so serious a task as this. He has not attempted by any means fully to reap the rich harvest of popular poetry of which Southern India can boast; he has only plucked here and there a few of its fruits, and now offers them to view as "samples" of the crop. He claims, however, the merit of having taken pains to secure good specimens of the popular poetry "of each family of the great Dravidian nation"—of having given "the pleasant labour of years" to their selection in the plains where dwell the Tamil and Telugu peoples; on the Mysore plateau, the home of Canarese; among the hills and valleys of the Neilgherries and Western Ghats, sheltering the stalwart tribes of Coorg and the humble Madagas of Ootacamund; along the narrow strip of low-lying coast that parts the sea from the Western Ghats and gives a home to the Malayalam tongue. That the poems which Mr. Gover cites are of considerable interest no reader is likely to deny; but how far many of them merit the special designation which he has given to them is a question on which he and his critics will probably be at variance. Few of these are likely to consider that didactic poems composed by ascetic philosophers have more claim to be styled "folk-songs" than have the plays of which Mr. Gover almost needlessly remarks that they are "so dreadfully long, requiring several days for their representation, that they cannot possibly be brought within the class of songs." There will doubtless be specialists among his critics also who will find fault with Mr. Gover's treatment of his subject. Before taking leave of his book we shall mention a few of the objections which they may raise. But we will first take a glance at its contents from the point of view of the general reader, to whom it may be recommended as a work likely to mitigate the supercilious contempt with which Englishmen are too apt to regard their dusky fellow-subjects in what they are pleased to consider the barbaric East.

The description which is given of the singers who wander with their poetic wares from village to village is very interesting, recalling as it does the accounts of the rhapsodists and other minstrels who used to lead a roving life in more Western climes, and whose descendants still make their voices heard, though with fast failing strength, in the less civilized of European lands. It is pleasant to one pent within a populous city from which national melodies have long been driven by the din of the hurdy-gurdy, the banjo, and the German band, to read of the quiet Indian village into which the travelling singer enters in the cool of the evening, bent upon earning his board and lodging by his voice. There, in Mr. Gover's sketch, we see the minstrel sitting within the porch of the pagoda, his simple musical instrument in his hand, his huge begging shell at his feet. On their return from the fields the villagers, "weary with their labours, anxious for some sober excitement," throng to hear him, and soon the ground in front of the temple is occupied by groups of eagerly listening men, women, and children. He begins by some religious invocation, and then passes to short songs, each of which has a chorus attached to it. When a song is familiar to the audience, "before the bard has finished the long-drawn-out note with which he ends his verse, the villagers have taken up their part, and the loud chorus swells on the evening breeze." The singing goes on, interrupted from time to time by the circuit of the begging-shell, into which a shower of pice is poured, until darkness closes in. Then the listeners disperse, and the minstrel goes home to supper with the headman of the village.

Most of these singers belong, we are told, "to the anomalous class called attavan, the sons of dancing-girls"; and, as men who know nothing of their fathers, they can claim no caste. Many of the members of this class enroll themselves in the ranks of the "devotees named dasas, or slaves to the Deity," who bind themselves by a vow of poverty, and wander about the country begging and singing. Of a livelihood they are always sure, for none dare to despise the "slave of God," and he must be invited, listened to, and rewarded "at weddings and feasts, at fasts and funerals, at sowing and harvest, at full moon and sankranti (the passing of the equator as the sun changes its tropic)." The songs they sing naturally differ in various parts of the country. In some places, what Mr. Gover considers the original popular poetry has disappeared; in others it still flourishes. The Hill tribes, for instance, "have songs for every event in life. They cut the first sheaves of harvest to a song. They come into life, are married, and die to the music of some chant, song, or requiem." Among the Badagas of the Neilgherry Hills, according to Mr. Gover, dance and song while away the moonlight nights, during which the belated traveller will often hear "the distant chant, the loud and sudden chorus, and then again the floating strain of the single singer," bearing witness that round some mossy stone a group of villagers is listening to and joining in the song of some wandering bard. Among the most remarkable of the songs given by Mr. Gover is a dirge which is sung by the Badagas before a corpse is burnt. After a wild dance has been executed, in which the performers "are supposed to be accompanying the parted soul in its rapid flight to the feet of God," and the dead men's relations have walked in solemn procession around his remains, a buffalo-calf, which has been carefully selected for the purpose, is brought within the circle of mourners, one of whom lays his hand upon its head, and begins chanting the dirge, which contains a general confession of sin. The singer begins by assuming that the deceased has committed all possible sins, which are supposed to amount to thirteen hundred in number. Then he enters into details, crying, for instance, "He killed the crawling snake; it is a sin." After him the bystanders repeat in chorus, "It is a sin," and as they shout the chief performer lays his hand upon the calf, to which the sin is supposed to be transferred. After the whole catalogue of sins has been gone through, "then, still in solemn silence, the calf is let loose. Like the Jewish scapegoat, it may never be used for secular work. It is sacred, bearing till death the sins of a human being."

We are glad to learn from Mr. Gover's book that the Rev. F. Metz has filled two large folio volumes with his collection of Badaga poetry, one of which, it is to be hoped, will not long be allowed to remain unpublished. The Madras Government also "has authorised the Commissioner of the Neilgherries, J. W. Brecks, Esq., to make an exhaustive examination of the history, religion, customs, and antiquities of the Neilgherry tribes," so that much fuller information than has hitherto been available about a most interesting people may before long be expected.

With the exception of the "scape-calf" dirge of the Badagas, by far the most interesting of the songs quoted by Mr. Gover are the work of Canarese poets. Some of them have already been made known to the scientific world by Dr. Mögling, in two excellent articles headed "Lieder kanaresischer Sanger," which appeared in the fourteenth and eighteenth volumes of the Zeitschrift der deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft, and which give the original text of twenty-four songs, together with a German version. They are for the most part not so much songs, in our sense of the word, as philosophic speculations; the moralizings of a teacher who takes a very gloomy view of life, and is always calling attention to the fact that it is encompassed by sorrows and jealously watched by death. It is difficult to imagine anything less like the song that lightens toil than the jeremiad commencing

Oh! what is food to me! Death stands so near!
Morn, noon, and night his angels close appear.
In one short day they snatched, as past they ran,
My friend, my foe, the young, the grey-haired man.
Their wealth doth stay behind, although so dear.
There is no joy for me, my life is drear.

Chorus.—How near is death! Mercy he cannot bring.
Then, oh, my heart, cease from the world and cling
With all thy power to tender Lakshmi's king.

And it might well puzzle the reader to understand how such a lamentation could have attained to popularity, were he not told, by Dr. Mögling, that it was composed in all probability by an ascetic of great fame—the renowned hymn-writer Purandara, who, from being a miser, with his whole heart set upon the acquisition of wealth, was converted into a poverty-loving "servant of God" by a miracle in which his wife's nose-ring played a prominent part. There is nothing wonderful in the fact that such moralists as he, after long meditations on the ineffable greatness of the Creator and the contemptible littleness of the creature, on the brevity of human life and the bewildering immensurability of divine existence, should come to the conclusion that

This comes, that goes, the old, old way;
No joy will last beyond to-morrow,
Even grief and pain—they will not stay;

or should exclaim:—

Great Lord, my boyish years were one long pain,
Although they seemed to pass in play. For play
Is nought but pain, in that it brings disdain
Of God and holy things.

But it is strange that rustics, wearied by a long day's work in the fields, should turn for relaxation, not to say amusement, to what are really hymns of an unusually lugubrious nature. Perhaps, however, they may be like the Russian peasants, who often dance with perfect cheerfulness to the accompaniment of a song which breathes the accents of inconsolable woe.

Of the specimens of Tamil poetry given by Mr. Gover, the greater part deserve to be called folk-songs still less than the Canarese hymns already mentioned. But as illustrations of the teaching of the great religious leaders of old times, too high a value cannot well be set upon such poems as that beginning

God is the one great all. Can such as He,
Eternal Being, see our praise or prayer
In outward acts? If thou wouldst worship Him, Lift up thy heart—in spirit serve thy God; or the stanzas on the "Unity of God," the first of which is—

Into the bosom of the one great sea
Flow streams that come from hills on every side.
Their names are various as their springs.
And thus in every land do men bow down
To one great God, though known by many names.
This mighty Being we would worship now.

The "Labour Songs" which follow these grave utterances are more entitled to the designation which Mr. Gover has given them. We can scarcely say as much for the Malayalam poems about various Brahmanic deities, or the Telugu hymns commencing

What animals ye are who worship stones,
And care not for the God that dwells within!
How can a stone excel the living thing
That praise intones?

Or,

To pray and serve yet not be pure,
In dirty pot to place good food,
To worship God while sins endure,
Can never turn to good.

As for the specimens from the Cural, there can be no pretence for calling them "Folk-Songs," but they are well deserving of a place in a sketch of Indian religious teaching and sentiment. It is in the light of such a sketch that we prefer to look upon Mr. Gover's book, and as such we recommend it as being likely to dispel some of the most prevalent of English delusions about India. Of the remarks purporting to be scientific made by Mr. Gover, the less said the better. But we must express our unqualified disapprobation of his jaunty and self-confident method of dealing with philological problems. All the great scholars who have discussed the question of the Dravidian languages, and have come to the conclusion that they do not belong to the Aryan family, are contemptuously dismissed by Mr. Gover with the assertion that they are utterly in the wrong. He informs us that "the Dravidian nations have preserved with singular purity the vocabulary they brought with them" from, we suppose, the original home of our own remote ancestors in Central Asia. But the only piece of evidence which he vouchsafes in proof of this sweeping assertion is the fact that the greater portion of the Dravidian words which were grouped as "Seythian" by Dr. Caldwell "are included in Fick's Indogermanische Grundsprache as Aryan roots." We do not attach much importance to Dr. Caldwell's "Seythian" theory, but we wish we could recognize in Mr. Gover's unhesitating utterances a little of the caution employed and the diffidence expressed by the learned author of the Comparative Grammar of the Dravidian Languages. Had Mr. Gover possessed any share of it, he would scarcely have given so much prominence to the extraordinary philological operation which he performs in his introduction upon the unfortunate word Pey, a devil.

BLUNT'S KEY TO CHURCH HISTORY.*

THIS small volume seems to be one of a series, of which we do not remember to have seen any of the other members. But the list contains a Key to the Knowledge of Church History [Ancient], which is also "edited" by Mr. Blunt, and a Key to the Knowledge and Use of the Holy Bible, which seems to be not only edited by Mr. Blunt, but to be his own composition. Of these the "Key to the Bible"—to give it what in Parliamentary language is called a "short title"—will, according to the Clerical Journal, be "extensively circulated in Church families," while, as the "Key to Ancient Church History" is pronounced by the Rock to be a "very terse and reliable collection," it may perhaps find its way into Gospel families also. We have been trying to guess what would be the feelings of any man able to read and write on finding that what he had written or edited was pronounced "reliable" by the Rock. We can only guess that a slight approach to the shock might be found in our own feelings some time back, when we were asked to give something to a library at Chicago "on grounds of racial sympathy." To us indeed the painful thing would be to be called "reliable" at all, whether by the Rock or by the Church Times; but for Mr. Blunt to be called anything which is meant for praise at the hands of the Rock must be still more painful on other grounds. We do not indeed know what may be meant when it is said that the "Key" before us was "edited" by Mr. Blunt. That word may in itself mean anything, from the editor writing the book himself, to his writing a preface to a book which he has not read. As the "Key" has no preface, it is at least clear that it cannot be used in this last sense. We may however suppose that it implies some kind of general approval on the part of Mr. Blunt. Now to Mr. Blunt, if he is at all responsible for his "Key," one would think that the praises of the Rock must be specially disagreeable. For it is plain that after the most straitest sect of our religion he lives an Anglican. He walks steadily along the edge of the razor which divides the two dark abysses of "Romanism on the one hand and Dissent on the other." Now this frame of mind, like any other theological frame of mind, has its right to full and candid toleration. Historically viewed, it has something to be said for it and something against it. On the one hand, the rigid Anglican is sometimes tempted to give up being an Anglican and to turn Bignon instead. On the other hand, he may be trusted to take in the historical and legal continuity of the English Church through all the changes of the sixteenth century. The Papist, the Puritan, and the Latitudinarian might all admit that manifest truth without in any way giving up their several theological positions. But, as a matter of fact, they are not commonly very ready to do so. But to the strict Anglican the corporate or personal identity of the existing Church of England with the Church of Anselm and of Augustine is the very life and soul of his whole theory. There is no fear of his thinking that the Church of England was founded by Henry the Eighth or Elizabeth; he is in no way bound to the angelic perfection of Edward the Sixth, nor is it important to his position to fix very accurately the exact year of the B. Reformation. All these are decided merits to be balanced against weaknesses the other way; and if our rigid Anglican, like the rigid anything else, lays on his colours and dispenses his epithets according to his own way of thinking, it is no more than is done by most people of all other ways of thinking. If, therefore, Mr. Blunt, or the nameless writer whom he edits, tells his story systematically from his own point of view—if from that point of view he lays on praise and blame according to rule—we have no more to say against him than against partizan writers of any other side. But it somehow strikes us that partizan writing is in a manner softened when it has a good deal of room to display itself in. When the partizan has a field wide enough to argue his case, to give something like a full statement of his own position and the position of his enemies, the bitterness of controversial writing is in some degree tempered. But when the history of a controversial time is crowded up into a very short space, its bitterness is a good deal increased. The actual language need not be any fiercer than in a work on a larger scale. But the whole thing is somehow sharpened; we get, as it were, the concentrated essence of odium theologicum. There is an air of assumption and priggishness which might not show itself so strongly if exactly the same way of looking at things were spread over more pages. Still we can put up with all this and everything else, as long as people will keep to truth of statement in matters of fact. And without binding either great books or small to a strictly annalistic method, we hold that a summary, above all things—and we suppose that a Key does in some sort partake of the character of a summary—should have a fair regard to chronological order, and should not too ambitiously affect that system of arrangement by subjects, rather than by dates, which is often successful in works on a greater scale.

Looking with these feelings at the "Key" now before us, we are driven by a strong sense of duty to appear in a character which is new to us, that of champions of King Henry the Eighth. But Sir Thomas More himself laid down the rule that sin it were to belie the Devil, and we presume that he would not have wished his own murderer to be shut out from the benefit of that charitable doctrine. Now we must charge Mr. Blunt, or whoever it is that Mr. Blunt has taken under his protection, with belying Henry the Eighth to no small amount. We do not think that we ever read a passage more flagrantly unfair than the following:—

The King's favourites and courtiers were allowed to seize on monasteries and nunneries almost at their will, and only a very small portion, something like a fiftieth part of the whole, was devoted to founding new bishoprics and kindred objects. Some of the monks received small pensions, many more were put to death or died of grief and want, and others lived on in great distress and poverty. Many of the lay monks turned to secular employments for a livelihood, while a few of those in Holy Orders were presented to benefices.

Now who would think from this that the rule—a rule to which there may have been exceptions, but which certainly was fairly carried out in the great mass of cases—was that each monk received either a pension or some ecclesiastical preferment? There were monks receiving their pensions as late as the time of James the First, and, though the pensions of the ordinary monks were not large, they were certainly enough to keep them from dying of want. As for "dying of grief," or "living on in great distress," such things—at all events the latter—always happen in all great revolutions; but in this case at least they were certainly not caused by actual want of bodily sustenance. Such a statement as this leaves wholly out of sight the many cases in which monks were at once appointed to offices elsewhere, or even went on in their old homes under new titles. From Mr. Blunt's account no one would dream of such a state of things as that of Peterborough, where the last Abbot became the first Bishop, and the Prior of St. Andrew's at Northampton the first Dean, or that of Christ Church, Canterbury, where the Prior went on as Dean, and a large body of the monks became Prebendaries, Minor Canons, and other officers of the new foundation. As for many of the monks being "put to death," it is certain that the whole number of monks put to death on one ground or another, from the beginning to the end of Henry's reign, would, if added up, look unpleasantly large. But to talk in this way, while describing the suppression of the monasteries, of many monks—"many more" than those who received pensions—being "put to death," would suggest the idea that the suppression of a monastery was much such a process as taking a town by storm, and that it is apt to be accompanied by a massacre. And this comes after a statement that "many monks and abbots who refused to surrender their abbey, or reveal where the treasures of their houses were hidden, suffered cruel deaths as traitors"; it comes after an account of the execution—we have no objection to calling it the murder or the martyrdom—of Abbot Whiting of Glastonbury; it comes after the oddly worded statement that, besides Whiting, "to intimidate the rest, several of these old dignitaries"—that is, we presume, the Abbots of Reading and Colchester—"were executed." The writer seems to be in much the same state as a person of an inquiring mind who was once found—we think it was on an archaeological excursion—in the neighbourhood of Glastonbury Tor. On hearing that there it was that the last Abbot was hanged, the question came, in a tone of deep sympathy, "Was it usual to hang the Abbots?" Mr. Blunt, or whoever it is that he edits, evidently thinks that it was usual.

It is hardly necessary to go all through the history of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, as the reader can pretty well guess the treatment which most controversial subjects are likely to meet with at such hands. But in turning over the pages we light on an odd statement that in the latter years of William the Third the name "Low Church" "was given to those who sided with Government in oppressing the Church and favouring Dissenters." Now we really do not know what is meant by oppressing the Church, because the writer, though he expresses himself very guardedly, does not directly commit himself to the Non-juring schism. And, except the deprivation of the Non-juring clergy, we really do not see what act in England—and the writer is not here speaking of Scotland—at this time can be called oppression of the Church. We will not believe that it is held to be oppression of the Church when an end is put to the oppression of Dissenters. In the next page we are amused by reading, as if it were something very frightful, of a sermon of Hoadley, "in which the doctrine of the divine right of kings was openly attacked, and the will of the people stated to be that by which rulers govern." And directly after we read how Hoadley was made Bishop of Bangor, and how "a few months after his appointment the new bishop wrote a treatise which denied, not only the divine right of kings, but also the value of episcopacy and Church ordinances." There is something not a little pleasing in the calm way in which the figment of the first half of the seventeenth century is assumed as an eternal truth, which only the most abandoned of men could think of doubting. Coming nearer to our own times we get such an odd union of things as the following:—

In A.D. 1858 Jews were admitted into Parliament, and in the same year an agitation was set on foot for obtaining a revision of the Book of Common Prayer in such a direction as would eliminate from it all distinctive Church doctrine.

We suppose that there is meant to be some connexion between the two events which are thus divided by nothing greater than a comma; but we certainly had never remarked that the Jewish members of the House had devoted themselves in any marked way to movements tending to "eliminate"—whatever that may be—distinctive doctrine of any kind. It is doubtless with a little bit of spite that we read in the next page—

The hope of tranquillizing Ireland was an argument much insisted on for obtaining the passing of the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act in A.D. 1828 (sic), though the measure cannot be said in this way to have answered the expectations of its promoters.

Then comes the abolition of the ten Irish Bishoprics, and lastly:—

In A.D. 1869, a similarly arbitrary measure completed the work of spoliation by disestablishing and disendowing the Church of Ireland, its revenues being confiscated to a large extent for the support of Hospitals and Lunatic Asylums.

We have not the least objection to the use of the word "confiscated." The revenues of the Irish Church were confiscated, rightly and lawfully confiscated, by that power which alone has authority to confiscate anything. But we have no doubt that the writer thought that a very clever point was made by using the word "confiscate" in its vulgar Disraelite sense of "rob." There is of course a great deal about modern controversies, and the Tractarian movement is described as beginning from "the dangers which threatened the Church from the new constitution of the House of Commons through the admission of Dissenters by the Reform Bill of A.D. 1832." This is a feature of the Reform Bill of which we certainly never heard before. But we will not go through the whole story of modern disputes, as it may be more edifying to show how perfectly impartial our via media writer is, and how little inclined to show more pity to the error of excess than to the error of defect. Here is the history of what was once famous under the name of the Papal Aggression:—

In A.D. 1850, Pope Pius IX. formally established the schismatical position of the Romanists in England, by appointing an Archbishop of Westminster and twelve other Roman bishops. The excitement caused by this unauthorized intrusion of foreign bishops into dioceses already provided with bishops of the Church of England was very great, but unfortunately too much mixed up with unreasonable fanaticism to produce any serviceable or permanent results.

Now this way of speaking of Roman Catholics in England, as schismatics, dissenters, and the like, does always seem to us to be the very extreme of orthodox priggishness. No doubt such language is the logical inference from the strict Anglican theory, but it is just one of those points on which the common sense of mankind revolts against logic. So again we have the same sort of priggishness when we read of "a Council held at Rome, and falsely called (Ecumenical, in A.D. 1870." Falsely no doubt, as, without any theory, we may learn from any map which takes in Constantinople, Jerusalem, Alexandria, and Antioch. But that point of view will not supply the special delight with which we feel sure that Mr. Blunt or his author wrote down the words "falsely called (Ecumenical."

While dealing with the map, we must copy an amazing piece of ecclesiastical geography:—

Those portions of Switzerland which remained Catholic were, until the time of the French Revolution, under the jurisdiction of the Bishops of Constance, Mentz, Besançon, and Milan. After the Treaty of A.D. 1815 the Pope appointed a vicar apostolic to govern the Swiss Church, but this arrangement was unsatisfactory to the country, and by a Concordat effected in A.D. 1845 five bishoprics were erected, the apostolic nuncio at Lucerne acting as metropolitan.

Now the description of the former state of things is so hopeless a jumble that it would take a page to set forth all the mistakes; so we will only ask our readers to compare it with Spruner's ecclesiastical maps. As for the state of things now, we do not profess to be masters of the mysteries of Legates and Vicars Apostolic; but in what conceivable sense can the Bishoprics of Chur, Sitten, Geneva, and Basel be said to have been "created in 1845"?

Lastly, we judge that in our author's eyes the persecution of Moors and Moriscos is, to say the least, not more than a venial sin:—

Notwithstanding the measures taken to rid Spain of the Moors, many of them lingered on in the country, baptized indeed, but still secretly clinging to their old faith and customs. This conduct drew forth much mistaken severity from the Spanish Inquisition, and multitudes of these Moriscos, as they were called, as well as of Jews, fell victims to their own errors and to the stern character which circumstances and national temperament had impressed on Spanish Christianity.

A CAST OF THE DICE.*

IN a single volume of moderate size the Cast of the Dice includes a melodramatic romance and a lively novel of everyday life. Throughout the greater part of the story the various personages spend their time in picnics and dances, and in forming with one another more or less sentimental relations, which gradually settle down into two or three definite love affairs, involving a corresponding number of rivalries. Deaths and personal feuds interrupt with ingenious pertinacity the smooth course of love, until ultimately only one of the earlier blossoms is allowed to set into fruit. The throw of the dice which gives a title to the book is a method not unknown in some parts of Europe, by which two accomplished and agreeable young men on some unexplained cause of quarrel fight a mortal duel. The loser honourably performs his engagement by shooting himself through the head; and his friend determines to discover and punish the survivor. It might be objected that in such a case revenge is a violation of the conventional code of honour; but the morality of Corsica and Afghanistan is as consistent with human nature as the more refined theories of the Continental duellist. It is hardly necessary to add that the avenger falls in love with the sister of his intended victim, and that he prefers the sacrifice of his own happiness to the performance of his vow. It is either because such transactions could scarcely occur in England, or perhaps from deliberate preference of a somewhat less familiar region than a London drawing-room, that the scene of the tale is placed at Dresden, in a mixed society of English and German visitors and residents. As they are all excellent linguists, with the exception of a stupid and vulgar old gentleman who serves as the butt of the party, difference of language offers no impediment to free and pleasant intercourse. They all understand music, they all appreciate the great works of the Dresden Gallery, and some or all of them dance to perfection. For the ornamental and purely idle mode of existence which is the proper element of novels of society, no imaginary characters could be better suited. An artistic instinct suggested the introduction of deep shadows of death and revenge by way of background or shadow to a cheerful and sunny picture. It is not desirable to investigate too curiously the probability of events which are not altogether impossible.

The merit of the book consists mainly in the liveliness and unflagging spirit both of the narrative and of the dialogues. The writer is full of matter, which sometimes finds channels for itself in little digressions from the main line of the plot. The young gentlemen and ladies behave on ordinary occasions much like persons in real life; and even when they are periodically occupied with their mysteries and tragic complications, it is probable that their behaviour would in similar circumstances be found natural and suitable. The brevity of the book perhaps accounts for the abrupt termination of some of the episodes which seem to have been originally designed for subsidiary purposes. In the preface to the Excursion Wordsworth compares his lyrical poems to the side aisles and chapels of a great cathedral, of which the longer work represents the nave. In that case the appendages were far more beautiful than the central mass; and indeed the relation existed only in the fancy of the architect. Mr. Julian Walters's composition rather resembles a symmetrical labyrinth of clipped yew-hedges in an old-fashioned garden. The reader eventually lights on the path which connects every entrance with the centre; but in the meantime he has been repeatedly baffled while he has tried promising openings which end in nothing. It must be admitted that his morning's walk has been by far more interesting than if it had followed a straight line in which no perplexity could have arisen. It is a doubtful question of literary morality whether a writer is bound to satisfy the expectations of experienced and sagacious students of fiction. As on the stage the chief actor almost always appears in the first or second scene of the drama, and in the most conspicuous place, it may be plausibly contended that the hero, the heroine, and the villain of a novel should be distinguished from the first by signs which may be understood by the initiated. In the Cast of the Dice the apparent hero of the first chapter is in the second ruthlessly put to death, and the perpetrator of the deed, instead of expanding into a villain, finally succeeds to the vacant post of hero, or rather to an equal share of the dignity, which is, as it were, put in commission. In his turn, after winning the affection of an English young lady who had been all but engaged to one of her own countrymen, he is killed in the war of 1866. It cannot be denied that a bad ending to the whole of a story, or to any branch of it, is within the competence of a novelist; but, as a general rule, preliminary disasters and slaughters ought to be perpetrated at the expense of comparative strangers to the plot. It would have been a serious misfortune if Hamlet, instead of his unknown father, had been murdered in the garden before the commencement of the play. An ethical question of a different kind is raised by the conduct, not of the author, but of the persons of his story. The German characters are supposed to be acquainted with the custom of duelling with dice, and they naturally attach no blame to the unfortunate lover who has complied with the terms of the bargain; but, with curious inconsistency, they attribute as a crime to the successful combatant his acquiescence in the result. Moralists in England may perhaps hold that a perfect philanthropist ought to release his defeated adversary from the honourable obligation of putting himself to death; but, if similar laxity were to prevail, the duel by tossing up would become ridiculous, while it would cease to be barbarous. Parolles himself would not hesitate to vindicate his honour by a mortal combat in which he would incur no danger. On the whole, if there is such a thing as duty in a moral world turned upside down, it is clear that the victorious combatant with the dice-box is bound to exact punctual payment of the stake. The combination of a strict regard for human life with proceedings which verge upon murder and suicide is almost or wholly impracticable. In the story the winning combatant, as if by an awkward attempt at compromise, adopts the worst of all possible courses. If he had adhered to the doctrines of orthodox benevolence, he ought to have released his adversary from the pledge, or rather he ought never to have fought the duel. During the three or four weeks which elapsed before the forfeiture was due he forgets his triumph, or regards it with complacency; and at last, suddenly changing his mind, he sends a letter to release his opponent, unfortunately with a wrong direction. The sympathy which attends Shylock when he is cheated by his adversaries and judges would have been largely impaired if he had at the last moment wavered in the assertion of his right; but it may be fairly contended that Shylock would have been out of place at the person at Dresden, as brother of the beautiful Hilda and lover of the attractive Margaret.

The function of novelists is not unlike that of painters who look around them for landscapes and groups which are suited for representation. In the background of the present picture is a Bohemian castle with a widowed mother and an old priest, both brooding over revenge for the death of the favourite nursing of the house. In the centre are the party whose destinies are determined by their short season at Dresden, while their characters are dramatically displayed by their gestures and demeanour. Nothing can be more simple than that two young people should fall desperately in love while they are gazing or pretending to gaze on the Madonna of St. Sixtus. In actual life, and by stronger reason in fiction, a much smaller cause will serve to produce a natural result. It is also in accordance with common experience that a young lady should desert her half-accepted English lover for a picturesque foreigner who dances and sings and looks melancholy, and who can even make English verses. Such transactions proceed every day, and similar proceedings are described with more or less fidelity in many novels. It is the merit of Mr. Julian Walters that he makes a composition of his materials, and that his details are bright and lifelike. But for the name in the title-page, it might have been an amusing puzzle to conjecture whether the author was not rather an authoress. There is something of the minuteness of observation which has in this art, and in no other, enabled women to attain the foremost rank; yet an accurate critic would on the whole have decided in favour of a masculine origin. The melodrama which forms an essential part of the story might be consistent with either supposition. It is by the construction of character and by the expression of sentiment that male and female authors are most easily distinguished. Women seldom or never create a manly man; and it is highly probable that their rivals are equally unskilful in their delineation of women. In stories of domestic English life a rough indication is generally afforded by the choice between the drawing-room and the dining-room after dinner. Few novelists venture on a description of the mysteries with which they are respectively unacquainted. At Dresden, as might be expected, there is no temporary separation, and, as if to thwart curious inquiries, several confidential conversations among persons of the same sex are reported with apparent accuracy, or, in other words, with dramatic propriety. It is not impossible that in some respects the novel might have been better if it had been longer, inasmuch as there would have been room to work out more fully the minor characters and the collateral events. The story of the quarrel which led to the duel, and consequently to everything that happens afterwards, is left untold; and the fate of the English members of the Dresden group is somewhat hastily sketched at the end of the book. On the other hand, it is much better to be too short than to be too long; and the author has successfully avoided the fatal error of becoming tedious. With the exception of the comic old uncle, there is no one in the book whose company is troublesome; and there are many precedents of disagreeable characters who serve perhaps as foils or as indirect stimulants to readers of novels. It often happens that a first novel contains the accumulated experience and sentiment of years, and that in a second attempt a once successful writer only draws on an exhausted reservoir. Mr. Julian Walters has a fertility of invention and a freshness of thought which renders it probable that in another work he would be equally full of matter, and that he would have additional facility in disposing of his subject. Many an orator feels when he sits down that he could make a better speech of topics and illustrations which he has forgotten or omitted than his actual performance; and probably there are writers of fiction who would be the better for the training of a first trial, though it might have exhausted their weaker competitors.

COOKE'S HANDBOOK OF BRITISH FUNGI.*

THOUGH more than one British Flora has in time past included, or attempted, a mycological section, yet it is more than a third of a century since the appearance of Berkeley's Mycologic Flora, and in thirty-five years modern science has added much to its discoveries in this as well as in other fields. In truth, however, there has been little inducement to make such additions known, seeing that the whole race has been treated with undeserved contempt; and, lying under the stigma of a vulgar nickname, falsely but frequently applied to it en masse, it has been so overlooked, even by botanists, that while manuals more or less scientific of flowering plants exist in plenty to choose from, anything like a thorough conspectus of fungology has been always a desideratum. Nevertheless, for the economic uses of its genera and species, as well as for its singularity and oftentimes beauty, as a natural feature of wood and plain and of daily observation at home and abroad, the fungus is worthy of a closer and more familiar acquaintance; and in his present work Mr. Cooke has gone further towards promoting this than any other Englishman that can be named. Badham, Berkeley, and Bull are names of investigators to whom we owe all the light we have upon esculent fungi; and Mr. Cooke himself is the author of elementary introductions to this branch of botany, second to none of the writings of those authors. But till now there has been no English work on the subject fit to rank as a standard book of research and reference, so that these volumes step at once into a place too long vacant. Their only drawback is that, though vast pains have been lavished on the task of collection and classification, and though the initiated will find the work well nigh exhaustive within its limits, it presents the somewhat dry and uninviting aspect of a Flora without an introduction. The discovery of new matter has been so considerable as to interfere with and postpone the appearance of a concomitant introduction, a sine qua non to the learner and beginner; and, though Mr. Cooke has used a sound discretion as to the adoption of a fanciful and transitional nomenclature of new genera from the Continent, the necessary dimensions of his new matter account for an omission which is not the less to be regretted.

It is indeed to the somewhat austere and rigidly scientific aspect of this Handbook that the fact of our not having noticed it earlier must be imputed. Fortunately, we have lately fallen in with the new and revised issue of the same author's Plain and Easy Account of the British Fungi (Hardwicke), and this, for want of a better, has served to us the purpose of an introduction, furnishing in a popular form a host of suggestive hints to work out and realize by aid of the more scientific book. In fact, it is hard to see how else than by such an introduction are to be discovered those landmarks of classification which make the afterwork of reference to the genera, sub-genera, and species of the larger Handbook easy and interesting. There are the so-called Cohorts, for example, which comprehend the whole race in the twofold division of sporiferi, which have the spores or reproductive bodies naked or exposed, and the sporidiferi, which have these contained in bags. There are, again, the four families which constitute the first cohort or division, according as they have the hymenium (or fructifying surface, distributed over gills, tubes, pores, or fibres) the most prominent object, or wrapt in a peridium or womb, from which it is expelled when mature; or have the spores most conspicuous and minute, and of a dustlike nature; or, again, have their spores borne upon distinctive threads—of which families our ideal mushroom, puffball, mildew, and blue-mould may be taken as respective types. The other division consists of a very interesting group, technically termed "ascomycetes," from the cells in which the spores are developed—a group which contains the morels, and their substitutes the Helvellas, the truffles, and other genera which, though not like the last-named dainties and esculents, have such a curious connexion as the Helorium and the Claviceps. This second division is linked to the first by a group of "mycorrhizous fungi," the so-called Physomyces, which have their spores enclosed in bladder-like cells. Of the members of all these families, the properties, habitats, forms, and physique of each, it would be impossible in moderate limits to give even the most cursory account. In the most prominent order of the first family, the Agaricini, or gill-bearers, a test or criterion is whether the gills which traverse the under surface of the cap or pileus are remote, free, adnate, or decurrent; and though these distinctive epithets are duly and exactly given in the Handbook, it is the lesser volume which tells us that they refer to the relation of the interior extremities of the gills to the stem of each particular fungus. In discriminating agarics which have some seeming resemblance this test may be applied amongst others—as, for instance, though the parasol agaric (procerus) differs more from Agaricus rachodes and A. exorhizatus in the thicker cuticle of its pileus than in the relation of the gills to the stem, yet, as the Handbook notes, these in "procerus" are very remote, in rachodes remote, and in exorhizatus rather remote (pp. 12-13). As A. procerus is the only one of the three which Mr. Cooke ventures to recommend for cooking, the tests of "which is which" are of some importance.

Under the sub-genus Tricholoma—a group of agarics with their gills notched at the end next the stem, and one which has the recommendation of having many fairly esculent and no unwholesome species—comes the Agaricus Gamboasus, or St. George's mushroom, which is all the more precious as its advent is remote, and not, as is the case with most esculent fungi, autumnal. Probably this is the origin of its popular name, and one of the causes by which we reject the pretensions to it of another eduliant, Trametes. The latter, besides appearing in autumn, is found in the woods, and not as the former, in the pastures, and belongs to the series with salmon-coloured spores, whereas A. Gamboasus is a member of the white-spored series. The new-mint odour of the pretender, which, however, is not only inconstant, but wholesome, is another point of distinction from the rightful "St. George," which is rather strong-scented. The Agaricus ostreatus, another white-spored agaric of esculent qualities, has a like pretender to its honour; but whilst the similarity might lead to dangerous consequences, seeing that both are not equally edible, the true is an autumnal, the false a spring visitant.

Respecting the distinctions between the Agaricus campestris and the A. arvensis—the former the common, the latter the horse-mushroom—mycologists do not appear to be so particular as gourmards; and for the matter of that, out of England neither of them is held in such esteem as many other fungi which we do not venture to adopt as food. Both belong to the brown-spored species of agaric, and the gills of the arvensis are at first paler and then darker than the campestris. In this case, as in others, it is a sound caution to reject all that betrays age and that are not fresh gathered, and there is plausibility in Mr. Cooke's suggestion that the horse-mushroom might be improved by cultivation, so as to rival in every respect the ordinary mushroom of the made beds.

Among the other genera of the order Agaricini are several which are both esculent and possessed of other curious properties. From the black spores of the Coprinus comatus, or "maned agaric," the Robinson Crusoe's Cap of fungology, edible when young, and doubtless used for hetchups, as well as from an allied species, is produced a black fluid, which, boiled and strained, and prevented from getting mouldy by the addition of a little corrosive sublimate, produces a very good ink. Then there are the Hygrophori, with three culinary species; the Lactarii, with two, which the "Handbook" and the "Plain and Easy Account" distinguish lucidly from other and less pleasant or wholesome species; the brilliant "russulus," of which U. Vesca is edible, but most rare; and Russula emetica, brilliant, noxious, and rare, happily, also. Mr. Cooke notes that this last class is best avoided for fear of a mistake; and there is good ground for the caution, now that curiosity seems to be gradually taking the place of the indifference which is evidenced by the absence of any popular names for so many genera of fungi. Of the Agaricini it must be said in praise, that "out of 1,000 species one-tenth are esculent, and one-sixth part not unwholesome."

In the second order, the Polyporci, or "pore-bearing fungi," so called from having the under surface of the pileus picked and perforated with pores, which represent the extremities of connected tubes on the inner lining of which is borne the fructifying surface, one well-known genus is the Boletus. Of this there are good, bad, and indifferent species; the best, "Edulis," distinguishable from its congeners by the reticulation of its stem, and the effect of cutting upon the colour of the juice or milk of the stem. In the unwholesome species this speedily turns blue. Boleti with reddish stems, or with red or crimson under surface of pileus, should, we are taught, be summarily rejected, under which ban would come the "Boletus Satanas" (so called, doubtless, because "it plays the devil" with the stomach and life of the eater), and "Boletus luridus," with stems blood-red and vermilion-red respectively (see Handbook, pp. 257-8). A not less interesting genus is the Polyporus, which differs from the last-named in having its pores less easily separable. Of these there is a great variety, some being succulent, others as dense and hard as wood. We quote the Polyporus squamosus, distinguishable by its lateral stem, and its scaly, pale-ochre, fan-shaped pileus, not for its edible qualities—for, as Mrs. Hussey says, "you might as well eat saddle-flaps"—but because of its enormous and rapid growth. "Dr. Greville mentions an instance of its attaining a circumference of seven feet five inches, and weighing thirty-four pounds, after having been cut four days." Its most ingenious use is to make razor-strops, for which "Polyporus betulinus," growing on birch trees, as "squamosus" does on decayed ash, will do as well. "Polyporus intybacus," said to be edible when its dark-coloured pileus, which is so broken up as to resemble a cluster of distinct individuals, is cut off, and only the branching stem stewed, is rather uncommon in England; but "P. sulphureus," very commonly seen on the trunks of trees, and consisting of a branched mass of "pileoli," though not edible, is notable for its phosphorescence when under the process of decomposition. The luminosity of fungi is a property said to be more observable in the tropics than in our temperate regions; but Mr. Cooke reminds the readers of his smaller book (p. 8) that what schoolboys called touchwood was the decaying wood of an old stump, permeated with the mycelium of a fungus. We might dwell upon other genera of the pore-bearing fungi—for instance, the Merulius, a species of which, M. lacrymans, is known under the name of dry rot. Not that it is dry, but drying. As if weeping for the havoc it is destined to do, it turns the structure to which it clings to dust, and the only antidote to its mischief is croscote. Or we might notice the tooth-bearing fungi of Order III., among which the typical genus is the Hydnum, several species of which are edible; the club-bearing fungi, of which some kinds, with white spores, are eaten, cooked like asparagus; and one, Sparassis crispa, is said to resemble a cauliflower, and to be excellent eating. But we must pass by these and a vast number of other orders and families, and content ourselves with noting one or two curiosities of the "Mould" family of fungi, and of particular genera of the cup-like, and often almost microscopic Elvellacei. The "yeast plant" is a fungus belonging to the blue moulds or "Mucedines" (cf. 102 "Easy Account," and pp. 601-2 of the "Handbook"), and to the genus Penicillium. To the same order of Moulds belongs the fungus, discoverable only by the microscope, which Mr. Berkeley and Professor Goodsir, with the concurrence of eminent German men of science, have declared to be the cause of the potato disease. This is by Berkeley and in Stephens's Book of the Farm (i. 2,010-20) called "Botrytis infestans"; by Mr. Cooke it is referred to the genus Peronospora, the same ill-omened epithet being attached (see p. 593). Its slender threads of mycelium penetrate the tender stems and leaves and tubers of the potato, just as other roots are penetrated by kindred peronospora. Here, then, is a case in which an acquaintance with mycology might subserve other uses than to minister to the tastes of the epicure, or please the curious eye of the student of nature. This potato-infesting "mould" is not noticed in Mr. Cooke's lesser book, but it is described and illustrated with great exactness in his Handbook. So, when we come to the order to which belongs our English substitute for the Morell, the Helvella crispa, he describes a curious genus allied to the beautiful Pezizas, from which it differs in having its disc open instead of closed, and in being somewhat more uncommon. Not useful for food, it has indirectly contributed to the curiosities of English manufacture. For the handsome Tunbridge ware is used a variety of English oak timber of a mineral green colour. This colouring is due to the presence of a fungus:—

A handsome little species resembling a Peziza (Helotium æruginosum) traverses with its mycelium the whole fabric of such wood, and these minute threads give their green tint to the timber. When examined under the microscope the beautiful network of the mycelium is distinctly seen. This fungus attacks the fallen oak branches, and the timber affected by it is generally small in diameter; but, from the minute size required in the manufacture for which it is employed, it answers equally with the largest. Green wood is so exceedingly uncommon that, although in a state of decay, the green oak becomes of a marketable value. The little green open cups of this Helotium are not so commonly met with as the timber showing traces of its mycelium.—P. 112, "Easy Account."

For equally lively descriptions of the virtues and uses of particular classes of fungi Mr. Cooke's lesser book may be referred to with a certainty of satisfaction. The larger Handbook will supply the precise and scientific data respecting each. For his promised Introduction to it we shall look with interest.

THE RAJAH OF KOLHAPPOOR.*

LONDON society has for some years past admitted in an increasing degree within its pale an element altogether new, and by no means without significance. A stream of visitors from our great Eastern dependency perpetually setting through the Western metropolis has something in it to call up suggestions of a time when the Orontes newly flowed into the Tiber. In the more distinguished of these cases we have the agreeable blending of all that is highest and best in the most opposite types of civilization. The suavity and suppleness of the most ancient aristocracy in the world are shown in harmony with the more solid culture and stiffer demeanour of European training. The swart features and the lithe grace of Eastern physique gain relief from, or impart a picturesqueness to, the groups among which our new guests find themselves brought into free and friendly contact. Gorgeous in kinkhob or in flaming turbans, our Indian magnificos light up the funeral gloom of male attire, to the delight and pride of many a hostess, in London drawing-rooms. Ready and fluent even to glibness in small talk, they overwhelm the average insular intelligence with their command of the English tongue, which they speak, be it noted, with a grammatical correctness and an absence of slang altogether above the ordinary colloquial standard. Many of their number win for themselves high places in the competition for legal, literary, or medical honours, and not a few seem likely to cluster together into a new and hopeful brotherhood in the community of trade. Subtle and keen of intellect, initiated from early years into the lore both of native and Western philosophy, their professed belief is for the most part that of utter and intense materialism, whilst their emancipation from the trammels of the past gives them a thorough indifference to being judged in meat or in drink or in respect of a holy day. Neither Koran nor Shaster stands in the way of indulgence in the European's choicest tastes in food or liquor. Carrying back to the land of their birth ideas and habits acquired or strengthened during their Western sojourn, it is of the highest import to know what is likely to come of the heaven thus gradually spreading itself through the wide mass of Indian society. What degree of change is to be expected in the Oriental mind itself? What will be the novel relations between the native class and their English fellow-subjects, between whom and themselves the social and intellectual gulf of former days has to so great an extent been bridged? As a further point of interest and moment, we shall be glad to know somewhat of the impressions formed upon observant and reflecting minds like theirs by what our guests have seen and stored up of our own ways of action, thought, and social organization. English life and manners can hardly fail of eventual, if indirect, gain from having a fresh and penetrating eye turned upon their points of weakness or anomaly. Home society will at all events have the gain of a novel sensation from seeing its features held up to view in the mirror of a bright and polished alien criticism.

Of what we may look forward to seeing as a new class of Anglo-Indian literature a kind of first-fruit has come before us in the Diary of the late Rajah of Kolhapoor (we follow the editor in his mode of spelling the name of this State, although not more satisfied than he professes himself to be as to its being the best). Of the critical worth of the Rajah's record of what he saw and heard during his stay amongst us we have not much to say. It amounts to little more than the daily round of sight-seeing and visit-paying which a stranger of rank and of social instincts would naturally go through. His editor is nevertheless right in believing that its appearance in print will have an interest, not for those alone with whom the young prince was brought into personal contact during his brief stay, but for that larger section of the public to whom Indian topics of whatever kind are of growing concern. The Kolhapoor Rajah was the first actually reigning Hindoo who had paid England a visit. During the six months spent by him in this island, the young prince, only twenty-two years of age, won golden opinions wherever he went. Speaking our language fluently and correctly, he could enter with ease and enjoyment into all that the best society had to offer in the way of instruction or amusement. His mildness and refinement of manner, joined with his quickness in receiving impressions, raised an amount of promise which was sadly blighted by the news of his death from violent internal congestion within a few days of quitting our shores. The burning of the corpse of an Indian prince in accordance with the rites of the Hindoo religion, for which permission was after some difficulty obtained from the Italian Government through the good offices of the British Minister, Sir A. Paget, was a strange spectacle upon the banks of the Arno. In his native State the public grief at his premature loss was mingled with sinister misgivings and searchings of heart among the stricter circles of native orthodoxy, connecting itself as it did with the decease of the Rajah of Kuppurthulla on his way to England across the black water. By none was the prince more sincerely mourned than by the officer who knew him best, under whose charge as governor and political agent he had been for four years in India, and by whom the young Rajah was accompanied during his European tour. Having watched with intense interest the effects of this visit upon a mind which he had himself carefully trained and studied, Captain West speaks with an authority which no one else could possess of the many good qualities that endeared his young charge to all around him. Without boasting any unusual amount of intellect, his faculties of observation were keen and correct. Too little given to habits of reflection and analysis, he has not indeed enabled us to see much of the effect wrought upon his own mind by what he saw and heard. One highly sensible remark of his, however, we learn from a letter written to a friend in India not long after his arrival in England—namely, that he had learned how very insignificant a person the Rajah of Kolhapoor was out of his own territory. A certain shock was produced upon his mind by the sight of how little state was kept up by high officials, the Prime Minister and Secretary of State for India walking quietly to a railway station, carrying their own umbrellas. The tenor of his diary in general is that of a simple record of the people he had met with and the sights he had seen from day to day, expressed in almost boyish language, and showing a disposition to be pleased with everything and everybody. He attends lectures and concerts, dances quadrilles and lancers, and has no objection to champagne. He has always an ear especially open to all mention of Indian subjects, and was forcibly struck at the British Association meeting at Liverpool by the paper on Indian ports and harbours, though even more attractive was the Mayor's ball, where two thousand persons were present, where he was introduced to Mr. Jefferson Davis, and "enjoyed this evening immensely." Vigorously as he threw himself into all that was characteristic of European life, he was careful enough while in London, on the 4th of October, to celebrate the Hindoo feast of Pussara; and on the 24th of the same month, after his return from Ireland, to keep the Dewallee holiday. Altogether he "felt leaving England." Among the impressions which were either created or strengthened in the young prince's mind by his sojourn here were those of the need for the emancipation of women from the bondage under which they labour in India. One of his last acts before leaving this country was to make arrangements for sending out an English governess for the education of his family.

In his introduction Captain West gives a short sketch of the history and present constitution of the Kolhapoor State, with such particulars of the late Rajah's ancestry as are needed for the edification of those who are imperfectly conversant with Indian matters. By the genius and energy of Sivajee, however, shadowed in part by the conquering might of Aurungzebe, the Mahrattas, who had for three centuries almost disappeared under the Mussulman yoke, were raised towards the end of the seventeenth century into the ruling Power of India. Readers of Captain Meadows Taylor's interesting Tara, a Mahratta Tale, will retain in mind the recital of the romantic series of plots and stratagems culminating in the treacherous murder of Afzool Khan, the Mahomedan leader, whereby Sivajee, believed to be under the special patronage of the goddess Rowance, carved for himself a kingdom out of the neighbouring State of Beejapoor. But for the check received from the Afghan invaders on the North-west, and afterwards from the English, the Mahrattas would ere long have been more truly lords paramount in India than ever were the Moguls. At his death, in 1680, Sivajee left two sons, Sumbajee and Rajaram, the former of whom was put to death, and the latter imprisoned by Aurungzebe, by whose machinations the descendants of Rajaram were reduced to the limits of Kolhapoor and Sattara, under two separate, though kindred, dynasties. Sattara, from the failure of direct heirs to the last Rajah, lapsed to the British Crown in 1849, Kolhapoor remaining still an independent territory, though not playing a prominent part in the history of India. The direct line of Sivajee lapsing in 1760, an heir was adopted from a collateral branch of the family with whom the first treaty was made by the British Government in 1765, followed by others whereby, in 1812, the Rajah ceded his chief port and acquired for his remaining possessions the British guarantee. His successor, showing himself our staunch ally during our war with the Peishwar, was rewarded with a grant of two districts previously wrested from him, as well as with a further guarantee. By the murder of this prince in 1821 the State passed to his brother Bowa Sahib, whose turbulence drew upon him more than one expedition of British troops, followed by forfeiture of territory. His death in 1837 led to the appointment of a regency, his son being but a child, and in 1844, serious disturbances having broken out, a political superintendent was permanently appointed by the British Government, since which the State of Kolhapoor has enjoyed marked peace and prosperity. During the mutiny, in spite of a local outbreak or two, the district remained quiet as a whole, and the Rajah was for his fidelity rewarded with the Star of India. On his death-bed, in 1866, he adopted as his heir his sister's son Nagojee Rao, then but sixteen years of age, who, by the change of name customary upon adoption, was thenceforward called Rajaram. Brought up under the care of Captain West, aided by a Parsee graduate of the Bombay University, the young Rajah showed from an early age an aptitude for public business, and in 1870 was formally placed in charge of what is known as the Khasee, or private department of State, as a preparation for the more ample discharge of State affairs. In that year his strong desire to visit England, overcoming all the obstacles so formidable to a Hindoo, led to the journey which ended so disastrously for the young prince himself, and for the hopes of a long and useful career which had been built upon his many promising qualities. His diary, slightly corrected or pruned, as we are assured by the editor, here and there, deserves to be regarded as a hopeful sign of what has been done and is doing under British auspices for the training of the native rulers of India.

WITHOUT KITH OR KIN.*

THE sufferings of two little waifs and strays, runaways from a travelling booth where the one has to tumble and the other to dance and sing, and where both are ill treated, begin the story of Without Kith or Kin. In a book of this kind we are not required to accept everything literally, else we might take exception to the children's experiences, which remind us a little too much of those old romances where lovely ladies are carried off by bold robbers and kept in caves and woods, with a happy immunity from meteorological conditions or millinery exigencies. Liz and Joe, aged respectively nine and seven, vanish one night from the caravan where they and their tyrants sleep, and set out into the darkness and the "great, lonely, unknown world," with a silver sixpence in his pocket and a penny in hers as their sole wealth. For more than a fortnight they wander about with but little food and no kind of shelter, sleeping on doorsteps in the towns, on felled trees or wet bracken in the woods, living on raw corn, varied by blackberries, with occasional spells of bread and coffee when folks were charitable and the piping voice of the girl had earned a few pence to keep them from actual starvation. But we fancy that two such tender young creatures would have succumbed sooner than they did; and that if they had gone through half the privations assigned to them, they would have died long before they came to the house of strict, straightforward, unimaginative, but kindly Mrs. Breton. Again, we might object to the preponderance of womanliness in Liz at nine years of age, as contrasted with the weakness of Joe at seven. Our own masculine pride may be piqued at the preference; no one knows his own feelings; but as students of humanity we really think Miss Craik has been unjust in the apportionment of strength and unselfishness, and that if she has not made Joe too "thin-natured" and disagreeable altogether, she has drawn Liz as virtuous out of all proportion to her age and education. There is a certain acidity too in the author's mode of speaking of Joe that is not pleasant, because so entirely unphilosophical. A child cannot be judged by the rules of a high morality, nor can its childish faults be held as real and essential things. It is scarcely more reprehensible, in any grave sense, than a horse or a dog, though for purposes of education it has to be taught the difference between right and wrong, and punished for its mistakes; and to blame it too rigorously for want of courage or constancy, or of the power of bearing up against pain and privation, is to blame the blossom for not bearing fruit, and to call the sapling weak because it is not as sturdy as the oak.

In her anxiety to avoid all dubious imputations, Miss Craik has surely made her runaways too young for the one part and too innocent for the other. Children of the ages of Joe and Liz, who have been knocked about the world with a travelling booth, get wonderfully sharp in certain directions; and we very much doubt the truth of that trembling, shrinking delicacy ascribed to Liz, or the maintenance, after a little experience, of her modest dislike to her not immodest displays on "the boards." In point of fact, acrobats and showmen of all ages and kinds love their profession. The children are delighted at the glitter and the applause, and the elders think nothing equal to their own performances, and are the proudest and most contented people in the world. And in point of fact, too, no showman would have kept either Joe or Liz if he had not been able to make more of them than "Old Shakes" seems to have done. Their continuance at the booth argues an exceptional amount of amiability on his part, for he evidently does not think he gets his shilling's worth for his shilling, if he feels, as he says, that, had "Liz done her dooty she'd have been an Infant Prodigy before this," and that thin-natured little Joe purposely slips and slides down to mother earth when he ought to be tumbling bravely in mid-air, and forming the apex of the Living Pyramid. These little discrepancies between fact and fable, and a certain tendency to diffuseness and padding, are the main faults observable in Without Kith or Kin; unless we count the slavish adoration of Elizabeth for David Wentworth a fault, as we fancy many of Miss Craik's younger and more high-spirited lady readers will. Nevertheless Elizabeth August, if somewhat too sickly and sentimental, and decidedly too much of a Griselda in her want of dignity and self-respect, deserves consideration as the portrait of a pure, unselfish, and devoted woman, with a large power of love and as large a power of self-suppression, a natural martyr, and misunderstood from the beginning, always giving more of sympathy, if not of direct help, than she receives, and bearing on her hands the spiritual burdens of her friends, who however never so much as touch her sorrows with their little fingers.

Elizabeth's history ranges over a wide space of time; from the age of nine to that of past forty; but the keynote is struck in the beginning when, a half-starved little runaway, she goes without her rightful share of the loaf that Joe may have more than his, and gives him up the best of everything, though he repays her only with ingratitude. We cannot say, however, that we have much sense of growth or development in this character. Liz at nine and Elizabeth August at past forty are essentially the same. There is no attempt at that subtle character-painting which portrays growth while it includes identity, and which shows how, by the gradual changes wrought by age and experience, the mind takes this or that more determined direction, and things which were in the beginning only mere indications become leading and dominant characteristics. A few skilful touches can suggest all this, without going into tedious details; but these touches are just the difficulties of the art, and it is given but to few to accomplish them. At the worst, however, if Miss Craik's simple method suggests a curious monotony and stagnation in Elizabeth August, it preserves a certain homogeneity which might have been lost if she had attempted a more ambitious and analytical delineation.

The best character in the book, because the most marked and individual, is that of Mrs. Breton. Kind yet arbitrary, shrewd yet generous, she does good in her generation, yet makes people excessively unhappy in the process. She takes care of Joe in his mortal illness, and charges herself with the future well-being of Liz. But she shows neither to the dying child nor the desolate one any of that warm maternal instinct with which it might be imagined she must be overflowing; and though she interests herself in the little girl, and has her educated well and carefully for a governess, instead of, as would have seemed more natural, either sending her to the workhouse or bringing her up as a servant, she never seems to remember that Liz is a human being with affections that need gratifying, and probably with independent wishes of her own, but manipulates her as she might have manipulated a lump of wax or a block of wood bound to take such shape as it pleased her to impose on it. Also, in her action with her daughter Mabel of the golden tresses, whose misplaced attachment she interrupts with so much decision, though perfectly right in what she does, she yet manages to give that sentimental young lady a great deal more pain than need be, chiefly because of that want of womanly tenderness which yet can exist with essential kindness and good meaning; as indeed Miss Craik has indicated with considerable cleverness. Mrs. Breton is a specimen of a hard-headed woman with a strong will; and we own that the portrait, though meriting our respect, by no means wins our love. The older of her two daughters, Pauline, who marries a man odd enough to leave his own place and peril his wife's health and his children's lives in India, on the plea of having something to do, is a happy medium between her mother's surplussage of decision and her sister's excess of sentiment; indeed, she is the most charming of all the women, and undoubtedly the most healthy.

Of David Wentworth, Elizabeth's ideal, we cannot say much beyond the confession that he is an ideal—that is, a lovely creature without bones, muscles, or articulations; a semi-divine personage devoid of all human weaknesses, but devoid also of most human qualities; a portrait much too idealistic to be true. He is one of those loftily familiar beings, too, who call a woman "child" on an early acquaintance, and who gracefully allow themselves to be loved, magnanimously dropping little crumbs of comfort and encouragement by the way just to keep the fire up to its proper temperature; but who at the same time take care not to compromise themselves by any premature avowal, and are content to live for years, offering themselves to silent adoration before they reward their patient worshippers with the longed-for word of love. We are not quite of the same mind as Elizabeth respecting Mr. Wentworth's perfections; but we are somewhat reconciled to him when, at the end, he does lift up his prostrate devotee when they are both of a ripe old age, and so makes bright the sunset of a life of which the morning had been tempestuous and the noon grey and overcast. Still we protest against this slavish and unsought love in a woman; though, at the same time, we admire the purity and delicacy with which Miss Craik has described the heroine's feelings and situations. This indeed is the greatest charm of the author. She is always pure, always lady-like; and if not so strong at all times, nor so philosophically just as might be, she is tender and aspiring, and with a keen sense of right and wrong.

We have spoken plainly of the faults of Without Kith or Kin because it has so many excellences that it can afford to be judged by a higher standard than usual. Miss Craik no longer requires the helping hand held out by kindly indulgence to well-meaning incompetency. She is an established writer with a clearly defined career, and of unmistakable capacity; but she must beware of sentimentalism and padding, and remember that idealism is better as a servant in literature than as a master.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

IT is no part of our task to enter into a detailed examination of such a work as Dr. Hodge's Systematic Theology.* It may suffice to say that the second volume now before us is limited to those portions of a general scheme of divinity which deal with the nature, condition, history, and destiny of man; that it discusses at great length the doctrines of various sects and schools, theological and scientific, orthodox and heterodox, respecting the origin and antiquity of the human species, original sin, the scheme of redemption, election, predestination, and the other intricate questions affecting the character and fate of mankind which have been for centuries the theme of theological controversy; and that the author writes as an orthodox Protestant, a firm believer in the inspiration of Scripture, and a resolute disbeliever in most of the received conclusions of modern science. The volume contains more than 700 large octavo pages of pretty close type, and bears testimony to the diligence and learning of the writer, whatever judgment may be formed of his wisdom and discrimination.

Equally ponderous and extensive is Dr. Martyn Paine's work in defence of the immortality of the soul* and of the Scriptural history of creation against the materialistic tendencies which he ascribes to modern science. With the theological portion of his work we have no concern; its geological theories come more properly under our notice, and are curious from the vigour and vivacity with which the author reasserts views which among men of any pretensions to scientific culture have long since been obsolete. He insists that all the existing rocks, fossiliferous and other, were created at the date assigned to the creation of man, or subsequently, and that the coal measures are relics of the Noachian Deluge, the forests which covered the earth at that period having been swept en masse into the regions in which coal is now found, and there arranged in layers and buried beneath successive beds of shale and sand by the action of oceanic currents. The effects usually ascribed to a glacial epoch, supposed to have occurred some thousands of centuries before, Dr. Paine also regards as evidences of the Deluge; the raging floods having swept over the face of hills, carrying heavy masses of broken stone with them, abrading surfaces, marking the denuded rocks with vast scratches, and piling up in various places what are recognized by scientific geologists as "terminal moraines," besides depositing boulders in the places where they are now found. In other passages he challenges the chemists; disputing the reality of their supposed power to produce true organic substances—albumen, urea, &c.—in the laboratory, as well as strenuously denying the theory of spontaneous generation. Elsewhere he falls foul of the Darwinian theory, and of the geologists who have given in their adhesion to it. Considering the character, learning, and authority of some of the men whom he assails, and that he comes forward alone to impugn every result of modern scientific discovery, a little more modesty in laying down the law, and a little more deference towards the great names whose authority he disputes, would not have been unbecoming; but we are bound to allow that Dr. Paine does his best to be civil according to his lights, and that it is only his overweening confidence in views which the common consent of scientific men has pronounced absurd and untenable that brings him into such violent conflict with them, and gives to his writing the air of conceit and petulance that it wears. We need hardly say that the volume is not to be recommended to beginners; those who have really mastered the subjects of which it treats may find in it here and there grounds for reflection and reconsideration, and everywhere matter of amusement.

Dr. Wharton's "Conflict of Laws"† is a work of obvious painstaking and apparent merit on a very important and interesting subject. There are few more curious or less settled portions of jurisprudence than that which relates to what the author calls "Private International Law," or, in other words, the collision of the laws of different nations as it affects those persons who may from time to time be brought under their operation. For example, until very lately, a large number of the citizens of America, if taken in arms for their country against Great Britain, would have been technically liable to the penalties of treason; and German emigrants returning to their native country on a visit found themselves entangled in grave difficulties by the German system of military service, it having been the practice of nations in past times to assert an indefeasible claim over the allegiance of their born subjects, and England carrying that claim so far as to regard as Englishmen the children and grandchildren of an Englishman who might have settled and married abroad a century ago. The "conflict of laws" on this point—for the nations who maintained this theory never hesitated to naturalize each other's subjects—has now been settled by treaty so far as the United States are concerned. But there are still a multitude of cases in which private interests are seriously affected by the different laws of different countries. Among these are marriage and divorce. A Frenchman may come over to England, marry here, return to France, and repudiate his marriage because some requirement of French law—perhaps the consent of parents—was omitted. Or an Englishwoman may go over to America, profess to settle in Illinois, and obtain a divorce on the flimsiest grounds. In the States she can marry again, but her husband in England cannot do so; and the divorce would not be recognized in England for any purpose whatever, civil or criminal. Nay, similar difficulties have occurred when a Scotch Court has dissolved an English marriage: Scotland being for many purposes a foreign country. There are difficulties, again, where a man holding property in one country dies and leaves a will made according to the laws of another. The difference of commercial laws introduces perpetual subjects of difference. Extradition is another topic of great interest and considerable intricacy. All these points, together with that "law of domicile" which more or less governs them all, are elaborately discussed in Dr. Wharton's treatise, with a very full citation of cases and precedents, and in language simple enough to be intelligible to most cultivated men, even though they should not have received a legal training. The difficulty of finding a remedy for the "conflict of laws" increases as the nature and consequences of the conflict itself are more clearly understood; and if any one thinks that an extension of the principle of lex loci contractus could easily be made to settle all disputable points, we can only recommend him to study this volume carefully, and consider how the application of such a rule would have worked on some of the cases set forth.

Mr. David Dudley Field was a member of a Committee of Jurists of all nations appointed at the meeting of the British Social Science Association in 1866 to prepare and report the outlines of an International Code, with the view of having a complete code afterwards framed which might be submitted for the consideration and sanction of different Governments, and which, fortified by that sanction, might become in fact the public law of the civilized world. The work was distributed among the members of the Committee, and to Mr. Field, the author of the proposal, was assigned a special part of the task. Finding, however, that his colleagues were less zealous or less hopeful than himself, he thought it best to prepare in effect an outline of the entire code; and he here presents us with an instalment* which treats of the international law of times of peace. Proceeding upon the basis of existing law, but altering and enlarging all rules where necessary, giving in each instance reasons and explanations, Mr. Field has elaborated a code of rules to regulate the intercourse and mutual rights of nations during peace. He next deals with the rights of individuals in those cases in which the subjects of one country are most commonly affected by the difference between its laws and those of another, and which form the subject of Dr. Wharton's more complete and perhaps more effective treatise; and he proposes general regulations and definitions in regard to marriage, guardianship, property, copyright, money, weights and measures, contracts, and so forth, to govern all such cases, as well as a much-needed code of law for the government of ships while at sea, and the ascertainment of such points of commercial law as salvage and general average between subjects of different States. It is not likely, perhaps, that the work should attain its professed object, and serve even as the basis of a code; but it may nevertheless do excellent service in calling attention to the subject as a whole, in formulating the various floating rules and principles which hitherto have been scattered through us as a set of professional works, and in suggesting practical means of dealing with difficult or disputed points.

The most interesting of the works that form our list for this month is a brief and succinct State Paper transmitted by Governor Hoffman of New York to the State Legislature, containing a Report on the system of local taxation†, and the scheme of a new fiscal code, drawn up by three Commissioners, of whom Mr. David A. Wells, perhaps the highest and soundest authority on these subjects in America, is the first. The paper is all that might be expected from such an author: clear and accurate in its statements, logical in its inferences, practical and reasonable in its suggestions. It is curious that at a time when English reformers are complaining of the exemption of personality from local taxation, and of the unjust burdens thereby thrown on real property, American opinion is being gradually drawn by force of experience in the very opposite direction, and tends to relieve personal property from all direct imposts, in the belief that both realty and personality will profit in the long run by the change. It is not long since we noted a report by a Massachusetts official pointing out the mischievous influence of the local taxation of movable property in driving it with its owners from the highly taxed cities to the lightly rated villages. It is more difficult to evade State taxes in this way; but the present Report shows reason to believe that the greater portion of the taxable personality of the State does contrive to evade the burden, which consequently falls most unequally on such property as cannot escape. It will be remembered that American direct taxation is levied on capital values, not on income, and often ranges as high as one and a half or two per cent. upon the former. Thus the large incomes often earned by professional labour are exempt, while realized property and savings, unless invested in United States bonds, pay from one-seventh to one-fourth of their whole income in taxes. The gravest anomalies are found to be inevitable. Thus the States have generally attempted to tax all personality belonging to their citizens, and at the same time all property situated within their jurisdiction; and the result is that the same stock or goods may be taxed twice over, once in the State where it is situated, and once in that where the owner is domiciled—a proceeding which, as the Commissioners show, is probably unconstitutional, and would be disallowed by the Federal Courts. Again, as in some States a taxpayer is not allowed to deduct his debts from his valuation, a merchant worth 20,000 dollars may be taxed on the contents of his warehouses, worth perhaps 100,000 dollars, and again, a manufacturer residing within the State is taxed on the whole value of his plant and stock, while his competitor who resides just outside the boundary, but sells all his wares in New York, is, so far as that State is concerned, exempt. The attempt to tax the capital value of mortgages, where the interest is limited by law, was found to result in the absolute impossibility of borrowing on mortgage; and the State of New Jersey, refusing to abolish the tax, was actually compelled to exempt from it the richest and busiest counties lying within the suburbs and vicinity of the great commercial metropolis. At the same time, all attempts to relieve the sufferers by this injustice open such opportunities to fraud as almost to defeat the tax. It seems that the idea of a direct tax on incomes is deemed too impracticable to deserve consideration, either as too inquisitorial, or involving too much reliance on the word of the taxpayers, or both. Consequently the Commissioners recommend the exemption of all personality, except stock and shares, from taxation; substituting an "occupancy tax," to be assessed on an assumed valuation of three times the rental or rental value of all dwellings and buildings, and to be paid by the occupier of such, whether owner or tenant. This is in fact a house-tax in aid of a local rate on real property; precisely Mr. Goschen's proposal of last year. The Report casts light on many interesting fiscal questions, and mentions incidentally many curious particulars of the State finances which will well repay attentive perusal.

The Great Industries of the United States* is a work of a very ambitious character. It aims not only at giving a general account of the industrial and commercial resources of the States, severally and collectively, but also at affording a detailed description of the nature of each, its processes, its machinery, and its products, as well as its history, fortunes, and statistics. The work is illustrated by an immense number of drawings and figures, explanatory and other; but those which really assist the reader in understanding the text are fewer by far than those which are, or are meant to be, merely ornamental. The descriptions include the largest and the smallest matters; the general principles of steam navigation and the details of the manufacture of hinges, railroads and nails, printing and varnish-making, cotton and brushes; and the dimensions of the chapters are by no means proportionate to the importance of the subjects. Altogether the book is, and must be, to a great extent a failure. It is too diffuse, and enters too much into minutiae for the general reader; it cannot serve to instruct the student of any special art or craft in the practical knowledge either of its principles or its operations. But by judicious skipping and selection it may no doubt be made useful and serviceable as a book of reference, in default of any more convenient and better arranged work of equally extensive character.

A treatise on Fashion†, "dedicated to the Government and the gallant people of the United States," covers a considerable variety of subjects, practical and theoretical, historic and contemporary. It deals with the philosophy of fashion, the history of dress, appropriate costumes for consular and diplomatic officers, European and American wedding-dresses; the etiquette of dinners, dances, and promenades, with their respective costumes; the etiquette of courtship and of commerce; and, in short, the fashions and manners of the world at large. To the unfashionable reader it may possibly be instructive—we are too ignorant to judge; to those who do not desire to be instructed it is certainly not amusing.

The Kedge Anchor‡ is a manual of seamanship—not navigation and explanation of sea terms, strongly recommended by some officers of experience to the attention of young sailors.

Mr. Clarence King's account of his adventures in the Sierra Nevada§, while engaged in the conduct of an official survey of that region, are lively and interesting, and afford a vivid picture of not the least striking part of the central wilds of that vast territory which is now included in the empire of the United States. The author is evidently one of those who enjoy a rude
